Pretoria Street is a cul-de-sac. The pursuer lives in a tenement at the inner end of it, facing the end of the waste ground in question, but separated from it by the breadth of Pretoria Street, from which it is divided by an admittedly sound and sufficient fence; but continuing from the cul-de-sac end of Pretoria Street, there is a narrow strip of ground about 12 feet broad and 225 feet long, lying between the back of Buchanan Square and the rest of said waste ground. This strip of ground belongs to a Mr Hugh Glen. It neither belongs to nor is occupied by the defenders. The houses of Buchanan Square form its south-east boundary, having no access to it. A fence separates it from the defenders' waste ground on the north-west. Part of this fence has admittedly been broken down. The further end, 12 feet wide on the north-east, is securely fenced, and, what is material to the present case, it is separated from Pretoria Street by another fence at its south-west end, also 12 feet long, which is thus described by the defenders: "The said fence at the end of Pretoria Street originally consisted of three horizontal bars with upright staves nailed thereon. The said horizontal bars were 3 inches in width, and were at the time of the accident attached at the one end to the fence enclosing the property of the Lanarkshire County Council, and at the other end to an upright post. The distance between the ground and the first bar was 2½ inches; between the first and the second 2 feet; and between the second and third 2 feet 11½ inches—the total height from the ground being 5 feet 11 inches. At the time of the accident the upright staves had been torn down by trespassers, but the horizontal bars remained." And the defenders add, "If the pursuer's child came from the pursuer's house to the breach in the fence on defenders' ground before referred to, as the pursuer avers, the child must have passed out of Pretoria Street, in which pursuer's house is situated, and crawled between the bars in said fence or climbed over them on to the strip of private ground belonging to Hugh Glen, as mentioned in Statement 1 hereof, and thence through said breach made in the fence on said ground occupied by defenders." The explanation given by the defenders is that miners and workmen, whom the police are unable to stop, have made these breaches in the two fences in order by trespass to make a short cut to their work.

Now to these pointed averments all that the pursuer can say is, "Not known and not admitted." The facts in question lay under the eye of the pursuer, who lived within a few yards of the locus, and, following the rule of our practice that where such facts are not denied, but declared to be not known and not admitted, this must be read as an unqualified admission. The pursuer attempts to bolster up his case by calling Mr Glen's 12-foot strip of ground a "natural playground" for children, though what he means by "natural" I cannot imagine, unless the human child's natural inclination to trespass is the criterion of its natural playground; and I think he somewhere also says that the strip of ground is used as a footpath by miners and the public, though he gives no indication of the terminus a quo or ad quem.

The reality of the pursuer's case, as he is driven to admit it, is that the pursuer's child first trespassed on to private ground, not the defenders', by climbing or getting through a fence, which, though partially injured by prior trespassers, was still a fence sufficient to indicate that members of the public had no right on the strip of private ground; that, having already trespassed on the private property of Mr Glen, he further trespassed on the private property of the defenders by passing through a breach in their fence, also made by adult trespassers in the neighbourhood. In failing to protect themselves against such trespass I cannot hold that the defenders were guilty of any negligence or breach of duty to the pursuer and his child, which could render them liable to the claim now made by the pursuer.

It is true that there are cases in which the duty which a proprietor, and, in particular, in which a public authority (though it is as proprietor and not as a public authority that the defenders are sued) owes a duty of protection to the public, where they must see that the protection to the adult is also sufficient protection to the child. But I know of no law which, where they owe no duty to the adult, requires them to protect the juvenile trespasser. I shall therefore find that the pursuer has set forth no relevant case and dismiss the action, with expenses.—22*nd November* 1907.

II. Donation — Mortis Causa — Transference of Money to a Person Partly for His Own Benefit and Partly to Make Payments to Others Sustained as a Donation.

III. Donation—Mortis Causa—Proof of—Held That a Donation to a Person Could Not Be Proved by the Unsupported Oath of That Person—Presumption.

In this case the pursuer, Mrs Prentice, as executrix of the deceased Andrew Hutchieson, sought to have the defender, William Shearer, ordained (1) to make payment to her of the sum of £230, 11s. 7d., and (2) to produce an account of his intromissions as vitious intromitter with the estate of the deceased, and make payment of the sum of £400, or such other sum as should be ascertained to be due by the defender as the balance of his intromissions; or in the event of his failing to produce an account, to make payment of the sum of £400.

A proof was allowed, and the material facts proved are given in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

In addition to the cases noticed in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion the case of The National Bank of Scotland v. Mackie's Trs., 1905, 13 S.L.T. 383, was cited.

Lord Mackenzie.—The pursuer of this action, Mrs Prentice, is the niece and executrix-dative qua next of kin of the late Andrew Hutchieson, a retired blacksmith, who died, aged sixty-nine, unmarried and intestate, at Wanlockhead on 11th May 1907. She sues the defender for payment of £230, 11s. 7d. The defender, William Shearer, is a lead washer, and resides at Wanlockhead.

The defence is that the sum sued for was distributed by the defender in accordance with instructions given him by the deceased on the day of his death. The defender pleads that the sums of money were given as donations mortis causa.

The facts of the case are that the deceased, who lived alone, and had given up work four years before his death, was taken ill on Tuesday, 7th May 1907. On Wednesday, 8th May, the defender had a talk with him, when the deceased said, "I was just wanting to see you because I will never get better, and I want to see if you will go to Sanquhar and lift the money, because I want my affairs settled, because I will never be better this time." The defender is seventy-five years of age, and was an intimate friend of the deceased. He says he was "mostly every day about his house in my spare time." He explains that his step-mother was a sister of the deceased's father. The defender did all matters of business for the deceased, who "could do nothing in that way," though able to read and sign his name. When the deceased on Wednesday the 8th asked the defender to go to Sanquhar, he added, "You need not come back again when you go to-morrow morning." At the same time the deceased handed the defender a deposit-receipt for £220, endorsed. On Thursday morning the defender went to Sanquhar, cashed the deposit-receipt, and received £10, 10s. 1d. of interest. In the afternoon he returned with the money and handed it, £230, 10s. 1d., to the deceased, who was sitting by the fireside. The witness explains what followed:—"When I handed him the money, I said, 'You had better count it,' and he counted it and handed it back to me. He said, 'Now, William, take that and put it past where you ken to get it, because I want you to settle the affairs, who it is to be given to, what I am going to do with it.' I took the money into my own possession then and put it into a corner of the drawer, because I thought it was as well putting it into his drawer as taking it home, because it was there under my control. I put it into a drawer in the deceased's house. . . . . He just said that I was to put that money past so that I could get his affairs settled, and he would tell me what to do, or something to the same effect, how he was going to divide it." No one else was present upon either Wednesday or Thursday. On Friday the defender saw the deceased, but other persons were present, and nothing was said about the money.

On Saturday the 11th the defender was with the deceased from twelve till three, when the doctor came. He had been up, but was then in bed. The doctor asked him if he could not go to the infirmary, but the deceased said there was something materially wrong with him and there was no use going. The doctor sounded him, and said there was no use of his going to the infirmary, his lungs and heart were entirely choked up; and he would not be there above a day or two at most, before he was brought back. Later in the day the deceased saw John Mitchell and his wife. Mrs Laidlaw (these were all neighbours), and at about 8.30 p.m. the Rev. Mr Blair, the minister of the parish. Mr Blair judged that the deceased was in perfect possession of his mental faculties. He thought he was in a dying condition, and engaged in religious exercises with him. After this he asked if he could be of assistance in arranging his worldly affairs, but received the reply, "No the noo." The minister then indicated to him that he might not be spared to see him again. The deceased then said "Shearer kens," or "Shearer 'll ken." He also added that he would tell Shearer what to do. The minister then left. Mrs Mitchell and Mrs Laidlaw had also gone, leaving in the room with the deceased only the defender and John Mitchell. The latter was sitting at the fire, the defender at the side of the bed. The deceased was in bed. This was about nine o'clock at night.

The defender then said to the deceased, "'Well, Andrew, what am I to do? What's to be done?' He rose up on his elbow in the bed and told me how the money was to be divided to various parties and to give them the various sums, and I noted them down on a wee bit of paper, because my memory was not very good; when he was giving me it off in that way, I wrote it down to keep it in my mind." The amounts so noted were—Mrs Mitchell £60, William Watson £20, Mrs Laidlaw £15, the defender £60, the pursuer £10, Janet Mitchell £5, James Williamson £2. With reference to the sum of £10 to be given to the pursuer, the defender explains that the deceased proposed £5, and only raised it to £10 in consequence of his remonstrance. A watch was to be given to a son of John Mitchell, but it was not considered any use noting this. After this the defender said: "'Now, Andrew, there's part of the money left, and you have not made a will, you know, and Jane will heir everything in the house, and she will get the remainder when you have no will.' He said 'No, no.' I said, 'Well, how will I do then? Will I appropriate it to myself?' and he gave me a nod. He did not reply in words, but he gave me a nod, as much as to say yes, I expected." John Mitchell corroborates the defender on all points except that he did not hear the deceased make any reply to the defender's last question. Nor did he see him make any sign. He was not looking at the deceased. There is no evidence that there was any note on the paper about the balance. A few minutes after, while the defender was counting up what the sums came to, and after the next-door neighbour, Robert Williamson, had come in, Hutchieson fell back in his bed, dead.

The defender at once sent John Mitchell to the Rev. Mr Blair with the paper, to let him see the amount given to the various persons. This he did. Mitchell then returned, and the defender took possession of the £231, 10s. 1d. in his presence. He took the money to his own house and put it away. On Monday he got envelopes, put the money for each person into a separate envelope, and addressed each one. The funeral was on Tuesday, and after it the defender delivered the envelopes to the donees.

There had been disagreements of old standing between the pursuer and her uncle, the deceased; he disliked her and told others of his dislike; she had for years seen little of him; and on more than one occasion the deceased said she would inherit nothing at his death. As regards the donees it is amply proved that there were good reasons why the deceased should desire to shew them favour. They were neighbours, some of them related to him, and his housework had been done by some of them without remuneration. The pursuer herself in cross-examination has nothing to say against any of them except the defender. He had apparently been on friendly terms with her until she arrived, in response to his telegram, after the death. The defender would not tell her about the money gifted away till after the funeral, and she seems to have been ill pleased. The following day (Monday) the defender took her to the house and gave her a deposit-receipt for £40, which was in the drawer, and also a Store receipt for £4. She got her envelope with £10 in Mrs Laidlaw's house, and handed one of the deceased's watches to the boy John Mitchell.

The difficulty in the case is as regards the law. The defender maintains that these gifts are donations mortis causa. The decision appears to me to turn upon whether there was delivery, actual or constructive, of the contents of the deposit-receipt to the defender. If there was, then the principle laid down in several cases, the earliest being that of Mitchell v. Wright, 1759, M. 8082, described as a very important case by the Lord President in Morris v. Riddick, 1867, 5 M. 1036, would apply. There the father of the deceased had received from him 1000 merks on deathbed on the understanding that if the deceased recovered it was to be at his disposal, but if he died it was to be given to his sisters. This was held not a legacy but a gift or donation mortis causa. On the other hand, the pursuer's counsel contended that it was not possible to distinguish this from the case of Thomson v. Dunlop, 1884, 11 R. 453, where the deceased had handed a savings bank book kept in name of herself and another to that other person three days before her death, who claimed to distribute the money in accordance with directions given years before. This was held to be a verbal appointment of an executor to administer according to verbal directions, and therefore invalid as a donation and as a will. It was not contended here that the gifts should be regarded as nuncupative legacies.

I am of opinion that the present falls under the class of cases of which Mitchell v. Wright is an example, and not under Thomson v. Dunlop. The view I take of the evidence is that the deceased intended the defender to take possession of the money when he uplifted it from the bank, and to deliver it in accordance with the instructions he was to give him. The defender placed the money in the deceased's drawer because he thought that it was as well there, but he regarded it as under his control. No doubt it may be said that the fact of delivery depends on the evidence of a single witness, the defender. I think, however, there is sufficient corroboration in the evidence of John Mitchell, who heard the defender ask the deceased who he was to give the money to. This implies that the money had previously been put into the possession of the defender, and that he had it to give.

It was strongly maintained that delivery was not necessary, on the authority of the cases of Macfarlane's Trs., 1898, 25 R. 1201, Gibson v. Hutchison, 1872, 10 M. 923, Crosbie's Trs., 1880, 7 R. 823, and Blyth v. Curle, 1885, 12 R. 674. Deposit-receipts, however, taken in name of donor and donee, payable to either or survivor, are in a different position from money as regards delivery. There must be delivery or its equivalent in the case of cash or bank notes. I think there is here sufficient to instruct this. See Lord Deas in Gibson v. Hutchison, supra cit.

I have no doubt that the defender was a perfectly honest witness.

The instructions given him, so far as noted on the paper, are, I think, proved by his evidence and that of John Mitchell. The Rev. Mr Blair also corroborates their evidence to a certain extent. The defender, however, has not made out to my satisfaction his right to retain the balance of £58, 10s. 1d. There is a presumption against donation which must be rebutted. The evidence of the donee alone is not sufficient (Thomson, 1882, 9 R. 911, per Lord Young; Sharp v. Paton, 1883, 10 R. 1000, per Lord M'Laren). There is no corroboration of what the defender says, that the deceased nodded when he asked if he was to appropriate the balance. The deceased instructed him to put down £60 opposite his own name, and to that extent I think this gift to him is proved. The gift of £58, 10s. 1d. I hold not proved. This is not because I do not believe what the defender says on the point, but because the evidence of the person to whom the gift is said to have been made is not sufficient, in the circumstances brought out in the proof, to instruct donation. The sum of £58, 10s. 1d. accordingly falls into intestacy.

The pursuer will be found entitled to this amount, but under deduction of £6, the amount of the funeral expenses paid by the defender.

In the circumstances I think the defender is entitled to one-half of his expenses.—26*th November* 1907.

In this action Alfred Edward Debenham, solicitor, 52 Cheapside, London, sued Mrs Euphemia Barclay or Gillanders, Claridge's Hotel, Cape Town, South Africa, for the amount contained in a business account incurred in England by the defender to the pursuer.

Outer House. Lord Dundas. — Debenham v. Gillanders.

The action was undefended.

On the pursuer's motion the account libelled was remitted to the taxing master in London to tax. On a subsequent motion by the defender the Lord Ordinary approved of the report of the taxing master, decerned in absence against the defender, with expenses, and remitted the account when lodged to the Auditor of the Court to tax and report. The Auditor disallowed the following items in the account: Instructing counsel to move for remit to taxing master in London, 6s. 8d.; paid counsel for fee and clerk, £1, 3s. 6d. The Auditor allowed fees of the same amounts to the agent and counsel and his clerk for moving for approval of the taxing master's report.

The Auditor added the following note to his report:—

"The Auditor has allowed the same fees as he has ascertained were allowed by the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) in the case of Hunters v. Alexander, 1882, 19 S.L.R. 619. It has always been the Auditor's practice to allow only one fee to counsel in such actions as this."

The pursuer lodged a note of objections to the Auditor's report, objecting to the disallowance of the above items.

The following authorities were referred to:—Hunters v. Alexander (cit.); Newlands v. Gillanders and Another, 1905, 12 S.L.T. 825.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie.

This was an action of suspension and interdict at the instance of Frank Vogan Harper of Dunlappie, Forfarshire, against Mrs Page or Stuart of Lundie, Forfarshire, praying the Court "to interdict the respondent and all others acting by the authority of her or her factors or agents from interrupting, diminishing, or polluting, or in any way interfering with the supply of water to the house, offices, cottages, and estate of Dunlappie, belonging to the complainer, drawn from two or more springs situated on the respondent's estate of Lundie, near the eastern corner thereof, and in particular through a well also situated on said estate, all as indicated on the plan to be produced in process; from removing or in any way interfering with the piping and cisterns or receiving-boxes or any of them placed or laid down by the complainer or his authors for the purposes of said supply, and from making excavations, pits, puddle trenches, dams, embankments, or any other works with a view of forming a loch, pond, or dam, or any other works upon ground part of the said estate of Lundie upon or in the neighbourhood of the said springs upon that estate, the water from which is led into the said well, so as to interrupt, diminish, pollute or in any way interfere with the said supply of water to the said house, offices, cottages, and estate of Dunlappie; and from instructing, attempting, or executing any other works which may in any way interrupt, diminish, pollute, or in any way interfere with the said supply of water to the said house, offices, cottages, and estate; and from inciting, employing, or requesting other persons to do any of the things foresaid; and further, to ordain the respondent to restore to their former position the said piping and cisterns or receiving-boxes or such part thereof as may have been removed or interfered with by the respondent or by the instructions of her or her said factors or agents to fill up any such excavations, pits, or trenches made by her or by the instructions of her or her said factors or agents upon the said ground, and to level the surface of the said ground and restore the ground to the state in which it was prior to the said operations; and to grant interim interdict, or to do otherwise in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem proper."

Proof was led before the Lord Ordinary.

The following narrative of the facts of the case is taken from the Lord Ordinary's Note:—

The complainer, who is proprietor of the estate of Dunlappie, seeks to interdict the respondent, who is proprietrix of the adjoining estate of Lundie, from interfering with his water supply.

These two estates belonged in 1845 to Lord Kintore, and were both let at that time to Dr Guthrie. In that year the water supply in dispute was made. The boundary between Dunlappie and Lundie was then, as now, the middle of a road which runs north and south, Dunlappie being to the east, Lundie to the west. A few feet west of this road, and running parallel with it, is a ditch. The purpose of forming a water supply in 1845 was to bring water to the mill dam of Dunlappie (then called Easterton). A conduit was begun on Dunlappie, which was built all the way to the ditch, thus crossing the westmost half of the road, and the intervening strip of land belonging to the Lundie estate. This is afterwards referred to as the Dunlappie conduit. The work of construction was then proceeded with on the Lundie side of the ditch. A built drain (described in the evidence as the box drain) was carried across what is now field No. 81 on the last Ordnance Survey Map (No. 41 of process) for a distance of about 150 yards. This box drain discharged into the ditch on the side opposite to the Dunlappie conduit at a point 13½ feet higher up, measured diagonally across the ditch. There was no connecting pipe across the ditch, but the mouth of the Lundie box drain was at such an angle that a large portion of the Lundie water, after mingling with the water in the ditch, must have found its way down the Dunlappie conduit. At the mouth of the box drain were placed stones so that a pool or dipping place was formed, and this is marked as a well on the latest Ordnance Survey.

The first use made of the Lundie box drain water for domestic purposes was by the inhabitants of the Burnhead cottages (on Dunlappie) dipping their stoups into this dipping place or well. This was at or about the time the box drain was made. Shortly afterwards Dr Guthrie put a pipe into the Dunlappie conduit and brought the water into his house. It is described as very good drinking water. The separation of the estates took place in 1861, when Lord Kintore conveyed Lundie to Mr Shepherd (the respondent's author) and by a later conveyance in the same year disponed Dunlappie to Mr Carnegie (the author of the complainer). In 1897 the complainer bought Dunlappie, and in the same year the respondent's father, Colonel Page, bought Lundie.

Until 1898 Dunlappie continued to get water through the conduit made in 1845. After the complainer became proprietor of Dunlappie he placed in 1898 (under circumstances which are in dispute in this case) a cistern on the west side of the ditch, on Lundie, connected this with the Lundie box drain, and then led a 4-inch pipe from the cistern under the ditch on to Dunlappie by a track slightly to the south of the old conduit, then through a sand trap and filter and so on to Dunlappie House. The respondent drew the water for Dunlappie House through the cistern until the present year, when in consequence of the difference which arose, he moved it slightly to the north and placed it nearer the ditch on the other side of the fence of field No. 81, still continuing to draw water direct from the box drain.

The cause of the difference between the parties was a project Captain Stuart formed shortly before his death this year to make a pond on portions of field No. 81 and the adjoining field to the north No. 33. The complainer, Mr Harper, was apprehensive that if the pond was made his water supply might be interfered with. Parties unfortunately very soon got to arm's length with each other on this question. The complainer's right to the water supply, so far as Lundie box drain was concerned, was challenged; he was requested to remove his cistern, and a correspondence followed between the parties' law agents, in which the legal positions they maintained were formulated. The proposal to form the pond has been dropped. I think if it had been proceeded with it would have interfered with the flow of water down the box drain. The legal question, however, remains, which is whether the complainer has a right of servitude as regards the box drain laid in 1845 across field No. 81 on Lundie? The subsidiary question (if the preceding is determined in favour of the complainer) is whether he is entitled to maintain his cistern in the position it presently occupies on Lundie or on the other side of the fence, or whether he must take his supply, as before 1898, from the ditch?

The Lord Ordinary issued the following interlocutor:—

"Interdicts, prohibits, and discharges the respondent, and all others acting by the authority of her or her factors or agents, from interrupting, diminishing, or in any way interfering with the supply of water to the house, offices, cottages, and estate of Dunlappie belonging to the complainer, drawn from two or more springs situated on the respondent's estate of Lundie, near the eastern corner thereof, and in particular through a well also situated on said estate, all as indicated on the plan No. 41 of process; from removing or in any way interfering with the piping and cisterns or receiving-boxes, or any of them, placed or laid down by the complainer or his authors for the purposes of said supply, and decerns; finds the complainer entitled to expenses."

Lord Mackenzie [after narrating the facts as above].—The first argument advanced by the complainer in support of his right to prevent interference with the water coming through the Lundie drain was founded on the titles of parties in 1861. I have been unable to discover anything in the deeds which will support this contention. The conveyance of Lundie was earlier in date than that of Dunlappie, and there is no reservation in favour of the granter of the right now sought to be established. Accordingly, the principle that a granter cannot derogate from his own grant applies, and the complainer's argument, in my opinion, fails. Nor is there sufficient evidence, even if this would avail the complainer, to shew that this particular water supply was a necessity to the estate of Dunlappie. Evidence was led for the respondent as to water on Dunlappie estate, especially that which is said to come from a place called Tarry Lock, with a drainage area of 200 acres. It does not appear necessary to go into this.

The strength of the complainer's case is in his plea that he has acquired right by possession for the prescriptive period to the water supply laid down in 1845, including the water which comes down the Lundie box drain. For this purpose the years of prescription must be held to commence with the separation of the estates in 1861. In my opinion it is established by the evidence that the possession has been of the necessary duration and character to establish a servitude right of aqueduct in favour of Dunlappie House, and of aquæhaustas in favour of the Burnhead cottages, as regards the water in question. The respondent maintained that the true view was to regard Lundie as the dominant and Dunlappie as the servient tenement. The natural fall of the ground is from Lundie to Dunlappie; field No. 81, which contains 18 acres, is of a boggy nature, and any drainage from it would naturally be into the ditch in question. Accordingly the respondent urged that what had been done was merely in the exercise of her natural rights, and that to give effect to the complainer's contention would, or might, seriously interfere with the proper drainage of field

Extra Division.

Harper v. Stuart.

No. 81, on new and approved principles. Water which is percolating or seeping through the ground, even if assisted by an ordinary agricultural drain, must be received by the lower proprietor; it is discharged upon his land as a burden he is bound to receive, and he cannot by using it for any length of time acquire right to have its flow continued. This law must, of course, be conceded by the complainer, but the history of this water supply appears to me to take the case out of the category to which the respondent would assign it. There can be no doubt, from the evidence, that the water in question was not originally thrown as a burden upon Dunlappie. The Dunlappie conduit was introduced into the ditch for the purpose of bringing water to Dunlappie. The respondent does not dispute the right of the complainer to maintain the Dunlappie conduit, and this involves the exercise of a servitude right as regards the western half of the road and the strip of Lundie lying between the road and the ditch. The servitude, in my opinion, extends further. I think the evidence established that the Lundie box drain was placed in field No. 81 in order to tap a new supply, and not for the purpose of draining the field. Although there was no opus manufactum to conduct the water from Lundie across the ditch and into the conduit, yet the Lundie box drain and the Dunlappie conduit were laid in such a position relatively the one to the other as to constitute the former, in my opinion, an integral part of the system. Another consideration shews that it is unlikely those who made the drain on Lundie had primarily in view field drainage for the benefit of Lundie, and it is this, that the drain mouth is not taken to the lowest point of the field. It is not quite clear on the evidence whether the intention at the time the drain was made was to provide a domestic water supply to Dunlappie House (the witness Dalgetty says it was) or only to provide water for the mill (which is the evidence given by Dakers). It is to be observed that if the intention was to provide a domestic water supply, then the point to which the box drain mouth was taken was the most suitable for giving a sufficient head of water to the house. The water flowing through the Lundie box drain never fails, and was recognised by those who drank it as spring water. The ditch, on the other hand, though it has a course of about four-fifths of a mile before it receives the Lundie water, and receives six feeders, draining an area of 380 acres, is described as being pretty dry at times to the north.

The case for the respondent is that the Lundie box drain is an ordinary leader drain which conveys surface water, and it is necessary to examine the evidence upon this point. [His Lordship proceeded to examine the evidence as to the character and purpose of the box drain.]

Upon the evidence, therefore, I am of opinion that the box drain was not put in as an ordinary agricultural leader drain, but was laid in order to lead the water, including that from the spring, in a defined channel, and that the water does flow through it, with a "continuity of parts," for the purpose of augmenting the supply to Dunlappie.

From the position of the mouth of the box drain and the Dunlappie conduit on the other side, I think an inspection would suggest there was a connection between the two. This is the view of Mr Fettes, who was over the ground with Mr Shepherd, the owner of Lundie, forty years ago, in connection with the Lundie drainage. The drain in question was then discovered, and Mr Fettes saw on the other side of the ditch a 5-inch pipe to take the water away from the well at the box drain mouth, which was then partly built with stones.

No objection was ever made by Mr Shepherd to the proprietor of Dunlappie drawing water from the ditch through this 5-inch pipe. It is in evidence that until recently the Lundie fence ran along the east side of the ditch. It had always, however, been carried round the well so as to leave an access to those coming from the Burnhead cottages who desired to dip their pitchers. The position of the fence, and the fact of recourse being had to the well for water, must have been within the knowledge of the proprietors of Lundie. A point was made for the respondent in regard to the contamination which must necessarily follow from the use of manure on the field. The answer to this, however, is that the field has been under crop before, and the water has apparently not been rendered unfit for use.

Down to 1898 the water for Dunlappie House, as already stated, was drawn from the supply coming down the conduit from the ditch. In March of that year Mr Harper approached Mr Arnot, a neighbouring farmer, who was looking after Lundie, to get permission to put a cistern in on the Lundie side of the ditch, and connect it direct with the Lundie drain, so as to get the water absolutely clean, without its first going through the ditch. I hold it proved that Mr Arnot explained the matter to Captain Stuart, and that he gave his consent, which was communicated to Mr Harper. . . . In reliance on this permission Mr Harper put in at a cost of £120 a cistern and pipe which communicated directly with the Lundie box drain, and led the water under the ditch and through Dunlappie, on a line south of that followed by the previous drain as indicated on Mr Fettes' plan No 38. The conduit was then closed. This cistern was used without complaint until shortly before the present proceedings. I think the possession had of the Lundie water since 1898 is sufficient, when combined with the enjoyment since 1861, to complete the years of prescription, and that the proprietor of Dunlappie had a right of servitude prior to the removal of the cistern to its present position. It was removed in consequence of a challenge in 1905 on behalf of Captain Stuart of Mr Harper's right to have the tank. Mr Harper then removed it to its present site, in the mistaken belief that he was taking it off the Lundie property. It is still on Lundie, but in its present position adds nothing to the burden. The effect, so far as concerns the respondent, is practically the same as if it had remained where it was. I am therefore of opinion she is not entitled to insist on its removal.

The prayer of the note was criticised, and it was pointed out that no spring had been located. There is, however, no doubt that water from springs is led down to the well in question. Though the plan No. 37 put in by the complainer does not shew accurately the line of the drain in question or the position of the other drains in the field, there is no question as to the position of the well mentioned in the prayer, and the respondent's plan No. 41 shows the box drain which feeds it. I am not prepared to grant interdict against polluting, because it is not suggested the respondent has been polluting the water. Questions may arise hereafter in regard to the cropping and manuring of field No. 81. Subject to this exception, I am of opinion that the complainer is entitled to interdict in terms of the first two branches of the prayer, which is all that was asked, and with expenses.

The Respondent reclaimed and argued: Prior to 1861 the two estates of Dunlappie and Lundie were a unum quid. They were separated in 1861, when Lundie was sold to the reclaimer's author. There was no reservation in the titles of Lundie of any rights in favour of Dunlappie. Consequently Dunlappie could have no rights of aquæhaustus or aquæductus on Lundie in 1861, as there was no express reservation of such rights, and no implied reservation ex necessitate as in Cochrane v. Ewart, 1860, 22 D. 358, and 1861, 4 Macq. 117 (Shearer v. Peddie, 1899, 1 F. 1201; Wheeldon v. Burrowes, 1879, L.R. 12 Ch. Div. 31). Consequently if these rights had been acquired by Lundie at all, it could only have been by prescription since 1861. But Dunlappie was the lower tenement and could not prescribe a right to get this water from Lundie, as it was drainage water which the lower tenement was bound to receive. The fact that the lower proprietor had received such drainage water for forty years could not prevent the upper proprietor from stopping it on his own ground (Chamber Colliery Co. v. Hopwood, 1886, L.R. 32 Ch. Div. 549). In any event the use of the water could only be ascribed to tolerance, and use on tolerance could not found a prescriptive right (Macnab v. Munro Ferguson, 1890, 17 R. 397). The drains were merely for the purpose of draining the fields in question. It was impossible to prescribe a right to get percolating water, though put into a drain (Greatrex v. Hayward, 1853, 8 Exch. 291; Wood v. Waud, 1849, 3 Exch. 748; Campbell v. Bryson, 1864, 3 M. 254; Chasemore v. Richards, 1859, 7 H.L. Cases (Clerk), 349; Milton v. Glen-Moray Glenlivet Distillery Co. Ltd., 1898, 1 F. 135; Allen v. Taylor, 1880, L.R. 16 Ch. Div. 355). The proprietor could always use percolating water in suo. Merely putting it into a drain did not make it into a stream (M'Nab v. Robertson, 1896, 24 R. (H.L.) 34). At most Dunlappie had only enjoyed a right to take water from the ditch, and that right they had enjoyed for thirty-seven years only, from 1861 to 1898. In 1898 Dunlappie ceased to take water from the ditch and took it from another point on Lundie. Dunlappie was not entitled to add the two periods from 1861 to 1898 and from 1898 to 1905 together to make up the prescriptive period (Earl of Kintore v. Pirie & Sons Ltd., 1903, 5 F. 818, and 8 F. (H.L.) 16).

Argued for the Respondent: Dunlappie had two servitude rights over Lundie, aquæductus and aquæhaustus. The right of aquæductus was established, because it was clear that the pipe on Lundie from the ditch to the medium filum of the road was laid, not to drain water off Lundie, but to provide Dunlappie with a water supply. The right was completed either by possession for the prescriptive period or by implied reservation ex necessitate (Cochrane v. Ewart, cit.). The right of aquæhaustus was established in the same way by the drawing of water for forty years from the well. The water to which a right was established was the water coming from the box drain, which was the only perennial flow. Having the right of aquæductus, the change made in 1898 was only exercising it civiliter. It imposed no new burden on Lundie. It was not like a right of way which could only be exercised in one way. The two periods up to 1898 and after could be added together to complete the prescriptive period. It was the same right that was exercised before and after 1898. If it was a new right, then it was established rei interventus, owing to the opus manufactum Dunlappie made with Lundie's consent or acquiescence (Bell's Principles, 946). It was possible to prescribe a right to percolating water. The English cases cited referred to two tenements with a common stream or percolating water, and had no reference to a case when a servitude was established (Bell's Principles, 1108; Magistrates of Ardrossan v. Dickie, 1903, 14 S.L.T. 349; Smith v. Police Commissioners of Denny, 1880, 7 R. (H.L.) 28).

The Court issued the following interlocutor:—

Find (1) that the complainer has acquired by prescriptive use a right of servitude to lead water for the use of Dunlappie estate from the stream or ditch on the estate of Lundie at and from the point some 13½ feet or thereby distant from the mouth of the box drain on Lundie estate . . . . and that by means of a 5-inch tile, or alternatively a square conduit or other water passage, laid under the road, and extending to the said ditch; but find with regard to this servitude no interdict is necessary, in respect that it is not proved that the respondent has ever proposed to execute any works which would interfere therewith; (2) that the substitution of other means of aqueduct from Lundie estate to Dunlappie since 1898, and the cessation of the use of the tile drain or conduit above referred to, does not entitle the respondent to have the years from 1898 onwards deducted from the years of prescription as in a question of aqueduct between the two estates, and that for these years the present means of aqueduct must be held to have been a substitute for the aqueduct which the complainer has enjoyed since 1861; (3) that the complainer is not entitled to have on the estate of Lundie any other means of leading water from the said estate than those above mentioned, and in particular is not entitled to have thereon the piping and cisterns or receiving-boxes mentioned in the prayer of the note; (4) that for more than forty years the inhabitants of the cottages on the estate of Dunlappie known as the Burnhead cottages have been in constant and uninterrupted use to draw water for drinking purposes from the mouth of the said box drain at the spot marked "well" on the plan No. 38 of process; (5) that the respondent's husband, now deceased, contemplated making a pond at or near the said drain mouth or well, but that this proposal has been abandoned by the respondent, and that no other interference with the said drain mouth or "well" is at present proposed by the respondent; therefore find it unnecessary to grant any interdict with regard to the said "well," under reservation of all questions, and in particular of the question as to whether the supply of water at the said drain mouth or "well" is capable of being the subject of a servitude to the effect of preventing the proprietor of Lundie from interfering by operations in suo with the water in said box drain and "well": with these findings refuse the prayer of the note of suspension and interdict and decern; find the reclaimer entitled to expenses . . . .; modify said expenses to two-thirds of the taxed amount thereof. . . .

Lord Ardwall.—In this case the complainer, who is proprietor of the estate of Dunlappie in the county of Forfar, seeks to have the respondent, who is proprietor of the neighbouring estate of Lundie, interdicted from interrupting, diminishing, or polluting an alleged supply of water to the house, offices, and cottages on the estate of Dunlappie, "drawn from two or more springs situated on the respondent's estate of Lundie, and in particular through a well on said estate, or from removing or interfering with a receiving-box and piping which had been placed on the estate of Lundie by the complainer," and the two main questions in the case are: First, whether the complainer has a right of aquæductus through the estate of Lundie, and if so, what is the extent and nature of that right? and second, whether the complainer has a right of aquæhaustus from the "well" or pool at the end of the box drain which comes down through the field on Lundie estate, which is marked No. 81 on the Ordnance Survey Map No. 41 of process?

The said two estates both belonged, prior to 1860, to the Earl of Kintore, and it appears from the evidence that somewhere about 1845 a certain Dr Guthrie was tenant of both estates or farms, as they then were, on the Kintore estate. At that time there was a threshing-mill upon Dunlappie supplied with water by a mill-dam, and it appears that Dr Guthrie, being desirous of augmenting the supply to this mill-dam, had a built stone drain constructed through Dunlappie up to, and a few feet beyond, the march between Lundie and Dunlappie, so as to get the water from what the witness Dakers, who made the drain, calls a "bit burnie," and which has been referred to in the proof as the ditch running alongside the road which forms the march between the two estates. At that time there was apparently a small bog in what now forms the said field No. 81, and, partly with the view of possibly getting additional water out of that bog, and partly with the view of draining the field, Dr Guthrie instructed Dakers to make a built stone drain there as far as the bog went. Dakers says that the two drains were made at the same time for the purpose of giving a water supply to Dr Guthrie's threshing-mill. It seems that in leading this drain up the bog it collected a considerable quantity of water of the description of spring water, but from first to last there is nothing to shew that any spring was ever discovered or much less located on any part of the said field, and my own impression is that there being in that field a clay sub-soil with sand above it, this drain through the bog tapped the underground water which naturally had percolated down through the light upper soil, but was stopped from sinking farther down by the clay sub-soil. Though not arising from springs, this water, of course, would present all the characteristics of pure spring water.

It seems that some time after these operations had been carried out, it was discovered that the water which came down the ditch, and which in dry weather consisted mostly of water from the drain in the field No. 81, was good drinking water, and it began to be used as such on Dunlappie, although there was a well of drinking water there before that time. According to Dakers there was no well made at the end of the stone drain through field No. 81; the people from the Burnhead cottages just came and got water from the end of the drain, but subsequently apparently some stones were put in to make a kind of pool or well into which they dipped their pitchers. There was a distance of some thirteen and a half feet between the point where the drain through Lundie came in on one side of the ditch or burn and where the conduit or built stone drain to Dunlappie drew the water out of the ditch from the other side.

Things remained in this state till the year 1860, when Lord Kintore sold the estate of Lundie to a Mr Shepherd, conform to Minute of Sale dated 22nd and 23rd February 1860, and it is common ground that no reservation of any right in favour of Dunlappie which Lord Kintore still retained was made in the disposition of Lundie. Subsequently Dunlappie was sold by Disposition recorded 11th November 1861 to a Mr William Carnegie, and no servitude in favour of Dunlappie was constituted by said disposition. It is certain therefore that there is no grant of servitude by constitution or reservation in the title-deeds of the parties, and the Lord Ordinary has held, and I agree with him, that the existence of the stone built drain from the ditch in question to Dunlappie was not a matter of such necessity to Dunlappie as to bring the case within the rule of Cochrane v. Ewart, 22 D. 358 and (1861) 4 Macq. 117.

The question still remains whether a servitude has been constituted in favour of Dunlappie by prescriptive use, and if so, what is the nature and extent of that servitude? A positive servitude can only be constituted by prescription to the extent and in the manner in which possession of it has been exercised upon the land of the alleged servient tenement; and as it is founded upon the acquiescence of the proprietor of the alleged servient tenement, there can be no prescription of any right beyond that which has been visibly and clearly asserted and used during the prescriptive period. It is therefore very necessary to consider what since 1861 has been the apparent and evident possession and use had of Lundie estate by the proprietors of Dunlappie.

There is no doubt that the conduit which was carried up through the Dunlappie fields and under the old road till it met the ditch or stream on Lundie was situated, after it passed the medium filum of the road, upon the Lundie estate, and has been there since 1861 onwards for the purpose of intercepting and taking in water from the ditch on Lundie estate. I may here notice that at some time, probably before the division of the estate, a 5-inch tile drain was laid in or alongside of the old stone drain under the road and up to the "ditch."

But until the operations in 1898, and apart from the question of aquæhaustus by the cottages at Burnhead, both of which matters I shall afterwards advert to, there was no use or possession had of the lands of Lundie for the purpose of taking water in the box drain down to Dunlappie House other than what I have just mentioned. The Lord Ordinary has held, apparently on some of the evidence as to what was done in 1845, that the box drain which comes down through the said field No. 81 of the Lundie estate is part and parcel of the same scheme, or, as he words it, "is an integral part of the system" which was started in 1845 for the purpose, as he holds, of bringing the water from the former bog on the field No. 81 down to Dunlappie, although, as he admits, there was no opus manufactum to conduct the water from the field on Lundie across the ditch and into the conduit or 5-inch tile drain.

But although it may have been the scheme and intention of Dr Guthrie when he carried out the operations already referred to to bring the water from the field No. 81 down to Dunlappie, yet there having been no reservation whatever when Lundie was given off, the complainer is not entitled to found upon anything that was intended prior to 1861, but is only entitled to found on the rights exercised by himself and his predecessors from and after that date. Now, beyond having a 5-inch tile reaching to the ditch on the lands of Lundie and then encroaching for the length of a few feet, there was no possession had or asserted by the proprietors of Dunlappie of the lands of Lundie; their possession ended at the ditch end of the five-inch tile or conduit. Mr Shepherd and his successors might have objected if they pleased immediately after the disposition of Lundie to the conduit or tile underneath the road as being in derogation of the grant made by Lord Kintore, who at that time remained proprietor of the estate of Dunlappie, but apparently they did not see the necessity for doing so. They had, however, no reason to suppose that by the presence of a 5-inch tile drawing water from the natural stream in the ditch there was any servitude being constituted against them with regard to the drain on their own land which entered the said ditch some thirteen feet farther up its course, and which, so far as they could see, was nothing but an ordinary field drain just of such a size and description as leader drains usually are, and a drain, moreover, which began and ended entirely on their own land, and was not and never had been connected with the conduit or tile leading to Dunlappie under the road. There was nothing to lead them to connect this drain with the conduit which led out of the ditch farther down, because between the two places there was a stream of water which consisted, not only of the water which came down through the field No. 81, but of all the water which, whether spring or surface, found its way into the ditch or "burnie" in its course of four-fifths of a mile above where the supply was taken off for Dunlappie during which it received some six small rivulets or drains from a catchment area of about 380 acres. The right to take water from an open stream or ditch does not infer a right over all the sources from which that ditch derives its water. I am satisfied, therefore, that the servitude of aquæductus on the estate of Lundie ended at the point where the conduit or pipe received the water from the natural stream in the ditch. Erskine, II. ix. 13, thus defines the servitude we are now dealing with: "The servitude of aquæductus is the right that anyone has of carrying water in conduits or canals along the surface of the servient tenement for the use of one's own property." Now it seems to me impossible to hold that there was, as is now maintained for the complainer, any such servitude over the natural stream in the ditch or over the drains of the respondent's field No. 81.

The Lord Ordinary has apparently adopted the view regarding the original operations presented by the witness Dakers, but I must say I am disposed to treat the evidence of that witness with some reserve. He endeavours to have it believed that there was a box drain practically the whole way from Dunlappie up to a point one hundred yards above the ditch. Now it is proved, if anything can be held to be proved in this case, by the evidence of the engineers and others, that there is no connection, and can be no connection, between the drain which ended on the Lundie side of the burn and the drain which ran off on the other; and I think it is pretty clear that one reason of their being thirteen and a half feet apart was that in time of rain Dr Guthrie could get for his mill dam a larger supply of water than would have come merely from the drain in the field No. 81 on the plan. It is quite proved that there is no trace of there ever having been a junction of any sort between the two drains. Then the view suggested by some of the respondent's witnesses seems to have been adopted by the Lord Ordinary to the effect that the box drain in field No. 81 was from its construction evidently not intended for a drain at all, but for a watercourse, and that this is shown from its being different from the rumble drains which were afterwards put in and which join it at various places. Now, I think it is perfectly clear on the proof that before tile drains were introduced—and, as Mr David Arnott says, "there were no tile drains in these days"—there were two kinds of drains used. The one was a built conduit or box drain. These were used as leaders or main drains where a swamp or bog was to be drained, and were built of dry stones on both sides with a cover on the top; but as they were expensive, and it was troublesome often to find stones of a sufficient size for covers, the smaller drains which led into the main drains were made in the form of what are known as rumble drains, which were simply stones more or less carefully put into a trench with the larger ones on the top and then covered up with earth. So it is in vain to say that the construction of this particular drain in field No. 81 was sufficient to notify the proprietors of Lundie that it was anything more than a field drain, and that it did drain the field there can be no manner of doubt. It is not merely matter of evidence but of common knowledge that before tile drains were introduced the invariable method of draining fields or bogs was by means of built box drains (or, as they are often called, conduits) with spurs or feeders consisting of rumble drains leading into them. I may add that in my own experience these box drains are generally of larger dimensions than that in field No. 81, so there was nothing in the size of that drain to draw more attention to it than to any other box drain.

It appears that up till 1898 the respondent never interfered with the servitude of taking water from the ditch by means of the old conduit or pipe. I cannot hold that the proposal to create a pond would necessarily have had the effect of diminishing the supply of water in the ditch, for after the respondent's pond had been once filled (and I may say I see no objection to his utilising water on his land for the purpose of making a pond), the same amount of water must necessarily have flowed into the ditch over the sluice or breastwork of the pond as the case might be. It seems that the intention of making a pond is now abandoned, and therefore, so far as this part of the case is concerned, there is no call for an interdict.

I must now turn to what happened in 1898. The question for consideration is whether by what was done, or suffered to be done, in that year a new servitude of aquæductus was granted in room and place of the old, and whether the period during which this new servitude was enjoyed can be added to the years of enjoyment of the old servitude, with which I have already dealt, for the purpose of validating not the old but the new servitude as it is now claimed to exist. It is necessary to notice that what was done was really to create an entirely new water supply for Dunlappie. (1) Instead of the water being taken from the ditch it was taken from the drain at a point some way up in the said field No. 81; (2) instead of a supply of mixed water, partly surface and partly underground water, what is now taken is underground water; (3) instead of an encroachment of a pipe or conduit for the length of a few feet on the estate of Lundie, there is an encroachment of several feet and the establishment of a square water tank on a field of the Lundie estate; and (4) instead of the water being conveyed by the old conduit to Dunlappie, it is conveyed in a lead pipe and carefully filtered on the way. It is evident that there is thus now claimed a servitude of a very different kind from that which existed up to 1898. It is a servitude for the supply of pure underground water for domestic uses only instead of an ordinary supply of mixed water from a ditch for the use of a mill dam, and not primarily for drinking purposes. This new servitude imposes a burden of a very different character on the proprietor of Lundie compared with the old servitude, because if it be held that the proprietor of Dunlappie has a servitude for procuring pure drinking water from a point in the field No. 81, belonging to Lundie, it might be held to follow that the proprietor of Lundie was not entitled to carry out any such operations as might pollute that supply, such, for instance, as heavily manuring the field where the drain is situated. Again, it might be held that he was not entitled to alter the drainage arrangements of the field generally; and the further burden was laid on Lundie, namely, of allowing the proprietor of Dunlappie to come on to the lands of Lundie for the purpose of repairing or rebuilding the cistern, or repairing or re-laying the lead pipes; and lastly, the creation of this new servitude might have the effect of preventing the proprietor of Lundie from using his own land in such way as he pleased, for example, by making a pond on it, which would be quite within his power, provided he restored to the ditch as much water as entered his pond, but would be beyond his powers if he was obliged to respect the supply of underground water from the box drain in field No. 81.

Since the new supply was made in 1898, the pipe or conduit through the road has been shut up, and the conduit through Dunlappie no longer conveys water to the mill dam or house. In short, a new water supply has been created, and an entirely new servitude is sought to be imposed. Now, for the creation of a new servitude by grant, especially where it implies such a serious burden on a neighbouring proprietor as is implied in that now claimed, it is, I think, the law, as stated by Professor Bell in his Principles, sect. 992, "that such a servitude may be constituted in the charter either of the dominant or the servient tenement, or in a separate deed, contract, or missive, or other authentic writing, holograph or tested;" and Erskine says (II. ix. 3) that conventionally servitudes are constituted either by grant where the will of the party burdened is expressed in a written declaration by which the servitude is imposed, or secondly, by prescription. In the present case no writing is put forward as the foundation of the entirely new servitude now claimed by the complainer, and in my opinion it is incompetent to prove the imposition of such a burden by verbal communications. But, even assuming that it were competent, I do not think that even verbal consent to the servitude by a person competent to grant it has been proved in the present case. . . .

But it is argued that by allowing the cistern and pipes to remain on Lundie from 1898, previous to Mrs Stuart's entry to the property of the estate, down to 1905 without question, the respondent must be held barred by acquiescence from seeking to have them removed. Now, even if the respondent and Captain Stuart did know precisely where this tank and pipes were situated, I think their not taking any notice of it must be ascribed to tolerance rather than to acquiescence, but I do not think that there was even tolerance, and that for the reason that neither Captain Stuart nor Mrs Stuart knew what way the water supply arrangements had been made in 1898 before they came to reside on the property. This appears from Captain Stuart's letter to the complainer, No. 12 of process, and is not wonderful, as the tank was sunk 2 feet in the ground and was covered over with grass like the rest of the field. The lead pipes also were sunk in the ground, to the depth of 18 inches or 2 feet, and both having been in that position from 1898 till 1900, almost all trace of the work would have disappeared, except to a critical observer, and as already noticed it had only taken a day or two to put in the cistern pipe on Lundie. (See the complainer's evidence.)

I am therefore of opinion that on none of the grounds put forward by the complainer can it be held either (1) that a grant of the servitude now claimed was made in 1898; or (2) that the respondent is barred by acquiescence from now objecting to the operations then carried out on Lundie.

As to the alleged important nature of the operations, while the respondent says that it cost about £120 to put in the cistern and the line of piping, it must be remembered that there was a sand trap, a filtering well, and another cistern in the Dunlappie field besides the piping, the whole way to Dunlappie, and that the making of a 2-feet square tank upon Lundie was a very small and inexpensive portion indeed of the total work, and that is, of course, all that the proprietor of Lundie is concerned with. The other works can still be utilised for water taken in at the old conduit or 5-inch tile.

It is not unworthy of notice also that when the complainer was found fault with for having his cistern on Lundie, he broke it up and removed it and put in a new box cistern inside the Lundie fence, but between it and the ditch. This was done in June 1906, and it appears from the evidence of the complainer that he changed the position of the cistern under the belief that the fence was a march fence, and that by what he did he was taking it off Lundie property on to Dunlappie. It is undisputed that the cistern and some of the pipes are still on Lundie, and I am of opinion that the complainer is bound to remove them and is not entitled to interdict against the respondent doing so failing his doing so himself.

The other question is with regard to the right of aquæhaustus from the so-called well at the mouth of the box drain on the field No. 81 on the Ordnance Survey Map.

On this question I am of opinion that if this place is to be viewed as a well in the ordinary sense, the complainer has established a prescriptive right to the servitude of aquæhaustus from it, as I think it is proved that after the box drain was made, and the cottagers at Burnhead became aware of the excellent quality of the underground water which came down the drain, they have used it as drinking water summer and winter; and although there was no well formed at the time the drain was made, yet subsequently the cottagers themselves seem to have formed a pool deep enough for them to dip pitchers into by placing a number of large stones a short way below the mouth of the drain, and these at the same time served the useful purpose of keeping the ditch water from mixing with the drain water except in times of high flood. Had the proposal to make a pond at this place been still insisted in, it would have been necessary to consider the question whether by the use I have referred to the servitude of aquæhaustus had been constituted over the estate of Lundie, but I think there is no reason as matters now stand for granting the interdict against the respondent interfering with this well, as she is not threatening to do so. In my opinion the question is one of considerable difficulty. If the so-called well in question had itself been the site of a natural spring, I think the case of Wallace, 16th June

Harper v. Stuart.

Lord Ardwall.

1761, M. 14,511, would have been an authority for holding that the respondent was not entitled to interfere with that spring. But the difficulty in the present case is that undoubtedly the water is brought into the so-called well by an artificial drain which was not made for the purpose of bringing water for the supply of the Burnhead cottages, although it has been used for that purpose. This case is accordingly very different from the case of Smith v. The Police Commissioners of Denny and Dunipace, 1880, 7 R. (H. L.) p. 28, where the well was supplied by a natural spring rising at that spot. In the present case I notice that the Lord Ordinary has adopted in his interlocutor what is said in the prayer of the note regarding the origin of the water in question being in two or more springs on the estate of Lundie. I have only to say that there is no evidence of there being any spring on the estate of Lundie from which the water in question comes. That it is underground water is undoubted, but that may quite as well come by a percolation into the drain from a water-bearing stratum as from a natural spring. But whether this is so or not, the authorities seem rather to be to the effect that a servitude cannot be constituted by prescription or use over underground water coming from an artificial drain whether it comes from springs or only from percolation, at all events to the effect of preventing the proprietor of lands through which such water comes from diverting it by ordinary drainage or other lawful operations in suo.

See Wood v. Waud, 1849, 5 Ex. (W. H. and G.) 748 at 778; Greatrex v. Hayward, 1853, 8 Ex. (W. H. and G.) 291; and Rawstron v. Taylor, 1855, 11 Ex. (H. and G.) 369.

The principle of these cases seems to be that where a proprietor for his own convenience has laid a drain or made a water channel, and although other persons and adjoining proprietors have taken advantage of such works for their own convenience, yet their having done so, even for the prescriptive period, does not give them a title as a matter of right to prevent the upper proprietor from taking away the supply by altering the level of his drains or performing other lawful operations on his own lands. See the observations of the Judges in Cruickshanks & Bell v. Henderson, Hume's Decisions, p. 507. It will, however, be time enough should the proprietrix of Lundie proceed to divert the drain, to consider whether or not she is entitled to do so. At present it is not alleged that she intends to do so.

I am accordingly of opinion that no case has been made out for interdict, and that the note ought to be refused.

There are one or two observations which I would like to make in addition to what I have already said. I consider it out of the question for the respondent to maintain, as her counsel did at the proof, that, by having ceased to use the 5-inch tile and the conduit to Dunlappie since 1898, the proprietors of Dunlappie have lost their right to prescribe for the remaining three years which were required to prescribe a right to the supply from the ditch. It is true that since 1898 the 5-inch tile has been shut up and the conduit disused, but this was done under what I have held to be the erroneous but bona fide belief on the part of the complainer that he had obtained a right to substitute his new system and piping for the old water supply, and I think it would be inequitable and unjust that he should be prejudiced by what has been done. Even although the two servitudes were very different from each other in the manner and extent of their exercise, they were alike in this, that they were both rights to a supply of water from Lundie.

Lord Pearson.—I concur.

Lord M'Laren.—I also concur in Lord Ardwall's opinion. The chief point in the case is that while a variation was made in the manner of bringing in the water in the year 1898, we do not look upon that as beginning a new course of prescriptive right. If that were so, the right which was already in course of being acquired would be entirely lost. I think the true principle is that the possession of the original watercourse and of the watercourse as altered when put together amount to forty years complete, and that the complainer is entitled to put them together, but that only to the effect of getting such a supply of water and by such means as he and his predecessors had received for the period of forty years.—16*th November* 1907.

220. Wm. Cory & Sons Limited v. Kopajtic.

Ship—Collision—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60), sects. 418, 419 (4), and 424—Collision Regulations, Articles 15 (e) and 16—Fog—Duty of Ships in Fog—Excessive Speed—Failure to Stop on Hearing Fog Signal Ahead—Improper Manœuvre—Altering Course Before Locating Position of Other Vessel—Vessel Not Under Command—Circumstances in which Held That Vessel was Under Command—Application of Collision Regulations and of Provisions of Merchant Shipping Act, Relating to Collisions, to Foreign Ships Outside British Jurisdiction.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

On 10th February 1907 the steamship "James Joicey" of London and the steamship "Kostrena" of Fiume collided near the Cross Sands off Yarmouth at a point beyond the three-mile limit.

Wm. Cory & Sons Ltd., the owners of the "James Joicey," brought an action of damages against Andrea Kopajtic, the master of the "Kostrena," as representing the ownership of that vessel in this country.

The pursuers averred, inter alia:—

Cond. 3. The collision was caused entirely through the careless navigation of those in charge of the "Kostrena," for whom the defender is responsible. In particular, they failed to go at a moderate rate of speed in the fog, and when the fog signal from the "James Joicey" was heard, apparently forward of their beam, to stop their engines and navigate with caution. They also failed to go full speed astern before the collision, and improperly altered their course before the collision by porting their helm; they also failed to keep a proper look-out, and regularly to give the appropriate fog signals, all in contravention of the regulations for prevention of collisions at sea.

Andrea Kopajtic brought a cross action against Wm. Cory & Sons Ltd. He averred, inter alia:—

The said collision was caused entirely through the fault and unskilful navigation of those in charge of the "James Joicey," and by their failing to observe the regulations for prevention of collisions at sea. . . . The "James Joicey" was in fault (1) in being under way in the fog, having regard to the fact that she was not under command and that there was a large number of steamers in the immediate vicinity; (2) in proceeding at an excessive speed in the fog; (3) in failing to stop her engines, on hearing forward of her beam the fog signals of the "Kostrena," and thereafter to navigate with caution; (4) in failing, on approaching the "Kostrena," to slacken her speed or stop or reverse; (5) in failing to keep a proper look-out; (6) in failing to keep out of the way of the "Kostrena"; and (7) in failing to give the signals provided for by Art. 15 (e) of the said regulations. In contravening the said regulations, the "James Joicey" is, in terms of sect. 419, subsect. 4, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60), deemed to be in fault.

The actions were conjoined. Proof was allowed and led.

The import of the proof sufficiently appears from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

The Merchant Shipping Act (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60) provides:

Sect. 418. (1) Her Majesty may, on the joint recommendation of the Admiralty and the Board of Trade, by Order in Council, make regulations for the prevention of collisions at sea, and may thereby regulate the lights to be carried and exhibited, the fog signals to be carried and used, and the steering and sailing rules to be observed by ships, and those regulations (in this Act referred to as the collision regulations) shall have effect as if enacted in this Act.

(2) The collision regulations, together with the provisions of this part of this Act relating thereto or otherwise relating to collisions, shall be observed by all foreign ships within British jurisdiction, and in any case arising in a British Court concerning matters arising within British jurisdiction, foreign ships shall, so far as respects the collision regulations and the said provisions of this Act, be treated as if they were British ships.

Sect. 419. . . . (4) Where in a case of collision it is proved to the Court before whom the case is tried, that any of the collision regulations have been infringed, the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shewn to the satisfaction of the Court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary.

Sect. 424. Whenever it is made to appear to Her Majesty in Council that the Government of any foreign country is willing that the collision regulations, or the provisions of this part of this Act relating thereto or otherwise relating to collisions or any of those regulations or provisions should apply to the ships of that country when beyond the limits of British jurisdiction, Her Majesty may, by Order in Council, direct that those regulations and provisions shall, subject to any limitation of time, conditions, and qualifications contained in the Order, apply to the ships of the said foreign country, whether within British jurisdiction or not, and that such ships shall for the purpose of such regulations and provisions be treated as if they were British ships.

The Collision Regulations provide:

Art. 15. . . . The words "prolonged blast" used in this Article shall mean a blast of from four to six seconds' duration.

In fog, mist, falling snow or heavy rainstorms, whether by day or night, the signals described in this Article shall be used as follows, viz.:

. . . . . .

(e) A vessel under way, which is unable to get out of the way of an approaching vessel through being not under command, or unable to manœuvre as required by these rules, shall . . . . at intervals of not more than two minutes, sound three blasts in succession, viz. one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts. . . .

Art. 16. Every vessel shall, in a fog, mist, falling snow or heavy rainstorms, go at a moderate speed, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions. . . .

A steam vessel hearing, apparently forward of her beam, the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines, and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over.

It was stated at the Bar that the Government of Austria had adopted the Collision Regulations but not the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act.

On 11th June 1907 the Lord Ordinary found that the collision was caused solely through the fault of those in charge of the "Kostrena."

2ND DIV. Wm. Cory & Sons Ltd. v. Kopajtic.

He added the following Note:—

Lord Salvesen.—These counter actions arise out of a collision which took place on the 10th of February 1907, between the Austrian steamship "Kostrena" and the British steamship "James Joicey." At the time of the collision there was a dense fog. The sea was smooth, and there was a light wind from the south-west. The collision took place some distance north of the Middle Cross Sand Lightship, which is situated off the coast of Norfolk and in a north-easterly direction from Yarmouth. Both vessels were seriously damaged, but the question of liability is the only one which I have to determine at present.

There is a remarkable agreement as to the point of time at which the collision occurred. Roughly speaking, it may be taken that the moment of impact was about twelve o'clock noon on the 10th, which was a Sunday. At that time the fog was so dense that, according to the evidence of those on board the "Kostrena," a vessel could not be seen at a greater distance than four or five hundred yards; while, according to the evidence of the master of the "James Joicey," a vessel could only be seen a hundred yards away. The second officer of the "Kostrena" says that the "James Joicey" only became visible at two to three hundred metres from the "Kostrena"; and probably the truth lies somewhere between his figure and that of the master of the "James Joicey." The fog was therefore of such a character that it was incumbent on both vessels to proceed at a moderate rate of speed, more especially in the locality in question, which is in the direct track of all the traffic passing from Scotland and the Baltic southwards to London and through the English Channel.

The fog had commenced on the evening of the preceding day; and about 9 p.m. the "James Joicey" was in collision with another vessel called the "Syria." In that collision she had her stem from the 13-foot line upwards carried away; and although the damage was somewhat above the waterline, it was so near it that the forward collision compartment soon completely filled. For some time thereafter she was accompanied by the "Syria," but about 2 a.m., as there appeared to be no immediate danger to the "James Joicey," the vessels parted company and the "James Joicey" proceeded on her course. At 9.30 a.m. she passed the Newarp Buoy at so short a distance that the officer in charge was able to see the buoy itself, notwithstanding the continuance of the fog. According to the whole evidence the engines were from that time kept moving dead slow, except for ten minutes between 10.50 and 11, during which they were put to half speed.

After this collision with the "Syria" the "James Joicey" exhibited two red lights, indicating that she was not under command; and next morning the captain had them replaced with two black balls, which constitutes the corresponding day signal. In my opinion this latter signal ought never to have been exhibited. The engines of the "James Joicey" were uninjured, and so was her steering gear. It is true that she was not able to proceed at full speed, and could not therefore manœuvre so rapidly as if she had been uninjured; but there was nothing to prevent her proceeding dead slow or even with her engines at half speed, which according to the expert evidence would give her a movement through the water of about six knots. I was referred on this point to two cases—The "Hawthornbank" [1904], P.D., pp. 120 and 129, and the "P. Caland" [1893], A.C., p. 207. The former was the case of a sailing ship which had been injured by a collision, her foretop mast and head stays with sails and gear having been carried away, and her bows stove in. She had hoisted her lower maintop sail, and was moving through the water at about three knots, and she was held to be not under command although she was being steered in a definite course which she was able to alter, although very slowly. That was a very special case, and the present seems to me to be practically ruled by the decision of the Privy Council in the second case referred to. Here the vessel was able to proceed at five or six knots an hour. She could stop and reverse her engines, which were uninjured; and she could steer, although she would not answer her helm so quickly as when going at a higher speed. A vessel in such circumstances cannot, in my opinion, be described as being "not under command"; and I think the master of the "James Joicey" made a mistake in exhibiting a signal to that effect. Fortunately for her, however, it is not said that the signal in any way misled the "Kostrena," or could have done so looking to the very short period which elapsed from the time that it was seen until the collision. The sounds signal, which in a fog is prescribed with the view of warning vessels that they are in the vicinity of a ship not under command, was not sounded, and strange to say, does not appear even to have been known to the master of the "James Joicey."

As neither vessel had an opportunity of observing the other until the collision was imminent, the evidence as to speeds, courses and navigation must be derived exclusively from the witnesses on board each. There is only one matter with regard to which there is a complete conflict of evidence. According to the "Kostrena," the whistle of the "James Joicey" was heard about three points on her port bow, and before the collision she was seen on the port side crossing at an angle of 45° from port to starboard. The witnesses from the "James Joicey," on the other hand, deponed that the "Kostrena" was on her starboard bow when her whistle was first heard, and that she was seen crossing at a broad angle on a port helm from the starboard to the port side of the "James Joicey." This curious conflict is difficult to explain; but the real evidence enables me to prefer the story of the "James Joicey." The vessels were practically approaching on parallel courses; and I am satisfied, for reasons that I shall afterwards explain, that the "Kostrena" was going at a much higher rate of speed than the "James Joicey." If, therefore, the "Kostrena" ported her helm, as her witnesses say, some short time before the collision, it was impossible that the collision could have occurred, unless the "James Joicey" had previously starboarded and was proceeding at a much higher rate of speed. On the other hand, the collision is amply explained by the "Kostrena" porting her helm when she had the "James Joicey" on her starboard bow. The only evidence for the "Kostrena" that tends to support her case is that given by Captain Tait, who says that, taking the courses of the two vessels described in their logs, the "James Joicey" would pass to the westward of the "Kostrena." The value of that evidence, however, depends on the distance at which the "Kostrena" passed the Middle Cross Sand Lightship, which is a mere matter of estimate, and also on the assumption that the courses of the two vessels were maintained with mathematical accuracy.

The next question is, What were the respective speeds of the two vessels prior to the collision? It is admitted that for an hour the "James Joicey" had been going against the tide, while the "Kostrena" had the tide with her. If, therefore, each vessel had her engines going dead slow, which would represent a speed through the water of three knots, the actual speed over the ground of the "Kostrena" would be much greater than that of the "James Joicey." The only scientific calculation of the strength of the tide during the hour preceding the collision is made by Captain Cowie, who puts it at 2·64 knots per hour. On that assumption the "Kostrena" would be moving at least 5·64 knots as against a speed of ·36 knots for the "James Joicey." Even if the tide was only flowing a knot and a half an hour, as some of the witnesses estimate, the "Kostrena" would still be going at 4½ knots or three times as fast as the "James Joicey." Mr Dickson asked me to hold that the "James Joicey" must have been going at half speed. There is no evidence whatever from which I could draw that inference. The engineer's log book, which is carefully kept, records that for nearly an hour before the collision her engines were kept moving dead slow; and the distance she covered in the previous four hours is entirely consistent with the entries in the log. The Solicitor-General in the same way asked me to hold that the "Kostrena" had her engines moving at half speed. I think I am not at liberty to draw this inference either, and I cannot hold it proved that the "Kostrena" was going at a greater rate of speed over the ground than 5½ or 6 knots. Considering the fog which prevailed, I am of opinion that this was in excess of a moderate speed. It was sought to be justified on the ground that the "Kostrena" would not have steerage way unless she were going at least three knots through the water. I cannot accept that evidence, because cases frequently occur of vessels moving only from one to two knots through the water, and yet having sufficient steerage way to navigate narrow channels. The "Kostrena" was therefore to blame for infringing the first part of Art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The "Kostrena" was also, in my opinion, further to blame for infringing the second paragraph of Art. 16. This paragraph is in the following terms:—"A steam vessel hearing apparently forward of her beam the fog signal of a vessel the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines and then navigate with caution until danger of collision is over." On her own shewing, the "Kostrena" did not observe this regulation. At 11.45 she heard the whistle of a vessel that she now believes to have been the "James Joicey" about three points on her port bow. It was imperative that she should then stop her engines. The reason of the rule, as explained by the Lord Justice-Clerk in the case of "The Warsaw," 1906, 8 F. 1013, is "to give opportunity of accurate observation of sound"; and it is noticeable that according to the engineer's log the "Kostrena" had done this on previous occasions. The excuse suggested for not complying with the rule, that if the "Kostrena" lost steerage way her position might be endangered because of the number of vessels whose signals she heard on all sides, is untenable. The fact that the locality was crowded with shipping made it all the more necessary for the "Kostrena" to observe the rule. It does not, of course, follow that the engines should remain stopped, but I think it may be assumed in this case that if the rule had been complied with the "Kostrena" would in all probability have correctly located the position of the "James Joicey" as on her starboard bow, and not on her port bow; and that she would further have made the collision less likely by having had her way considerably reduced.

It follows from what I have said that the "Kostrena" was still further to blame in porting her helm before she had ascertained the correct position of the approaching vessel. On the theory that that vessel was still three or four points on the "Kostrena's" port bow the manœuvre is unintelligible; although, if the position of the "James Joicey" had been correctly located, it would of course have been harmless. It was this manœuvre which directly led to the collision, and brought the "Kostrena" across the "James Joicey's" bows at an angle variously estimated at from 60 to 90 degrees. The only possible explanation seems to be that the master of the "Kostrena" realised when he heard the second blast from the "James Joicey" that she was not in the position he originally believed, and that for the moment he lost his head.

It is a more difficult question whether the "James Joicey" was also to blame, and no less than seven charges are made against her in Cond. 3, some of which, however, are no longer insisted in. I have already dealt with the first two and the seventh. The fourth, fifth, and sixth are not supported by the evidence; and, as I understood from the counsel for the "Kostrena," were not insisted in. There remains the third charge, which is to the effect that the "James Joicey" was to blame in failing to stop her engines on hearing forward of her port beam the fog signals of the "Kostrena," and thereafter to navigate with caution. This charge rests on a single entry in the mate's log, which puts the time when the "Kostrena's" whistle was heard at 11.50 a.m.; whereas, according to the evidence, the engines were not stopped until a few minutes before the collision. The complete entry is as follows:—"About 11.50 a.m. heard a steamer's whistle on her starboard bow; our engines were stopped, and a whistle was again heard on starboard bow, and almost at the same time a steamer loomed out of the fog." The engineer's log records that the engines were stopped at 11.57, and were put full speed astern at 11.59. Reading these two documents together, it was powerfully argued that the "James Joicey" must be taken to have heard the first whistle of the "Kostrena" on her starboard bow at 11.50, that the engines were not stopped until seven minutes later, and that the collision occurred about 11.59 or 12 o'clock. In my opinion, this is not the only construction of the documents. The mate's log, which records the time of hearing the first whistle as about 11.50, may also be read as implying that the engines were thereafter immediately stopped; and that is what the captain and mate say in their evidence, the only difference being that they place the time when they heard the first blast at 11.54 or 11.55, and put the collision at 11.57, or two or three minutes earlier than the engineer. It is no doubt strange, if the "Kostrena's" whistle was being regularly sounded, that it had not been heard by those on board the "James Joicey." But the onus of proving a breach of a statutory regulation, which raises a presumption of fault, is on the person who alleges it; and, in my opinion, the evidence is insufficient to justify the conclusion which the "Kostrena's" counsel pressed upon me. Even if the "James Joicey" heard the whistle at 11.50, and failed to stop, I do not see how that could have contributed to the collision. Moving, as she was, only from a half to one knot per hour over the ground, she could not have remained stopped for more than a fraction of a minute before she would entirely lose her way; and it is difficult to suggest how she could have been navigated with greater caution than she actually was. I accordingly pronounce the "Kostrena" solely to blame for the collision.

Andrea Kopajtic reclaimed and argued: I. The "Kostrena" was not in fault. (1) Her speed was not excessive. The true test was not speed over the ground but speed through the water (i.e. the rate at which her engines were going) (Marsden's Collisions at Sea, p. 490; "The Resolution," 1889, 6 Asp. Mar. Cas. 363; "The Germanic," Times newspaper, 22nd February 1896). There was a tide of about two and a half knots, and on the Lord Ordinary's figures the "Kostrena's" speed was not excessive. (2) The "Kostrena" was not in fault in not stopping in terms of Art. 16. In view of the large number of ships surrounding her it would have been dangerous to do so. Further the Merchant Shipping Act did not apply to foreign ships outside the three-mile limit (Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60), sects. 418 (2) and 424; Martensen v. Peters, 1906, 8 F.J.C. 93; The "Magnet," 1876, L.R. 4 A. & E. 417; The Queen v. Keyn (the "Franconia"), 1876, L.R. 2 Ex. D. 63; The "Fanny M. Carvill," 1888, L.R. 13 A.C. 455, at p. 460; The "Saxonia," 1862, 15 Moore P.C. 262); and the statutory presumption of fault (Merchant Shipping Act, sect. 419 (4), did not arise). II. The "James Joicey" was in fault. (1) She could not proceed at full speed and she was thus hampered in avoiding other vessels. Therefore she was not under command (The "P. Caland" [1893], A.C. 207; The "Hawthornbank" [1904], p. 120). She was thus in fault (a) in being under way in a fog, and (b) in not giving the signal prescribed by Art. 15 (e). It was for her to shew that this fault did not contribute to the collision (The Merchant Shipping Act sect. 419 (4); The "Duke of Buccleugh," [1891], A.C. 310; The "Arratoon Apcar," 1889, L.R. 15 A.C. 37. The "Warsaw," 1906, 8 F. 1013). (2) Apart from her being not under command, she had proceeded at an excessive speed. (3) It was also proved that she did not stop on hearing the "Kostrena's" whistle (Art. 16). This appeared from the logs, which were the best evidence in this matter (The "Eleanor," 1809, 1 Edwardes 135; Campbell v. Tyson, 1841, 4 D. 342; The "L'Etoile," 1816, 2 Dodson 106; Clyde Shipping Co. Ltd. v. Miller, 1907, 44 S.L.R. 920). (4) Lastly, the "James Joicey" was in fault in starboarding her helm just before the collision.

Argued for Respondents: I. The "Kostrena" was in fault. (1) She had infringed Art. 16 by proceeding at an excessive speed in fog and by not stopping when she heard the "James Joicey's" whistle. She was also in fault in altering her course before she had located the "James Joicey." (The "Warsaw," cit.; The "Resolution," cit.). II. The "James Joicey" was not in fault. She was under command. Her steering gear was unaffected and she could stop and reverse. No doubt she could not go at full speed, but that was not required in fog (Art. 16). She was therefore under command, and was not in breach of Art. 15 (e). It was proved that she went at moderate speed, and that she stopped on hearing the "Kostrena's" whistle. Her starboarding her helm was a proper manœuvre in the circumstances.

The Court adhered.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—We have had a very able debate in this case, and have had very able assistance from the nautical assessor. The conclusion to which I have come, and in which your Lordships concur, is that the decision of the Lord Ordinary is right. As in those cases generally, so in this case, there is a considerable conflict of evidence. I have found myself quite unable to accept the estimate given by the captain of the "Kostrena" as to her distance eastward from the Middle Cross Sand Light when she passed. It is quite certain that she was a great deal nearer than the captain thought, and that if she had not been a great deal nearer, this collision could not possibly have happened whatever the "James Joicey" might have done. That they were approaching one another, the "James Joicey" going southwards towards the Middle Cross Sand Light and the "Kostrena" going northward, and that they were within narrowish limits as regards their courses, I cannot doubt. It is clear that if the "Kostrena" had kept the course her captain says she was keeping she could hardly have got into the position of being on the "James Joicey's" starboard bow. I am not satisfied that she kept that course accurately. I am not well satisfied with the accuracy of the evidence given by those on board the "Kostrena." It seems that this steamer was steered by hand, and steering in the fog the steersman may often have got off his course, and before he got on to it again he might be on a line which, while it looked quite correct, was only parallel with the course originally intended to be steered. That he came up to the eastwards of the Middle Cross Sand Light I have not the slightest doubt. Now when he got a certain distance up he heard the sound of a steamer as he says broadish upon his port bow. That was his belief, and I shall assume that it was his honest belief; but in that he may have been considerably mistaken, and unless he looked at his compass at the very time at which he heard the blast, he could not be certain that at the moment the head of his vessel was exactly on the course which he intended. If so that might make a great difference.

Now, what was his duty when he heard that sound? I think the whole question turns upon this. I think his duty under the regulations plainly was at once to stop his engines until he had located the sound correctly. The regulation ordering the stoppage of a vessel in such circumstances is imperative, being a regulation based entirely upon the necessity of stopping as much as possible all sound on board the vessel in order that those in charge may more accurately locate the sound when they hear it again. The captain of the "Kostrena" did not do that but went on, and in that I think he was distinctly in fault, unless he can put forward circumstances which made it impossible for him to obey the rule. What are the circumstances that he says necessitated his disobeying that rule? They are that there were a number of other vessels there blowing horns. There was no corroboration of that; although there was a special signal given, probably by a fishing boat at anchor. But even if he had heard several other horns blowing round him in different directions, then, wherever they were, there was no reason in the world why he should not stop. By stopping he would not be any the more in danger from these other vessels. And hearing several signals, the duty to stop so as to locate sound correctly was all the more essential. So far as I can see, therefore, we have the "Kostrena" in direct violation of one of the most imperative regulations applicable to foggy weather. Then what happened is, that the captain, without having stopped so as to locate the sound, took it for granted that he had a right to port his helm, and did port his helm; and the case against him is that he should not have altered his course until he had located the vessel, which he certainly had not done. Now then the "Kostrena" is found committing two distinct faults. One was going on without stopping and thereby preventing the locating of the sound, and the other was porting her helm when nothing had been done to ensure correct location.

Now let us turn to the "James Joicey." The "James Joicey" was going south upon a course S. ½ W., having passed close to the North Cross Sand buoy, and her case is that when the "Kostrena" loomed in sight she was on her starboard bow and was upon a port helm. That the "Kostrena" was upon a port helm is true, and that she was upon the "James Joicey's" starboard bow may be taken to be true in the whole circumstances of the case. She stopped her engines, and the order was given to reverse the engines and to starboard the helm. Now the nautical assessor told us that when that order was given the effect of the starboarding action would not take place without some time elapsing—within the time probably that the two vessels might meet. The assessor tells us that so far as the course of the vessel is concerned, if the master of the "James Joicey" did that—reversed his engines and went astern on a starboard helm—the effect would necessarily be the same as if he had ported and gone ahead; and he would be right in reversing his engines and starboarding if the other vessel was going to starboard upon a port helm, seeing that the starboarding of the helm when the vessel was going astern would produce the same effect as porting the helm when going ahead. Up to this point I can see no fault that can be attributed to the "James Joicey." But then it is argued that the "James Joicey" was in fault in respect that she did not give the signal for a vessel not under control. I am not satisfied from all that we have learned that she was a vessel not under control. The only thing that was in question as to whether she was under control or not was the effect of the injuries to her in a previous collision, resulting in water coming in at the bows and setting her down forward so that she could not steer. But the fact is, that she could steer and did steer. But then, it is said further, that she was giving signals in daylight and at night which indicated that she was a vessel not under control. That, of course, would be prudent on the part of the master of a vessel not under control even in degree; but we must hold, on the advice we have received, that she was a vessel under control—that is to say, she was under control at the speed at which she could move, and in the circumstances was quite capable of doing what another vessel could do in the case of an emergency. No doubt it was not a high speed; a high speed could never have been attained in her state, and would have been wrong even if possible, as she was in fog; but going at this slow speed she was under control. We were referred to the case of the "P. Caland," in which Lord Herschell gave an opinion, and in which the vessel in question was a great deal more out of control than the vessel in this case. There it was held that it could not be said reasonably that the vessel was out of control. Even if it were otherwise, and the question was whether she might have misled the "Kostrena" by not giving the signal that she was not under control, that question would resolve itself into this, Did that in any way contribute to what happened? In my opinion it did not, because what the "Kostrena" had to do according to the regulations, and knowing that a steamer was there, was to stop and wait until she could locate its position. The purpose of the stopping is for location, and she should have stopped and located the other vessel, and that was an absolute duty on the part of the master, whether the other vessel was a vessel under control or a vessel not under control. Therefore I come to the conclusion that the Lord Ordinary is right in holding that the "James Joicey" was not to blame for what occurred. There is another point to which I need to refer, and that is the question whether the regulations in the circumstances apply to a foreign vessel. I can only say this, I never heard of that question being raised before. We had a case of exactly the same kind as this in this Division and the point was not raised; and there was also a case in England in which it was not raised. In these circumstances I do not think we are called upon to decide any such question, nor do I think it would affect the decision in this case, because I am clearly of opinion that the "Kostrena" was to blame by taking the wrong course. What she did was essentially bad seamanship.

I would therefore move your Lordships to adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Low concurred.

Lord Ardwall.—I am of the same opinion. The "Kostrena" was undoubtedly in fault. The first and very serious fault on her part was that she did not comply with Art. 16 of the regulations as soon as she heard the fog signal of the other vessel in a position which she had not ascertained. The imperative requisition in Art. 16 is that "a steam vessel hearing apparently forward of her beam the fog signal of a vessel, the position of which is not ascertained, shall, so far as the circumstances of the case admit, stop her engines and then navigate with caution until the danger of collision is over." It is unquestionable, according to the evidence of those on board of the "Kostrena" herself, that she did not stop. Of course, the object of stopping in such a case is to locate the sound so as to find the position of the other vessel. She cannot locate the sound well until her engines are stopped. As was pointed out in the passage read from the Lord Justice-Clerk's opinion in the case of the "Warsaw," the object of a vessel stopping in these circumstances is that those on board should be freed from the noise of her own engines and of rushing through the water so as to be able to distinguish by the sounds made by the other vessel the direction and distance from which they come. Now, the "Kostrena" failed to stop her engines. The only excuse given for that failure is that there were a great number of steamers about; but the evidence shows that that really was no excuse at all. The second mistake which the "Kostrena" made was that she improperly ported her helm. That raises the question of the position in which these two ships approached each other. We have had the advantage of a consultation with the nautical assessor, and he is of opinion that taking the courses that the vessels were on, the "Kostrena" must have had the "James Joicey" not on her port bow but upon her starboard bow. Of course, the "Kostrena" must have been very much further to the west than we are led to suppose from the evidence, but in the circumstances the "Kostrena" might easily have got inshore of the course of the "James Joicey" owing to her shifting her course, to avoid vessels, and owing perhaps to the tidal currents. It is absolutely certain that if she had not been inshore of the course of the "James Joicey" just before the collision, the two courses never could or would have crossed each other. I must hold that somehow or other the "Kostrena" must have got inshore of the course of the "James Joicey," and therefore, when she approached the point where the courses were to cross each other, she must have had the "James Joicey" on her starboard bow. Now, in that state of matters it was a wrong manœuvre on the part of the "Kostrena" to port her helm and thereby run straight across the bows of the "James Joicey." With regard to her excessive speed, which is the third fault charged against the "Kostrena," that is shown by the nature and direction of the injuries inflicted on the two ships by the collision, and I am satisfied that although the speed may not have been very great, yet it was a speed greater than she should have been proceeding at through fog. With regard to the "James Joicey," the first point made against her is that she did not stop when she heard the whistle of the "Kostrena," and that is founded upon the entries of the time in the mate's log. I agree with what was said by your Lordship in the chair in the course of the discussion, that the mate's log must not be read too literally or strictly in a case of this sort. At that moment when the whistle sounded those in command of the "James Joicey" were all concerned with trying to escape from a collision, and I have no doubt that the log was written afterwards, for the simple reason that it could not be written up at the time when the mate was on the bridge. On the other hand, the engineer's log is in a totally different position. The engineer is in the engine room, and when he gets a signal from the bridge he looks at the clock, and after he has carried out the order he marks down the very moment that the telegraph rang, so that it is a record which, unless it can be clearly shewn that it was written up afterwards, is a record of the highest importance and is most reliable. I am therefore of opinion on the best evidence we have, and comparing it with the other evidence in the case, that the "James Joicey" did stop when she heard the fog signal of the other vessel. It is said that she manœuvred improperly by starboarding her helm and reversing her engines. The order to starboard and the order to reverse are two distinct orders given at the same time, one to the man at the wheel by word of mouth, and the other to the engineer by the telegraph. These orders were proper in the circumstances and did not contribute to the collision; on the contrary, they tended to lessen the risk of collision, and mitigated, so far as was possible, the force with which the vessels collided. The evidence as to speed shews that the "James Joicey" was not being navigated at too great a speed in the fog. There is a fourth point of blame brought against the "James Joicey," and that is that she failed to comply with Art. 15 (e) of the regulations in not giving one prolonged blast followed by two short blasts. The first thing to be said about that is that it is really irrelevant to the present case, because it cannot be said that those on board the "Kostrena," who did not stop under Art. 16 when they heard the ordinary foghorn, would have stopped if they had heard this other signal. But apart from that altogether, I consider that this ship, the "James Joicey," could not well be regarded as a ship not under command. It is true that it is a duty to put up or give by sound a signal appropriate to a ship not under command; but whatever may be said about that in ordinary circumstances it is clear that it did not matter here, because the ship was going at a low speed, and that at that low speed she was quite under command. In short, the fact of the matter was that the "James Joicey" was practically reduced from an eight or a nine knot vessel to a four knot vessel by reason of the fact that it would be dangerous to force her through the water at great speed. At the slower speed she was quite under command, and as that speed was the proper speed in going through fog the master was not required to sound the number of whistle signals prescribed by Art. 15 (e). Accordingly, I think that the charges put forward against the "James Joicey" have broken down, and that for the reasons I have already mentioned the "Kostrena" was alone to blame.—27*th November* 1907.

Reclaiming Note against Interlocutor of Lord Ardwall.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIII. p. 404; Vol. XIV. pp. 57 and 686.)

This was an action brought by Alexander Davidson, senior, and Alexander Davidson, junior, farmers, Whitton, in the county of Roxburgh, against Abraham Logan of Whitton, to obtain reduction of certain awards issued by arbiters. The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the previous reports and from the judgment of Lord Low.

On 22nd January 1907 the Lord Ordinary granted decree of reduction.

The Defender reclaimed, and argued: The Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that at common law the landlord was bound to put the fences into such a condition that they would last from entry to ish (Ersk., II. vi. 3; Bank., I. xx. 10, II. ix. 21; Hunter, Landlord and Tenant, 4th ed., II. 219, 220; Haining & Douglas v. Grierson, 1807, Hume 829; Mossman v. Brocket, 1810, Hume 850). Under the lease the defender was bound to put the fences into "good order"—i.e. into such a condition that they would last from entry to ish. But under the submission the question sent to the arbiters was: What sum was required to put the fences into "tenantable condition"? That meant the condition in which an outgoing tenant was bound to leave the fences. No doubt, if the operative clause of the deed were ambiguous, it should be construed in the light of the narrative clause (Orr v. Mitchell, 1893, 20 R. (H.L.) 27, rev. 19 R. 700). But here the meaning of the operative clause was clear, and the narrative was ambiguous. If the defender's construction of the submission were right the award must stand, because the arbiters had decided the question submitted to them, and it was no objection that their decision was wrong (Holmes Oil Co. Ltd. v. Pumpherston Oil Co.

Davidsons v. Logan.

Ltd., 1891, 18 R. (H.L.) 52; Caledonian Railway Co. v. Turcan, 1898, 25 R. (H.L.) 7; Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co. v. Main, 1895, 22 R. 912; Glasgow City and District Railway Co. v. MacGeorge, Cowan & Galloway, 1886, 13 R. 609). Further, the objection that the arbiters had considered the wrong question was not stated on record. The cases cited by the Lord Ordinary (Mackay & Son v. Leven Police Commissioners, 1893, 20 R. 1093; Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., 1890, 18 R. (H.L.) 1; Alexander v. Bridge of Allan Water Co., 1869, 7 M. 492) no doubt shewed that the construction of the submission was for the Court, but that was not disputed. (2) The award was not invalid on the ground of informality. This was not a case of a formal arbitration, but of a valuation. It was not necessary, because it was proved not to be customary, in the district, to have a written nomination of an oversman, or a formal devolution on him. Lang v. Brown (1855, 2 Macq. 95) and Frederick v. Maitland (1866, 3 M. 1069) were distinguishable, being cases of formal arbitrations where no special custom was proved. But in truth the award was the judgment of the arbiters, the oversman's signature being adhibited only to prove that he was present. The parties had therefore got the decision of the tribunal for which they had stipulated and the award must stand (Nivison v. Howat, 1883, 11 R. 182; Hope v. Crookston Brothers, 1890, 17 R. 868).

Argued for the Pursuers: The phrase "tenantable condition" might mean (1) the condition into which the landlord was bound to put the fences in a question with an incoming tenant; (2) the condition in which an outgoing tenant was bound to leave the fences in a question with the landlord. These two things were materially different (Mossman v. Brocket, cit.), because the tenant was not bound to make good damage resulting from tear and wear (Bell, Leases, I. 238; Rankine on Leases, 232; Johnstone v. Hughan, 1894, 21 R. 777), or from inevitable accident (Bell, Prin., section 1253). Further, it was proved that these two distinct meanings of the term "tenantable condition" were recognised by local custom, and local custom must be taken into account (Hunter, Landlord and Tenant, II. 239; Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 1 Smith L.C. 545). Accordingly the phrase "tenantable condition" in the operative clause of the submission was ambiguous, and fell to be construed in the light of the narrative clause. The narrative clause made it plain that the question submitted to the arbiters was: What sum of money was required to fulfil the landlord's obligation under the lease to put the fences into a condition which would satisfy the claims of an incoming tenant? It was proved by the evidence of the arbiters that the question which they decided was: What sum was necessary to put the fences into such a condition as would satisfy the landlord's claim against an outgoing tenant? This evidence was competent, because, while it was not competent to examine an arbiter as to the method by which he arrived at his award, it was competent to ask him what was the question which he decided (Duke of Buccleugh v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 1872, L.R. 5 H.L. 418; In re Dare Valley Railway Co., 1868, L.R. 6 Eq. 429). The arbiters, therefore, had not decided the question submitted to them, and the award was invalid (Glasgow City and District Railway Co. v. M'George, Cowan & Galloway, cit.; Alexander v. Bridge of Allan Water Co., cit.; Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., cit.; Holmes Oil Co. v. Pumpherston Oil Co., cit.; Lanarkshire and Dumbartonshire Railway Co. v. Main, cit., per Lord Low). The fact that this ground of challenge was not tabled on record was immaterial, because that matter was within the knowledge of the arbiters and was not within the knowledge of the pursuers (Bile Beans Manufacturing Co. Ltd. v. Davidson, 1906, 8 F. 1181). (2) The award was also invalid in respect that there had been no written appointment of an oversman and no devolution on him (Frederick v. Maitland, cit.; Lang v. Brown, cit.). No doubt the award would not be invalidated by reason of the fact that the oversman had gone with the arbiters to value the subjects, or even, possibly, by the fact that he had signed the award. But here the award bore to be the award of the arbiters and the oversman, and was invalid as being the award of a tribunal which the submission had not set up. Parole evidence for the purpose of shewing that the award was the award of the arbiters alone was incompetent, because it would contradict the award (Miller & Son v. Oliver & Boyd, 1903, 6 F. 77; Duke of Buccleugh v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 1872, L.R. 5 H.L. 418 at p. 434). Nivison v. Howat (cit.) and Hope v. Crookston Brothers (cit.) were distinguishable.

The Court adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and found the pursuers entitled to additional expenses.

Lord Low.—The Lord Ordinary has reduced the awards of the arbiters which are challenged in this case upon two grounds: first, that they did not determine the question which was submitted to them, but dealt with another question; and secondly, that the awards bear to be the awards of the arbiters and oversman, and are signed by the oversman as well as the arbiters, although the arbiters were agreed upon their award and the matter was never devolved upon the oversman.

In regard to the first of these grounds of reduction, I am of the same opinion as the Lord Ordinary. The submission arose in this way. By lease executed in February 1904 the defender Mr Logan let the farm of Whitton in Roxburghshire, of which he is proprietor, to the pursuers for a period of nineteen years from Whitsunday 1904, with breaks in favour of either party at Whitsunday 1914 and Whitsunday 1919. Mr Logan had, prior to the pursuer's entry, farmed Whitton himself, and he was therefore both outgoing tenant and landlord. By the lease the pursuers bound themselves to take over the dung upon the farm, the waygoing crop of 1904, and certain plant, machinery, and house fittings, at a valuation, and they also agreed "to accept of the whole houses and buildings, with the water supply thereto, and pipes and connections thereof, roads, drains, ditches, dykes and fences on the said farm, when the same have been put into good order, and the alterations and additions upon the steading made as arranged, as being in tenantable order and condition."

In April 1904 a submission was prepared, apparently upon Mr Logan's instructions, whereby he and the pursuer submitted to the determination of two arbiters mutually chosen, and in case of their differing in opinion, to an oversman to be chosen by them, in the first place the amount to be paid by the pursuers for the dung and other things which by the lease they were bound to take over at valuation, and in the second place "the sums payable by me the said Abraham Logan to us the said Alexander Davidson, senior, and Alexander Davidson, junior, in respect of any houses and buildings, with the water supply thereto, pipes and connections thereof, roads, drains, ditches, dykes and fences on the said farm, not being in tenantable condition and repair as at the entry thereto of us the second parties."

The matter submitted to the arbiters in the second place involved, in any view, a departure from the terms of the lease, because it substituted for the landlord's obligation to put the houses, fences, and so on in good order, a payment by him to the tenants of the sums required to put these subjects into tenantable condition and repair. It appears that that alteration in the nature of the landlord's obligation had not, prior to the preparation of the submission, been arranged between him and the pursuers, but the latter took no objection to the alteration, and executed the submission.

The pursuers' contention is that what was referred to the arbiters was to estimate the amount which it would cost Mr Logan, as landlord, to put the buildings, fences, and the like in good order as stipulated in the lease. What the arbiters did, however, was to estimate the amount which it would have cost Mr Logan as outgoing tenant to put the subjects into tenantable condition and repair as at the termination of a lease, and it was argued for Mr Logan that they were right upon a sound construction of the submission, in making their estimate upon that footing.

Now, it seems to me not to be open to question that the obligation undertaken by Mr Logan in the lease to put the buildings and fences into good order, was undertaken by him as landlord, and not as outgoing tenant; and I think that it is equally plain that the intention of the parties to the submission was that the arbiter should determine the amount of money required to fulfil that obligation.

The difference in phraseology between the narrative of the submission and the operative clause which formulated the question which the arbiters were to determine, was founded on by Mr Logan's counsel, who argued that the words in the latter clause—"tenantable condition and repair"—were invariably used to designate, and were recognised as meaning the condition and state of repair in which an outgoing tenant was bound to leave buildings and fences at the termination of his lease, and were therefore not open to construction, and could not be modified or controlled in any way by reference to the narrative.

I am of opinion that that argument is not well founded. It is beyond dispute that the obligation which lies upon a landlord at common law to put buildings and fences at the commencement of a lease in tenantable condition and repair, involves more and is more onerous than the obligation which lies upon the tenant to leave these subjects in like condition and repair at the end of the lease. To take one example out of many which might be given:—If a fence were, at the beginning of a lease, worn out, so that it was no longer capable of being repaired, the landlord would be bound to renew it, but no such obligation would rest upon a tenant at the end of a lease, because he is not responsible for the effects of inevitable wear and tear, and is not bound to renew what, from that cause, has become worn out. It was therefore essential, in the present case, that the arbiters should know whether the obligation upon which they were to put a money value was the obligation of a landlord at the beginning of a lease, or of an outgoing tenant at the end of a lease. I should have thought that no one could have read the submission without seeing that it was the landlord's obligation which was in question, because the submission itself recites the clause in the lease in regard to the condition of the buildings and fences, and the landlord states that he has agreed to pay such sum as the arbiters shall fix in respect of any buildings and fences not being in the stipulated condition.

It was said that the use of the words "good order" in the narrative, and of the words "tenantable condition and repair" in the operative clause indicated that what was actually submitted to the arbiters was something different from what was referred to in the narrative, or at all events that the question submitted was more accurately expressed in the operative clause, in either of which cases the latter clause must

Davidsons v. Logan.
Lord Low.

rule. I do not think that there is any real inconsistency between the narrative and the operative clauses. In the first place, I am inclined to think that a landlord's obligation to put buildings and fences into "tenantable condition and repair" at the beginning of a lease, is substantially equivalent to an obligation to put them into good order, because I cannot imagine such subjects being in "tenantable condition and repair," when intended to serve the purposes of a lease for (say) nineteen years, unless they were in good order. But however that may be, the clause in the lease, which is recited in the submission, shews that in the present case the expression "tenantable condition and repair" was equivalent to "good order," because the tenants bound themselves to accept the buildings and fences "when the same have been put in good order," as being in tenantable condition and repair.

It therefore seems to me to be clear that what was referred to the arbiters was to estimate the amount which would be required to implement the obligation undertaken by the landlord to put the buildings and fences at the beginning of the lease in the condition stipulated by the lease. Therefore, as the arbiters have frankly admitted that what they estimated was the amount which an outgoing tenant would require to expend in order to fulfil his obligation to leave the subjects in tenantable condition and repair at the end of his lease, I am of opinion that the award cannot stand, because the arbiters have not determined the question submitted to them, but another question altogether.

It was, however, argued for Mr Logan that the pursuers were not entitled to decree of reduction upon that ground, because they have neither averred nor pleaded it. I agree with the Lord Ordinary that that contention cannot be sustained. I can very well understand that it never occurred to the pursuers that the arbiters had entirely misapprehended the question which was put to them, and the defences do not disclose that what the arbiters had dealt with was the obligation of the outgoing tenant. But that state of the pleadings cannot prevent justice being done between the parties, because, whenever the arbiters admitted that they had not dealt with the question referred to them, there was, in my judgment, an end of the case. Further, the alleged defect in the pleadings could even now be put right by an amendment of the record, but I do not think that in the circumstances that formality is necessary.

In regard to the second ground upon which the Lord Ordinary has held the awards to be liable to reduction, I have felt some difficulty. I entirely assent to the view that in agricultural arbitrations, where the question is the value of such things as a way-going crop or the dung upon a farm, and where the arbiters are chosen because their experience in such matters enables them, by inspecting the subjects, to fix the value, it is desirable that there should be as few formalities as possible. Further I think that in such arbitrations mere irregularities will not vitiate an award even if they are of a kind which would be fatal in other classes of submissions where the duties of the arbiters are more of a judicial character.

In this case the submission was not one purely for valuation, because the arbiters had to fix the amount which would be required to enable the landlord to implement his obligation to put the buildings and fences into good order. No doubt the arbiters might be expected to be able to determine by their own inspection what required to be done, but I think that the probability is that they would further require to call in the aid of tradesmen to advise them as to the cost of such repairs and renewals as they might deem to be necessary.

Still the submission was substantially one for valuation, and in such a case, if it appeared that the parties had obtained the honest opinion of the gentlemen selected upon the questions submitted to them, I should not regard mere irregularities of procedure as being sufficient to nullify the award.

In the present case there is only one matter which has occasioned me difficulty, and that is the fact that the awards under reduction, bear to be the awards of "the arbiters and oversman." I have great difficulty in regarding that as a mere irregularity or informality. In the case of Lang v. Brown (1855, 2 M.Q. 93), Lord Chancellor Cranworth laid it down very emphatically that when an award is challenged the question always is whether it is one which the parties agreed should be binding on them. Now in this case the parties agreed to abide by the award of the two arbiters mutually chosen, or in the case of their differing in opinion, of an oversman, but they never agreed to accept a joint award of the arbiters and the oversman. It therefore seems to me that the matter is one of substance and not merely of form.

It is true that in this case the arbiters were agreed; and apparently the oversman (who quite properly had accompanied the arbiters when they inspected the subjects) was made a party to the award and signed it, simply to indicate that he approved of the conclusion at which the arbiters had arrived. But that that was the position of matters could not be discovered from the award itself. For anything that appears to the contrary in the award the arbiters might not have agreed, but might have called in the oversman to settle their differences and then issued an award jointly with him. If that had been what actually occurred, I think that there could be no doubt that the award would have been bad, and, in any view, I have difficulty in reconciling myself to the idea that a written award which bears to be a joint award can be proved by general evidence to be an award by the arbiters only, with in addition an irregular, ineffective, and unnecessary concurrence by the oversman.

The case of Hope v. Crookston Brothers (1890, 17 R. 865) was founded on. In that case a joint award by the arbiters and the oversman was sustained. The parties, however, had agreed that any disputes in regard to a contract for the sale and purchase of hay should be settled by arbitration in Liverpool "in the usual way," and it was proved that the course which had been followed was according to the custom in Liverpool.

If in the present case it had been proved to be the recognised custom in Roxburghshire, in agricultural arbitrations, where the oversman has accompanied the arbiters when inspecting the subjects, for a joint award to be issued by the arbiters and oversman, the question would have been very different, but although there is evidence that that course is sometimes adopted no such general custom is established.

I therefore agree with the Lord Ordinary that the awards, bearing as they do to be joint awards of arbiters and oversman, cannot be sustained.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I concur with Lord Low in the main ground of judgment which he proposes. I think that not only is the common law obligation of a landlord at the commencement of a lease to put the buildings and fences on the farm into "tenantable condition and repair" (which, of course, could be altered by express contract) equivalent to an obligation to put these into good order, but I think that the lease itself in the present case makes it clear that this was the thing submitted to arbitration, because the tenants bound themselves to accept the buildings and fences as being in tenantable condition and repair only "when the same had been put into good order." And as this was (confessedly) not what the arbiters did, I agree that their awards, so far as challenged, cannot stand.

But I do not think that we can avoid, if only as affecting the matter of expenses, the duty of forming and expressing some opinion on the technical grounds of reduction to which also the Lord Ordinary has given effect. It would have been enough, no doubt, for the pursuers to rely solely on the ground that the arbiters had mistaken the nature of the thing submitted. But they did not choose to do so. On the contrary, they chose to state every ground, good and bad, on which the awards could be attacked. On some of these points (I think on most of them) the Lord Ordinary is against them. In particular, he holds that the parties, by acquiescing in the arbiters acting without written acceptances, are barred from reducing the submission on the ground that there were no written acceptances. He also expresses the opinion that the arbiters and oversman acted quite rightly in proceeding together to make the inspections, and he gives very good reasons why any other mode of procedure would be quite unworkable. Further, in view of the fact established at the proof, that there was never any devolution upon the oversman, nor any necessity for such devolution, for the simple reason that the arbiters were agreed, his Lordship really comes to the conclusion that the objection founded on there being no devolution in writing, although the oversman signed the awards, had no substance in it. The Lord Ordinary no doubt states his opinion that wherever there is a formal written submission the nomination of both arbiters and oversman ought to be in writing. But that seems to me to be attaching far too much weight to mere matters of formality and procedure, at all events in rural arbitrations, which truly partake much more of the nature of valuations, between which and regular arbitrations our Courts have always drawn a broad distinction (see, e.g., the case of M'Gregor v. Stevenson, 1847, 9 D. 1056). Indeed I claim the first part of the Lord Ordinary's opinion as really negativing the idea that these awards ought to be reduced on any ground except the substantial one on which Lord Low has proceeded. Be that as it may, my own opinion is that there is no ground for reducing these awards on any of what may be called the technical grounds. It was because the Second Division, as constituted on 25th May 1906, thought that the Lord Ordinary had erred in accepting these technical objections as sufficient to justify reductions de plano that we recalled his Lordship's interlocutor and remitted to him to allow a proof before answer. The proof thus taken has of course been considerably lengthened by the pursuer's insisting upon these formal objections, and even adding to their number. In the result it seems to me to have been shewn that there was no substance in the technical grounds, although it has also disclosed that there was a real and sufficient ground for reducing some of the awards, because the arbiters had not applied their minds to the sum which was necessary to put the fences, etc. into good order.

I should therefore have been in favour of limiting our judgment to what I consider the true ground, and if your Lordships had agreed with me, of marking our sense of the pursuer's failure to establish his technical objections by modifying the expenses to which he is to be found entitled.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur with both your Lordships that the so-called award in this case cannot stand. But upon the technical questions as to the procedure of the arbiters and oversman, and which can only affect the question of expenses, I agree with the views expressed by Lord Low. I entirely assent to the general view that submissions such as this, which relate to farming matters, are not to be too strictly dealt with as regards procedure. But relaxation of rules of sound procedure must not be carried too far. Where only detail matters are concerned, mere technicalities may be held not sufficient ground for setting aside an award, evidently fairly arrived at. But the difficulty in this case is that the irregularities which took place make it plain that the party complaining of the procedure did not get the benefit in the arbitration of what was stipulated for, viz. that in the event of the arbiters differing, he was entitled to the decision of the oversman. He was entitled to know the fact whether the arbiters differed, and whether they referred the matter on that ground, and to consider whether he should ask the oversman to hear him or bring matters before him for consideration. Now the case as it presents itself to us indicates, if anything, that the award was an award made both by the arbiters and the oversman in conjunction, or in the form of one of the deliverances, an award by one arbiter and the oversman. Such awards presented to a party could give him no certainty as to what had been done, whether the arbiters had considered the case and had differed, and therefore had devolved the matter upon the oversman, or whether the oversman had never had any devolution made to him, but had proceeded without any such devolution to take part in disposing of the matters in dispute. It seems to me that the objection to such procedure is substantial. I cannot hold that the party to the arbitration, who felt aggrieved by the so-called award, can without injustice be put in the position of having to accept an award as to which it does not appear that the procedure was truly the procedure contemplated by him in entering into the arbitration as shewn by the terms of the submission. I have only to say further that I do not think that the case of Hope has any bearing on this case. It proceeded on custom of a port. That overruled any ordinary law applicable to such a case. Here there is no ground shewn for dealing with the matter on any other footing than that the law must be applied, there being nothing to shew any distinct custom which could justify a decision not in accordance with the legal principles applicable in the circumstances of the case. —29*th November* 1907.

222. Hunter's Executrix v. General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Limited.

Insurance—Accident—Coupon Insurance Policy — Conditions of Policy — Period Covered by Policy One Year From Date of Registration—Date of Registration When No Proper Register Kept—Offer and Acceptance—Coupon Policy Not Registered Till Fully Marked and Filed by Company and Acceptance Issued—Cause of Claim Emerging Within One Year of Registration —Conditions as to Intimation of Claim Referable to General Condition as to Period Insured.

This was an action by the Executrix of a person who held an accident coupon insurance policy with the defending Company for payment of a sum due under the policy in consequence of the death by accident of the assured. The facts of this case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

Lord Johnston. — The late Adam Turnbull Hunter, of Hawick was injured in the Elliot Junction railway accident on 28th December, and he died from the injuries received on the following day, 29th December 1906. He held a coupon insurance policy of the General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Ltd., and notice of his injuries and death was given to the Company by Mr Hunter's executrix on 2nd January 1907, the notice being received by the Company on the following day at their head office in Perth. The Company have denied liability, on the ground that the deceased's insurance with them had expired before the accident to him occurred; and separatim, that the claim on his behalf was not timeously made. The executrix now sues the Company for the £1000 contained in the coupon insurance policy.

The method of insurance by this Company is peculiar, and requires for the determination of this case very minute attention to details. What the Company term its coupon insurance policy is not always in the same form; but though they do not make it clear, as do other forms which were shewn me, what these premiums charged for the various risks undertaken were, I confine my attention to Nos. 13 and 19 of process, which were originally in one piece—the former being retained by the insured and the latter sent by him to the Company. The Company, besides issuing what they call their coupon insurance policies direct, issue them through, inter alios, Messrs Charles Letts & Co., the publishers of a well-known diary. The document, of which Nos. 13 and 19 of process before they were separated was a specimen, is inserted in each copy of Messrs Letts & Co.'s Diary, and represents to the purchaser of the Diary that the Company will insure him on certain terms and conditions against death from railway accident. I cannot agree with the learned Solicitor-General that this document is an offer by the Company, which becomes a contract the moment the request for registration, to be immediately referred to, is received by the Company. With all the favour in the world for mercantile bargains and even rustic transactions, I conceive that the law expects something in the way of authentication to make a document a binding part of such transaction, and will not receive a mere leaflet, containing no signature or pretence of signature, scattered broadcast, like an advertisement, which indeed it is, over the country as an obligatory document.

No. 13 of process, which I shall term the coupon, sets forth, reading it short, that £1000 will be paid, under the following conditions, by the Company to the representative of any person killed or fatally injured in a railway accident while travelling as an ordinary paying passenger, "should death result within three calendar months after such accident." And the following conditions above referred to are there stated:— "Provided (1) that at the time of such accident the person so killed or injured was the owner of the publication in which the insurance coupon is inserted; (2) that such person had duly caused his or her name to be registered at the Head Office of the Corporation in Perth; (3) had paid the fee for registration and cost of acknowledgment; (4) that notice of claim is sent to the Registered Office of the Corporation at Perth within fourteen days of the occurrence of the accident; and (5) that such claim be made within twelve months of the registration of the holder's name." The numbers indicating the several conditions are mine.

Appended to this coupon was the counterfoil No. 6 of process, entitled Form of Application for Registration, to be detached and forwarded in a closed envelope to the Insurance Company, and then follow these words—"To the General Accident Assurance Corporation Ltd., General Buildings, Perth, N.B.

"In accordance with the terms of the insurance coupon to which this is attached I request you to register my name as below, for which purpose, and also to cover cost of acknowledgment, I enclose remittance, value . . . ." the value to be inserted varying with the particular risk desired to be covered. There then follow spaces for the signature, address and designation of the applicant, and for the date of the signature. In my opinion this form of intimation, or request for registration, are in law the offer or first part of the contract, and the Company have got to do something in the way of acceptance to make the contract complete. Possibly registration of the applicant's name might be sufficient, and certainly the acknowledgment, or intimation of registration which they are in use to send, would be sufficient.

One of the principal difficulties in the present case is to determine what the Company mean by registration, and whether indeed anything which they do can legitimately bear that name. To clear up the Company's practice in general, and to ascertain what was done in Mr Hunter's case in particular, the parties have agreed, by joint minute, on certain facts, and supplemented these by a short proof.

The practice of the Company is as follows:— On receiving a counterfoil, or form of application, for registration at their office in Perth, either over the counter or by post, it is the duty of a clerk to stamp it with an indiarubber stamp bearing the amount of the remittance or premium, and the date of the document being received. To facilitate this stamping the counterfoils are sorted into bundles according to the remittance, whether 2d., 6d. or 1s. At the close of the same day the gross number of counterfoils of each class received are entered in the respective columns on one line of the Account Book No. 16 of process; the gross number of counterfoils of all grades is entered in the next column, and the amount of money received in remittance or premiums is entered in the last. I do not think that on any conceivable view can this book be termed a register. The entries are in gross, and not in detail, and the object is not to record the insurances, but to record the cash received during the day; and as a check upon the correctness of the cash, the gross number of the insurances of each grade producing the cash are inserted.

So far, the evidence is clear as to the Company's practice, but in what follows there is indefiniteness, because there is irregularity, owing to the business being of an irregular or spasmodic character; and in one important point the evidence is unsatisfactory, notwithstanding the pains taken by counsel to come to an agreement about facts.

What follows, though in what order is not made certain, is (1) the marking on the counterfoil of a running number; (2) the acknowledgment of which No. 21 of process is a blank form, and No. 7 of process that sent to Mr Hunter; and (3) the filing in alphabetical order of the counterfoils in small bundles of 50 or 100, according to circumstances, of which bundles No. 22 of process is an example. As to these bundles there is this to be noted—as they are arranged alphabetically, it follows that they are not in the order of these running numbers, and as the counterfoils come in irregularly, it depends on the supply how many days are included in a particular bundle. For instance, No. 22 of process contains the letter

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Johnston.

Hunter's Executrix v. General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corporation Ltd.

"A" for 27th and 28th December 1905, but when it was made up nobody knows.

From a consideration of the above, taken in connection with the presumption from circumstances, I conclude, for it is not definitely proved, that the running number is only put on the counterfoil at the same time as the acknowledgment which refers to it is filled up, and that the filing in bundles is the last operation. From a comparison of Nos. 21 and 7 of process it is apparent that the acknowledgment form has not the running number on it when blank, but that the running number is put on by some method of consecutive printing, when the acknowledgment is being filled up. Further, I conclude that when the date stamp is impressed on the day of receipt upon the counterfoil the running number is put on, the acknowledgment filled up and despatched, and the counterfoil filed at no definite interval or intervals after receipt of the request for registration.

To take Mr Hunter's case as a particular example:—He bought his Letts' Diary on or before Christmas Day 1905. He filled up and posted the counterfoil on 25th December. It was admittedly received at the Company's office in Perth on 26th December. As the Company kept the 26th as well as the 25th as a holiday, it was not opened till 27th, and on that day was impressed with the stamp $\frac{\text{6d.}}{\text{27th Dec. 1905}}$. It is not definitely proved when it received its running number, etc. But I must assume that it was numbered $\frac{\text{LC}}{2}$ 7727 (which means $\frac{\textit{Letts' Continental}}{\text{2nd year}}$, number 7727) on 29th December 1905, the day on which the acknowledgment No. 7 of process was filled up. Though filled up on 27th December this acknowledgment was not forwarded, for a special but insufficient reason, until the 3rd of January 1906, accompanied by an explanatory letter No. 14 of process.

It will be apparent that as the accident occurred on 28th December 1906, much depends on the date of registration. If the date of registration be held to be the 29th December 1905, as maintained by the learned Solicitor-General, the accident would have occurred more than twelve months from the date of registration. If the date of registration be held to be 29th December 1905 or any later date, then the accident would have occurred before the expiry of twelve months from the date of registration.

I asked the learned Solicitor-General what was the Company's register, and he candidly admitted that they had none, and, looking to the nature of the business, could not afford to have one, but he maintained that registration in the sense of the Company's practice was the act of stamping the counterfoil with the date of receipt, and if this were not accepted, then as registration might, and possibly should, have been effected on the date of receipt, that that date must, in a question between the insurer and the insured, be held to be the date of registration. If the stamping with the date of receipt were not registration the learned Solicitor-General declined to tie himself to any other date. No other date, in fact, would suit his purpose.

I am of opinion that the mere stamping of the date of receipt upon the counterfoil was in no sense registration, and I am further of opinion that the principle quod fieri debet infectum valet, while it may be appealed to by the party creditor in an obligation ad factum præstandum, who seeks to enforce the obligation, cannot as of right be founded on by the debtor in such obligation in order to avoid the obligation. Though counsel for the defenders declined to suggest any other act than the stamping of the counterfoil with the date of receipt as the act of registration, I am inclined to think that the nearest thing they can shew to registration is marking the counterfoil with its running number. For I cannot hold the act of filing the counterfoil to be such. It is too impalpable and too indefinite as to time. Now I hold the marking of the running number to have taken place on the 29th December 1905, just before filling up the acknowledgment No 7 of process, which was ultimately forwarded to Mr Hunter on 3rd January following. What, then, does the acknowledgment say? It says this—"Perth 29/12/1905. A. T. Hunter, Esq. No. $\frac{\text{L.C.}}{2}$ 7727. Dear Sir,—We have received your intimation of the purchase of Messrs Charles Letts & Co.'s insurance coupon, with sixpence in stamps enclosed, and have registered your name as being insured against accidents, etc. In future communications please quote above number," referring to the running number, marked, as I hold, unico contextu with the filling up of the form of acknowledgment, on the counterfoil. I think that the insured was entitled, as he had no other information as to the date of registration and was not bound to enquire into the Company's practice, to accept as fact that the registration had at any rate not been made earlier than the date on which the letter of acknowledgment stating that his name had been registered bore. It was essential that the assured should know the date of registration with a view to the renewal of the insurance if that was desired; and I hold that the Company are barred from trying to fix the assured with any earlier date than that of their own acknowledgment in order to avoid liability owing to his failure to renew. The date of actual registration is the earliest point of time at which the Company can maintain that there was a completed contract. Personally I do not think that there was a completed contract until the Company had not only registered Mr Hunter's name but issued their acknowledgment. For I am not to be held as determining that there was any contract until the issue by the Company of something equivalent to an acceptance of Mr Hunter's offer. I find that in the letter of acknowledgment bearing a lithographed signature, which in the circumstances must be held to bind the Company. But though dated 29th December 1905, this acknowledgment was not issued till 3rd January 1906. But for the present purpose it is enough, in my opinion, to assume it issued of the date it bears.

If, then, the date of registration is held to be the 29th December 1905, the accident occurred within twelve months of that date.

But the defenders maintain another ground for avoiding liability. They say that the insurance is under the condition (4) that notice of the claim is sent to their registered office within fourteen days of the occurrence of the accident (this they admit was done); and (5) that such claim be made within twelve months of the registration of the holder's name (this they say was not done, whether the date of registration be, as they hold, the 26th December 1905, or, as I hold, the 29th of that month). I find myself unable to give effect to this contention, as I think, in view of the whole terms of a somewhat confusing document, to do so would disappoint the natural and just expectation of the ordinary person to whom the document is addressed (Life Association of Scotland v. Foster (1873), 11 M. 351, per Lord-President Inglis at p. 358 and Lord Ardmillan at p. 371). At the outset of the coupon insurance policy it is represented to the members of the public that if their death is occasioned by railway accident they will, on insuring with the Company, receive £1000 should death result within three calendar months of such accident. I do not think that any ordinary person reading the subsequent conditions would arrive at the conclusion that if he was injured within twelve months, and notice of the accident was duly given, his representatives were to be cut off from all claim if he lingered on for a few days beyond the twelve months, though dying within three months of the accident, so that notice of the actual death could not be given within the twelve months. If the Company mean this by their so-called policy, I think they should state it in such language, and print it, not in the minute pica of No. 13 of process, but in such legible type as would make it clear to those to whom the document is addressed, and give them a chance of understanding it. Instead of that, they veil what they now say is their meaning under a cryptic distinction between "notice of claim" and "making of claim." I am sure that no ordinary insured would read the first as "notice of a contingent claim," which if it was not, in certain cases such as the present, preceded by the second, "the making of the actual claim" free from any contingency would be futile. I think that whatever meaning may be deduced from the terms used in the different parts of the coupon by their piecing together by a skilled lawyer, the ordinary reader to whom these terms are addressed would understand them to mean, "provided your claim attaches within twelve months of the date of registration of your name, by reason of your accident within that time, and you give notice of your accident within fourteen days of it, and you die within three months of the accident, your representatives will be paid."

The defenders commence by advertising a wide and general offer to the public, in unmistakable language. If this is to be whittled down, it must be done so clearly, and so that those to whom it is addressed may understand it. The contract is not what the defenders mean to deduce from misleading and inconsistent phrases, but what those in the position of the pursuer will reasonably suppose their general statement in its entirety to convey. The insured is not to be caught by allowing the Company to put a different interpretation on the word "claim" in two consecutive lines of their policy, without any explanation to their customers that they intend a distinction and what that distinction is.

I do not think that any ordinary person reading this document could conceive, for instance, that this Mr Hunter, injured within the twelve months and actually dying, not merely within three months of the accident, but within the twelve months, his representatives would be denied the benefit of the policy, because, though they could give notice of the accident within fourteen days of its date, they could not give notice of the death before the lapse of the twelve months. If the Company mean that, why do they not say in the very forefront of their advertisement after the statement, "Should death result within three calendar months after such accident" in plain words, "provided it occurs within twelve months of the registration of the holder's name, and notice is given of the accident within fourteen days of its occurrence"? As I think that this document must be interpreted contra proferentem, and would reasonably be interpreted, as I have indicated, by the class to whom it is addressed, I reject the defenders' second line of defence.

But were it necessary, I should be prepared to hold that this contract was not complete until actual issue on 3rd January 1906 of the acknowledgment No. 7 of process, on the day before which in the following year the notice, not only of the contingent claim, but of the actual claim, was given. If they chose to hold up their acknowledgment for some days I do not think that that entitled them virtually to antedate their acknowledgment in a question with the late Mr Hunter and his representatives, or fixes him and them with a knowledge of his registration prior to 3rd January 1906.—26*th November* 1907.

CAP. 65), SECTS. 11, 12—REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT 1884 (48 VICT. CAP. 3), SECTS. 5, 7 (7), 12.

Special Case.

This was a case stated on appeal from a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute (Balfour) at Glasgow, at the Registration Court for the Burgh of Glasgow held at Glasgow on 2nd October 1907.

The case set forth:—

Archibald L. Niven, sewing machine maker, 342 South York Street, Glasgow, a person whose name appeared in the list of voters for said burgh, objected to John Stewart, brush manufacturer, residing at Park Road, Giffnock, as not having been entitled on the last day of July 1907 to have his name inserted in the list of voters for said burgh.

The objections lodged in Court by the said Archibald L. Niven were to the following effect:—

"The parties objected to have not been the occupants of the premises at 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow, for the statutory period, and they are not occupants of the premises.

"There are five persons responsible for the rent of these premises, and the rent is insufficient to give a £10 qualification to each."

The following are the facts disclosed at the hearing of the case:—

1. That the name of the said John Stewart appeared in the list of voters for the Blackfriars and Hutchesontown Division of the burgh of Glasgow for the year 1907–8 as joint tenant and joint occupant of premises at 207 Rutherglen Road.

2. That in said list of voters the names of Peter G. Stewart, brush manufacturer, residing at 27 Queen Mary Avenue, Glasgow, William D. Tait, compositor, 17 Castle Mansions, Cathcart, and John Watt, compositor, residing at 110 Thistle Street, Glasgow, also appeared as joint tenants and joint occupants of said premises.

3. That under the lease (which was produced in Court) said premises are let to the said John Stewart, Peter G. Stewart, William D. Tait, John Watt, and Thomas Anderson, Glasgow, at an annual rent of £45.

4. That under said lease the said premises are let to be occupied for the purpose of an organisation termed the Independent Labour Party.

5. That under the provisions of the Lands Valuation Acts, the factor for said premises returned to the Assessor for the burgh of Glasgow the names of the said John Stewart, Peter G. Stewart, William D. Tait, John Watt, and Thomas Anderson as tenants and occupants of said premises for the year 1907–8, and that said names were entered in the Valuation Roll by said Assessor.

6. That the name of the said Thomas Anderson was deleted on appeal from the Valuation Roll by the Assessor, on the ground that he had ceased to be a member of the said Independent Labour Party, and proof was led before me which established that Thomas Anderson had no connection with the Independent Labour Party as occupiers of the premises in question.

7. That the rental of said premises entered in the Valuation Roll is £45 per annum.

8. That the said premises are occupied as reading and billiard rooms of the said Independent Labour Party, and are the headquarters of said organisation in the locality, and there are about one hundred members of said organisation.

9. That the said premises have been occupied in this way for the qualifying period, and that the names of the said John Stewart, Peter G. Stewart, and John Watt were enrolled as voters for the burgh of Glasgow in respect of said premises for the year 1906–7.

I repelled said objections.

The Questions of Law for the opinion of the Court were:—

1. Was the said John Stewart properly entered in the list of voters for the Blackfriars and Hutchesontown Division of the burgh of Glasgow for the year 1907–8 as joint tenant and joint occupant of premises at 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow?

2. Was the rental qualification of the said John Stewart sufficient to entitle his name to be entered in said list in respect of said premises?

The sections of the statutes are sufficiently quoted in the opinion of Lord Stormonth-Darling.

Argued for Appellant: There were five tenants, and that did not give a qualification of £10 each on the rental of the premises. It was of no consequence that one had ceased to be a member of the Independent Labour Party. The question of tenancy must be judged by the lease alone (Russell, 1863, 1 M. 313, 314). Sect. 4 of the Act of 1884 contained prohibitions against the multiplication of voters, as by faggot voters, and this assumed the maintenance under the new franchises of the old rules as to joint tenants each requiring the qualification. It was thus settled that when there were several joint tenants the rent of the premises must be divisible so as to give each the minimum (Blair v. Torrance, 1868, 7 M. 319; Blackwood v. Moffat, 1870, 9 M. 7; Wainwright v. Aiken, 1893, 21 R. 163).

There was no appearance for the respondent.

The Court sustained the appeal, and remitted to the Sheriff to delete Stewart's name from the roll.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—This is an appeal from a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire pronounced in a Registration Court for the Burgh of Glasgow, repelling certain objections to the entry of the name of John Stewart in the list of voters for the Blackfriars and Hutchesontown division of the burgh, as joint tenant and joint occupant of premises at 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow. It appears from the facts stated in the case that there is a written lease, which was produced in Court, that under it the premises are let to John Stewart and four other persons at an annual rent of £45; and that they are so let to be occupied as reading and billiard rooms for the purposes of an organisation termed the Independent Labour Party, which contains about a hundred members. It is also stated in the case that the name of one of these five persons (Thomas Anderson) was deleted on appeal from the Valuation Roll by the Assessor, on the ground that he had ceased to be a member of the said Independent Labour Party, and the Sheriff-Substitute adds that a proof was led before him which established that Thomas Anderson had no connection with the Independent Labour Party as occupiers of the premises in question. The effect of this deletion of Anderson's name from the Valuation Roll (I assume on his own appeal, for I do not see that anybody else had any right or interest to bring it) and the establishment of the fact of his want of connection with the Labour Party may have thrown some doubt on his right to occupy the premises at the date when the Sheriff considered the case; but of course it could not affect the question of his liability for the rent during the endurance of the lease, both past and future.

The Sheriff-Substitute notes that the qualification of these persons, being three of the five persons named in the lease (other than the respondent and Thomas Anderson) depend on the same questions of law; and the questions are: 1. Was the said John Stewart properly entered in the list of voters for the Blackfriars and Hutchesontown division of the burgh of Glasgow for the year 1907–8 as joint tenant and joint occupant of premises at 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow? 2. Was the rental qualification of the said John Stewart sufficient to entitle his name to be entered in said list in respect of said premises? I am of opinion that both questions must be answered in the negative.

The statutory right of a person to be entered in the list of voters for a burgh as joint tenant and joint occupant of premises in that burgh depends on the combined effect of sect. 5 of the Representation of the People Act 1884, sect. 7 (7), and sect. 12 of the same Act, and sects. 11 and 12 of the Act 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 65. Sect. 5 of the Act of 1884 provides: "Every man occupying any land or tenement in a county or borough in the United Kingdom of a clear yearly value of not less than £10 shall be entitled to be registered as a voter, and when registered to vote at an election for such county or borough in respect of such occupation, subject to the like conditions respectively as a man is, at the passing of this Act, entitled to be registered as a voter and to vote at an election for such county in respect of the county occupation franchise, and at an election for such borough in respect of the borough occupation franchise." Sect. 7 (7) defines the "borough occupation franchise" in Scotland as meaning the franchise enacted by the 11th section of the Act of 1832. That section is only partially repealed by the Act of 1884, sect. 12, and even this partial repeal is subject to the exception of enactments containing "conditions made applicable by this Act to any franchise enacted by this Act." Now one of the conditions of sect. 11 of the Act of 1832 which is thus saved is that the person whose claim is under consideration by the Sheriff must have been for a period of not less than twelve calendar months previous to the last day of July in any year after 1832 in the occupancy of any qualifying subjects in such burgh. So far, nothing is said about joint occupants. But sect. 12 of the Act of 1832, after enacting certain provisions about successive occupancy of premises of the requisite value and so on, provides that "where such premises shall be of the yearly value of twenty pounds or upwards, and shall be jointly occupied by more than one person, each of such joint occupiers shall be entitled to be registered and to vote, provided his share and interest in the same shall be of the yearly value of ten pounds or upwards."

Now, keeping in view that, during part at least of the qualifying period of twelve calendar months previous to the last day of July, five persons were responsible for the rent of £45, can it be said that the share and interest of any one of them was of the yearly value of ten pounds or upwards? Clearly not; and on this short ground I move your Lordships to sustain the appeal and delete from the roll the names of the respondent and the other persons dependent on the same questions of law.

Lord Pearson.—In this appeal we are under the disadvantage of having no appearance for the respondent. After careful consideration I have not been able to find any sufficient answer to the appellant's argument, in the case as stated by the learned Sheriff. It is agreed that the value of the premises is £45 a year. That value will afford a £10 qualification for four joint tenants and occupiers, but not for five. Now it is true that the result of the Sheriff's judgment is to place four joint tenants and occupiers on the roll, and no more; and this is in conformity with the Valuation Roll, as altered by the Assessor on appeal. But the Valuation Roll, while it is prima facie evidence of the statements which it contains, may be overruled by better evidence; and here the Sheriff expressly finds that under the lease (which was produced in Court) the premises were let to five gentlemen, including the claimant, at an annual rent of £45. Now that is the best possible evidence that five persons were joint tenants of the subjects; and as the value will not support five votes, it seems to follow of necessity that none are qualified. The learned Sheriff, in paragraph 6, explains the Assessor's deletion of one of the names upon a ground which has no necessary connection whatever with the continuance or cessation of his liability as tenant under the lease. And while the remainder of that paragraph may be read, though I doubt whether it really can be read, as meaning that there were only four occupiers during the qualifying period, there were at any rate five joint tenants during that period, or during part of it, and that is enough to show that none of them is entitled to be put upon the Voters' Roll.

Registration Appeal Court.
Niven v. Stewart.
Lord Pearson.

Lord Johnston.—The first question which requires to be considered in this case is the effect of the entry in the Valuation Roll. The original entry in that roll was of five persons, including the respondent, John Stewart, as tenants and occupants of the premises 207 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow. But on appeal the Valuation Roll was altered by the deletion of the name of one of the said five persons, viz. Thomas Anderson, not because he had ceased to be tenant, but because he had ceased to be a member of the Independent Labour party, for whose behoof the said five persons were tenants, apparently in trust, of the premises. I am at a loss to know what concern the Valuation Appeal Court had with this fact. Anderson's defection from the ranks of the party did not affect his tenancy, however much it may have affected his actual occupancy of the premises, and the Assessor was perfectly right in inserting his name as tenant in the Valuation Roll. The rental is fixed by the Valuation Roll at £45.

The Valuation Roll is made conclusive as to the value of premises by the Representation, etc. Act 1884, sect. 11 (Harkness v. Scott, 1899, 2 F. 286), the authority of such cases as Stevenson v. Millar, 1880, 8 R. 8, and Dunbar v. Rule, 1883, 11 R. 167, decided under prior statutes, being now superseded. But the Valuation Roll is not made conclusive on any other point, and is therefore no bar to one considering the real facts of this case, so long as we accept the value of the premises as £45, as appearing in the Valuation Roll.

This, then, being a claim to the burgh occupation franchise, the evolution of that franchise has been as follows:—The Reform Act of 1832 conferred the franchise in respect of occupancy, "either as proprietor, tenant, or liferenter" of premises in burghs of the value of £10.

The Representation of the People Act 1868 introduced the household franchise, irrespective of value, which is, in a sense, an occupation franchise but involves occupation, not merely as owner or tenant or liferenter, but as inhabitant, and is irrespective of the value of the premises. It is therefore designated, not as an occupation but as a household franchise. This Act further introduced a county occupation franchise depending on tenancy of a £14 value in counties, but it leaves the burgh occupation franchise of 1832 untouched.

The Representation of the People Act 1884 assimilated the occupation franchise in counties and burghs, declaring by sect. 5 that "every man occupying any land or tenement in a county or burgh" of £10 value shall be entitled to the franchise in the county or burgh respectively, subject to the like conditions respectively as governed the county and burgh occupation franchises and the burgh occupation franchise at the passing of the Act. Although this section refers to nothing except "occupation," the interpretation clause, sect. 7, subsect. 7, refers back for the meaning of "burgh occupation franchise" to the Reform Act 1832, sect. 11. This section I have already referred to, and pointed out that it requires as the basis of the occupancy either ownership, tenancy, or liferent. But then the interpretation section of the Representation, etc. Act 1884, sect. 7, subsect. 8, adds that any "enactments amending or relating to the county occupation franchise or burgh occupation franchise other than the sections in this Act on that behalf mentioned, shall be deemed to be referred to in the definition of the county occupation franchise and the burgh occupation franchise in this Act mentioned." (See also the same Act, sect. 12.) That seems to me to let in the provisions of the Reform Act 1832, sect. 12, which, with reference to the occupation franchise created by the previous section of that Act, provides thus for a case of joint occupancy: "Where such premises shall be of the yearly rent or value of £10 or upwards, and shall be jointly occupied by more than one person, each of such joint occupiers shall be entitled to be registered and to vote, provided his share and interest in the same shall be of the yearly value of £10 or upwards." There must therefore not only be joint occupancy, but that occupancy must be as owner, tenant, or liferenter, and the share and interest in the tenancy must be of £10 value. Mr Anderson having retired from the Independent Labour Party, the four other tenants may have the sole occupancy, but their share and interest depends, not on the occupany, but on the tenancy, and in calculating that share and interest they cannot discard Mr Anderson, their joint tenant. The share of each is therefore only a fifth of £45, or less than £10 in value. Stewart has therefore no sufficient tenancy qualification for the occupation franchise.

I desire at the same time to reserve my opinion as to whether Stewart and the other three persons, who are in the same position, are occupying in the sense of the statutes. They may be joint tenants, but I doubt whether they occupy as joint tenants, and not merely by reason of membership of the Independent Labour Party's Club, sharing the occupancy with the hundred other members of whom we are told it is composed.—28*th November* 1907.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

(The Lord Justice-General, Lords M'Laren and Kinnear.)

224. Fairbairn and Others v. Lochryan Oyster Fishery Company Limited and Another.

Justiciary Cases—Instance—Complaint at Instance of Incorporated Company and a Person Not Connected With the Company—Officer of Company Not Conjoined in Instance—Instance Held Good.

Stated Case.

This was an appeal against a conviction obtained in the Sheriff Court at Stranraer against the appellants on a complaint at the instance of the respondents, charging a contravention of sect. 2 of an Act for the Better Protection of the Oyster Fisheries in Scotland by fishing on a portion of Lochryan with a seine net.

The case set forth the facts as follows:—

The agent for the appellants stated the following objections to the complaint:—

1. No title to prosecute.
2. Instance defective.
3. Incompetent.

. . . . . .

The Sheriff-Substitute (Watson) repelled the whole objections stated for the appellants, and the appellants pleaded not guilty. The Sheriff-Substitute adjourned the diet to the 21st day of November.

At this adjourned diet the appellants adhered to their plea of not guilty.

Evidence was then led for the respondents. . . .

In the course of the proof the agent for the appellants objected to the production of Part III. of the Eighteenth Annual Report of the Fishery Board for Scotland, which was put in evidence by the respondents, with special reference to a Report of an Inquiry on the Action of the Herring Seine Net by T. Wemyss Fulton, M.D., contained therein. The objection was disallowed. . . .

The Sheriff-Substitute, in respect of the evidence adduced, convicted each of the appellants of the contravention charged, and therefore adjudged each of them to forfeit and pay the sum of ten shillings of modified penalty, and, in default of payment by them respectively within eight days, decerned and adjudged the appellants respectively to be imprisoned for the space of three days from the respective dates of their imprisonment.

The Questions of Law for the opinion of the High Court of Justiciary were, inter alia:

2. Is the instance defective, in respect that the manager or other official of the respondents, the Lochryan Oyster Fishery Co. Ltd., is not associated with the Company as complainer?
4. Is the conviction bad in respect of the admission of the evidence which, as above stated, was objected to by the appellants?

The instance of the complaint was as follows:—

> The complaint of the Lochryan Oyster Fishery Co. Ltd., incorporated under the Companies Acts, and having its registered office in Manchester, lessees of the Lochryan Oyster Fishery aftermentioned, and John Alexander Agnew Wallace, Esq., of Lochryan, Cairnryan, Wigtownshire, proprietor of said fishery, with consent and concurrence of John Marquis Rankin, Esq., Procurator-Fiscal of Court at Stranraer, for the public interest.

The record of proceedings contained, inter alia, the following:—

The following documents were produced in evidence by the complainers, viz.:—

9. Part III. of the Government Blue Book, being the Annual Report of the Fishery Board for Scotland for the year 1899.

Argued for Appellants: (1) A complaint at the instance of an incorporated company without the conjunction of an officer of the company was bad. Such an officer was required to represent the Company in the Court (Great North of Scotland Railway Co. v. Anderson, 1897, 2 Adam 381, per Lord Trayner at 384). In the case of a prosecution at the instance of several persons jointly, it was incompetent for one to proceed with the prosecution if the instance, so far as another was concerned, was bad. (2) A volume had been tendered as evidence, and made part of the complainers' case, which was not evidence. That was incompetent, and the conviction therefore proceeded on incompetent evidence.

Argued for Respondents (counsel being asked to speak only on the second objection): The volume had been shewn to a witness who was asked whether he agreed with what was there stated. The book, being thus produced, was lodged in process; but it was not made part of the evidence in the case.

High Court of Justiciary

Fairbairn and Others v. Lochryan Oyster Fishery Co. Ltd. and Another.

The Court answered Question No. 2 in the negative, and remitted to the Sheriff-Substitute to report whether the volume in question was merely put to a witness with a view to ascertaining whether the witness agreed or disagreed with the opinions expressed therein on the herring seine net, or whether it was admitted as evidence in causa without being put to a witness.

The Lord Justice-General.—This is a case where a complaint is brought against certain fishermen for having contravened the provisions of an Act for the Better Protection of the Oyster Fisheries in Scotland, inasmuch as they did, in a part of Lochryan known as "The Field," unlawfully and wilfully trawl with a seine net. Several objections have been stated. The first is as to the instance, the complaint being at the instance of the Lochryan Oyster Fishery Co. Ltd., incorporated under the Companies Acts, and John Alexander Agnew Wallace, Esq., of Lochryan, with consent and concurrence of the Procurator-Fiscal. It is said that this is bad, because an incorporated company cannot make a good instance unless they are coupled with some officer who may appear in Court and act on their behalf. I have not been able to see that that is a good objection. The conduct of the case in court is another matter, but I do not see how they can be said not to have a title to prosecute. In the case which was quoted to us it seems to have been said that in practice it was in use to conjoin one of the Company's officers. I do not see how that makes the instance any better, nor do I see why there should be any difference between the rules which prevail in civil cases and those which prevail in criminal matters.

But, apart from that, the instance of Mr Wallace in this case was perfectly good, and he could not be prevented from going on with the case if, for example, the other prosecutor did not come to take part in the proceedings.

[His Lordship then dealt with certain objections which do not require to be referred to.]

There is one objection which, in one view, may be of a more serious character. The Sheriff-Substitute has told us that "in the course of the proof the agent for the appellants objected to the production of 'a book' which was put in evidence by the respondents," and the objection was disallowed. That is rather an ambiguous statement. It is said that the agent objected to the production. It is afterwards said that the book was put in evidence. It is clear that, inasmuch as one of the questions here was whether fishing with a seine net came within the proviso of the section a contravention of which is charged, and the book dealt with the action of such a net, it was material on the question whether it answered the description of the instrument given in the statute. And it is clear that if this book was improperly put in evidence, the Sheriff-Substitute was making up his mind upon evidence which was not evidence in the case. On the other hand, if what was done was that the book was shewn to a witness, and he was asked whether he agreed with a statement in the book, that was a proper thing to do. The proper sequel to that would be, in a civil case, if the book was put in anywhere, that it should be put in process, not in evidence. In a criminal case there is no list of process separate from the list of things put in evidence. The book was simply put in. If I found that that was the only use made of it I should deem it a very strong thing to overturn a decision because the book was put in evidence. But as the parties are not agreed as to what is the state of the facts on this matter, it is necessary that we should make a remit to have them ascertained before we can proceed.

Lords M'Laren and Kinnear concurred.—31st May 1907.

In obedience to the remit of the High Court of Justiciary, the Sheriff-Substitute (Watson) reported that it was not the case that the Report in question was admitted as evidence in causa without being put to a witness; that it was shewn to and produced by a witness, James Scotland, who was questioned with reference to the said Report.

The Court answered question No. 4 in the negative.—5*th December* 1907.

225. Liquidator of James Donaldson & Company Limited v. Thomas White & Park.

Company—Liquidation—Law Agents' Lien—Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. cap. 89), sect. 115—Order for Production of Documents in Hands of Agents Without Prejudice to Agents' Lien—Quaere Whether Liquidator Entitled to Have Access to Documents Without Thereby Becoming Bound to Give Agents a Preference in Liquidation for Their Account—Terms of Order for Production Granted — In re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co. (1869, L.R. 4 Ch. 215), per Lord Hatherley, Followed.

Report by Lord Dundas.

On 12th September 1907 James Maxton Graham, C.A., Edinburgh, official liquidator of James Donaldson & Co. Ltd., presented a note to the Lord Ordinary (Dundas), in which he prayed his Lordship (2) ". . . . to appoint this note to be served upon the said Thomas White & Park, and to allow them to lodge answers within eight days after service; and thereafter, on resuming consideration of this note, to ordain Hope Park, Thomas William Saidler, and Alexander White, being the only known partners of the said Thomas White & Park, to appear before your Lordship on a day to be fixed by your Lordship, for the purpose of being examined upon oath concerning the affairs, dealings, estate, and effects of the said James Donaldson & Co. Ltd., and to produce all books, title-deeds, papers, writings, or other deeds or documents in their custody or power relating to the said James Donaldson & Co. Ltd."

The Petitioner averred, inter alia:

The said Thomas White & Park are in possession of documents belonging to the Limited Company, or to which the liquidator is entitled to access. The liquidator has made application to the said Thomas White & Park to produce these documents, but (although they have in connection with the liquidator's said application prepared an inventory thereof) they refuse either to produce the documents or to exhibit the inventory, on the ground that they have a lien over the documents.

The Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. cap. 89) provides:—

Sect. 115. The court may, after it has made an order for winding up the company, summon before it any officer of the company, or person known or suspected to have in his possession any of the estate or effects of the company or supposed to be indebted to the company, or any person whom the court may deem capable of giving information concerning the trade, dealings, estate, or effects of the company; and the court may require any such officer or person to produce any books, papers, deeds, writings or other documents in his custody or power relating to the company . . . . nevertheless in cases where any person claims any lien on papers, deeds, writings or documents produced by him, such production shall be without prejudice to such lien, and the court shall have jurisdiction in the winding up to determine all questions relating to such lien.

Sect. 117. The court may examine upon oath, either by word of mouth or upon written interrogatories, any person appearing or brought before them in manner aforesaid concerning the affairs, dealings, estates, or effects of the company. . . .

On 22nd November 1907 the Lord Ordinary reported the cause to the Second Division of the Court.

He added the following note:—

Lord Dundas.—The liquidator presents this note under sects. 115 and 117 of the Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89). The prayer of the note, so far as the present question is concerned, craves the Court to ordain certain law agents to appear before the Court "for the purpose of being examined upon oath concerning the affairs, dealings, estate, and effects of the said James Donaldson & Co. Ltd.; and to produce all books, title-deeds, papers, writings, or other deeds or documents in their custody or power relating to the said James Donaldson & Co. Ltd." The first branch of this prayer echoes the language of sect. 117; while the second is based upon sect. 115; but omits, oddly enough, any reference to its proviso in regard to lien, which raises the point here at issue. Any order which is made would require to be expressly "without prejudice to such lien." The liquidator's counsel proposed to restrict his crave at this stage to the first branch above quoted, with the frankly professed object of endeavouring, if possible, to obtain sufficient information, in the course of the examination, as to the nature and contents of the various documents, without incurring any liability for the law agents' account which he apprehended might possibly arise if an order to produce was executed. A precedent for this course was said to exist in the Outer House case of Fergusson (Barr & Co.'s Liquidator) 1902, 10 S.L.T. 456). But that case is not, in my opinion, in point as a precedent; for I observe from the report that "counsel having agreed that the examination should not be used to obtain a précis of the titles, the respondents did not oppose the motion." I think the proposal to restrict the crave is inexpedient and unnecessary. It was explained during the discussion that the apprehensions entertained by the liquidator were based upon an analogy derived from the law of bankruptcy. It may, I think, be taken as settled that if a trustee in sequestration obtains possession, upon his own demand, of documents under reservation of a lien, he will be liable for payment of the amount secured by the lien, even though he should find upon investigation that they are of no value whatever to the estate or the creditors (Renny & Webster v. Myles, 1847, 9 D. 619). I see that in the recognised text-book on bankruptcy (Goudy, 3rd ed. p. 600) the learned author, after referring to Renny & Webster's case, thinks "it is doubtful if the same results would arise were the trustee simply to inspect the titles in the agent's office, exercising his right to examine all the bankrupt's deeds and securities so as to judge if it will benefit the estate to take up the property to which they relate. It is thought that the agent would have no claim for a preference in such a case, if the trustee declined to take up the property." I am disposed, as at present advised, to agree with the opinion embodied in the sentence last quoted. But it is, in my judgment, unnecessary to pursue the topic; for we are here dealing, not with a sequestration, but with a statutory liquidation. It has been decided in England, with reference to sect. 115 of the Act of 1862, that where the solicitors of the company have a lien for costs on documents relating to the company in their possession, the official liquidator may nevertheless compel their production, without prejudice to the lien, though in many instances this would render the lien valueless (In re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co., 1869, 4 Chan. 215). I should be prepared to follow this case, which I think is directly in point, and to grant the crave of both branches of the prayer of the note, already referred to, adding the words "without prejudice to any lien which the respondents or any of them may have or claim over the same." I may add that I think the examination and production would, in this case, be competently and most conveniently conducted by a commissioner, and not by the Court itself. The liquidator is, in my judgment, entitled to the production craved, in order to see whether the documents or any of them are such as he desires to acquire, in the interests of those whom he represents; and, in my opinion, that production and inspection of them by him will not, per se, impose any liability upon him for payment of the law agent's account. The validity of the lien and the ultimate effect of it in relation to what the liquidator may see fit to do after production has been made, are matters which do not appear to arise at this stage. The question raised is one of general importance, and has not, so far as I know, been decided in Scotland. I have therefore reported it to the Court, to obtain their instruction and guidance; and in doing so I have thought it right to state my own opinion upon the matter.

Argued for Petitioner: If the petitioner desired to use the documents he was no doubt bound to pay the respondents' account in full. But he was entitled to have them produced in order that he might decide whether he wished to make use of them, and that without becoming bound to give the respondents a preference (South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co., 1869, L.R. 4 Ch. 215, per Lord Hatherley). The Lord President's dictum in Renny & Webster v. Myles, 1847, 9 D. 619, did not apply to liquidations under the Companies Acts. Accordingly the Court should grant an order for production containing a declaration that the respondents were not entitled to a preference by reason merely of the documents being produced. Alternatively, the petitioner was entitled to an order in the terms suggested by the Lord Ordinary, or to an order under sect. 117.

Argued for Respondents: Under sect. 115 production of documents was to be without prejudice to the respondents' lien. If the liquidator got an access to the documents he at once became bound to give a preference. If he did not, the lien was worthless, because it would be impracticable to prevent him using the documents. Lord Hatherley's dictum In re South Essex Estuary and Reclamation Co. (cit.) was wrong. The respondents had no objection to the liquidator getting an order under sect. 117, or an order in the precise terms of sect. 115.

The Court pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the report by Lord Dundas to them of date 22nd November 1907, Direct the said Lord Ordinary to proceed in the liquidation by granting the crave of both branches of the prayer of the note without prejudice to the lien claimed by the respondents, in accordance with the opinion expressed by him in the said report; find no expenses due by or to either party since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor reporting the cause."

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling Low and Ardwall.)

226. Turnbull v. Brien.

Aliment — Repayment — Pupil Left an Orphan, Maintained by Brother-in-Law in Humble Circumstances—Action to Recover Sums Paid as Aliment From Pupil After He Has Emerged From Pupillarity and Has Succeeded to a Small Sum of Money—Held Aliment Given Animo Donandi and Action Irrelevant.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Edinburgh.

James Turnbull, labourer, 22 Albert Street, Edinburgh, brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against John Brien, 22 Albert Street, Edinburgh, to obtain payment of the sum of £26.

The pursuer averred:

Cond. 1. The pursuer is a labourer, and resides at 22 Albert Street, Edinburgh. The defender, who is a brother of the pursuer's wife, being bereft of a home by the death of his father, the pursuer agreed with the defender to take him into his home as a boarder, and accordingly the defender went to reside there on 13th May 1897. . . .

Cond. 2. For two years after the said 13th May 1897, the defender, who was then between eleven and twelve years of age, continued to reside with the pursuer and contributed nothing towards his own maintenance. He attended school during said period, and the pursuer, at his own expense, maintained the defender. . . .

Cond. 3. The defender thereafter in due course served an apprenticeship as a mason, and continued to reside with defender, and contributed towards his maintenance until 30th June 1906, when he left the pursuer's house and went to reside elsewhere. During his residence with pursuer the defender repeatedly promised to pay the pursuer for said maintenance, but he has failed to implement said promise. . . .

On 21st January 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute (Guy) dismissed the action as irrelevant.

The pursuer appealed.

The following authorities were cited. For the pursuer: Elchie's Notes on Stair, p. 48; Ersk., III. iii. 92; Bell's Prin., sect. 533; Fraser, Parent and Child, 3rd ed., pp. 116–120; Steven v. Simpson, 1791, M. 11,458; Wilson v. Archibald, 1701, M. 11,427; Mongreenan v. Blair, 1624, M. 11,432 and 8918; Gourlay v. Urquhart, 1697, M. 11,438; Lady Lugton v. Hepburn and Crichton, 1672, M. 11,435; Cunningham v.

M'Gachen, 1831, 9 S. 472; Drummond v. Swayne, 1834, 12 S. 342; Forbes v. Forbes, 1869, 8 M. 85, per Lord Cowan at p. 91; Campbell v. Macfarlane, 1885, 12 R. 713. For the defender: Ligertwood v. Broun, 1872, 10 M. 832; M'Gaws v. Galloway, 1882, 10 R. 157, per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff at p. 162.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—The Sheriff-Substitute has sustained the first plea in law for the defender, which is that the action is irrelevant, and has dismissed the action. I think that the Sheriff is right. The pursuer is a labourer and the husband of the defender's sister; and says that, in May 1897, he took the defender, who was then an orphan of eleven, into his house, and continued to support him until he began to serve his apprenticeship as a mason. The pursuer now sues the defender for the amount of the aliment furnished up to May 1899. After that date, as I understand, no claim is made, because the boy contributed enough to cover his maintenance until 1906, when he left the pursuer's house. The claim is thus obviously made in respect of aliment afforded to a pupil. I am of opinion that aliment allowed to a pupil by a person who is not under a natural obligation to support him, must be considered to have been afforded ex pietate, and that there is no relevant claim against the pupil, even if he succeeds to a small sum of money in after life. If it be said that the defender is under a moral duty under these circumstances to reimburse the pursuer for his expenditure, I am afraid that the answer is that we have nothing to do with moral duties, and that a legal obligation cannot be incurred by a person who is not a legal persona. The pursuer further avers that the defender promised to pay for his maintenance, but I think that that averment is irrelevant, because there is no statement as to the terms of the promise, or as to the time at which it was made. I propose, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed and the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute affirmed.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion. It has always been recognised that cases of this description must be treated each according to its own special circumstances. The special circumstances of this case, as averred by the pursuer, are as follows. In 1897 the pursuer's brother-in-law, aged between eleven and twelve years, was left an orphan and destitute, owing to his father's death. The pursuer took him into his own home and maintained him there for two years, until he obtained an apprenticeship, and was able to pay for his board and lodging. Now the plain inference from these facts seems to me to be that the pursuer acted from a very natural and proper sense of duty, without any ulterior motive, and without any idea of making a subsequent claim. The circumstances of the case seem to me to preclude the idea that the pursuer thought at the time that this boy was incurring a debt which he might afterwards be called upon to pay. I am convinced that the idea of claiming repayment is an afterthought, suggested by the fact that the young man has now come into a little money. I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute has rightly decided this case.

2nd Div. Turnbull v. Brien. Lord Low.

Lord Ardwall.—I concur. The question is whether the aliment afforded by the pursuer to the defender was supplied animo donandi, or with the intention that a debt should be created against the defender. We had a careful and interesting citation of old authorities from Mr Steuart in support of the latter alternative, and there are dicta which to a certain extent support his contention. But I think that the tendency of the more recent authorities is to consider the question whether in cases such as the present the aliment supplied was intended to be a donation or a debt as one depending on the circumstances of each case and not on any fixed rules or presumptions of law. And in the present case a consideration of the facts disclosed on the record leads me to the conclusion that the aliment, repetition of which is now sued for, was given ex pietate as a donation and with no intention that it should form a debt against the defender. I therefore agree with the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Roxburgh, Berwick, and Selkirk at Jedburgh.

On 13th October 1902 a contract for the construction of waterworks was entered into between the Town Council of the burgh of Selkirk, first parties, and D. M'Donald & Son, contractors, Hawick, and James Alexander M'Donald, the sole partner of that firm, second parties, and Messrs James Marshall & Co., builders and contractors, Hawick, and James Marshall, sole partner of that firm, and James Pennycook, builder, Hawick, cautioners for the second parties. The material clauses of the contract, and of the general conditions and stipulations appended thereto, are sufficiently set forth in the judgment of Lord Low.

On or about 16th July 1904 the contractor M'Donald was taken seriously ill, and was unable to attend to the contract work. The cautioner James Marshall accordingly intervened and completed the contract. In doing so, a loss of £242, 16s. 4d. was incurred. James Marshall & Co. then brought the present action against James Pennycook to recover one-half of the loss sustained.

Proof was allowed and led. The import of the proof sufficiently appears from the judgment of Lord Low.

On 26th July 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Baillie) granted decree for the sum of £92, 18s. 5d.

On 14th December 1906 the Sheriff (Chisholm) affirmed the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor with the additional finding in fact "that the loss to the cautioners would have been greater if the pursuer had not, immediately on M'Donald's incapacity emerging in July 1904, taken up the work and completed it."

The Defender appealed and argued: On the evidence the pursuer in taking up the contract had acted not as cautioner but as voluntary negotiorum gestor, and was not entitled to call on the defender to contribute. But even if the pursuer had acted as cautioner the defender was not liable. The liability of the cautioners could not emerge unless M'Donald was in default. But if M'Donald were in default the Town Council were entitled and, in a question with cautioners, were bound to withhold payment of the sums certified for by the engineer. In fact they had not done so, but had paid these sums to M'Donald's assignees. It was trite law that if securities over the estate of the principal debtor were given up, the cautioner was pro tanto freed from his liability (Ersk., III. v. 11; Bell's Prin., sects. 254, 255; 1 Bell's Com., M'Laren's edition, p. 366; Hume v. Youngson, 1830, 8 S. 295; Sligo v. Menzies, 1840, 2 D. 1478; Mayor of Hull v. Harding [1892], 2 Q.B. 494). A right to retain money belonging to the principal debtor was a right of security (Bell's Prin., sect. 264; 1 Bell's Com., M'Laren's edition, p. 376; Hudson on Building Contracts, third edition, p. 646; Calvert v. London Dock Co., 1838, 2 Keen 638; Ranger v. Great Western Railway Co., 1854, 5 Clark (H.L.) 72, per Lord Cranworth, L.C., at p. 107). The defender was therefore not liable for the sum sued for, the sums improperly paid away being larger than the amount of the loss sustained. In any view, the pursuer was not entitled to charge a fee for superintendence. He was not entitled to make a profit out of his co-cautioner.

Argued for Pursuer: On the evidence the pursuer was acting as cautioner when he took up the contract. His action had resulted in minimising the loss, and the defender was bound to pay one half (Wolmershausen v. Gullick [1893], 2 Ch. 514). There had been no liberation of securities. The Town Council were entitled to withhold payments only in the event of the work not being carried on regularly or to their satisfaction. That event had never happened. The pursuer's intervention had prevented the work from being interrupted, and had thus prevented the event from happening which alone could bring the security fund into existence. The fact that the pursuer's action had this result did not liberate the defenders (Fleming v. Wilson, 1823, 2 S., N.E., 296; Hume v. Youngson, cit., per Lord Pitmilly). The fee for superintendence was truly an outlay. The pursuer had been caused extra expense in carrying on his own business in consequence of having to attend to the contract work. Counsel also cited Clydebank Engineering and Shipbuilding Co. Ltd. v. Castaneda, 1904, 7 F. (H.L.) 77.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by Lord Low.—A cautionary obligation for the due performance of a contract for the construction of works, generally, I imagine, results in a payment of damages for any loss sustained by the employer in the event of the contract not being duly performed. If, however, upon the failure of the contractor, the cautioner is able and willing to step in and complete the work, I see no reason in principle why he should not implement his cautionary obligation in that way, especially if, as in the present case, the creditor in the obligation consents to his doing so.

Upon the evidence I think that there is no doubt that the pursuer intervened and carried on M'Donald's contract because he was cautioner, and as cautioner, and it seems to me also to be proved that that was the best course to follow in the interests of the cautioners, because the pursuer's witnesses, whose evidence is uncontradicted, say that if when M'Donald became incapacitated the pursuer had not carried on the contract, but the Town Council of Selkirk had been forced to do the work themselves, the loss would have been much greater.

If that be so, then the action of the pursuer was for the benefit of the defender, because if the Town Council had been compelled to take up the work, the defender would undoubtedly have been liable for any loss which was incurred.

The defender denies that he was aware that the pursuer had taken up the contract as cautioner, and although he admits that the pursuer asked him to go to Selkirk and assist with the work, he says that he understood that he was asked to do so merely in the capacity of a friend and not as co-cautioner. I regret to say that I cannot regard the defender's evidence as being at all trustworthy. I am satisfied that he knew perfectly well that the pursuer was taking up the work as cautioner, and it is also proved that he was pressed both by the pursuer and Mr Purdom to co-operate, but that he refused to do anything, or to express any opinion upon the course which ought to be adopted. My impression is that he hoped that by refusing to say or do anything, while the pursuer completed the work, he might ultimately escape liability altogether.

If there were nothing else in the case I should have no hesitation in agreeing with the learned Sheriffs, but there was one point argued before us, which does not seem to have been stated in the Court below, and which requires careful consideration.

In the contract for the execution of the works it was provided that monthly payments should be made to the contractor "only on certificates of the said engineer, at the rate of 80 per cent. of the estimated value of the work executed by the second party, the remainder being paid, one half on the date of the completion of the work, and the other on the expiration of the period of maintenance before mentioned, the first party, however" (and these are the important words), "always having power to withhold payment on any certificate, should the works not be carried on regularly or to their satisfaction."

Now when ,on the 13th of July 1904, M'Donald was seized with an illness which incapacitated him bodily and mentally, there was a sum of £400 due to him, for payment of which the engineer had granted a certificate. Subsequently the Town Council, with the consent of the pursuer, paid that sum partly to a Glasgow firm who had supplied to M'Donald the pipes required for the works, and partly to a bank which had advanced the money required for wages, M'Donald having assigned his right to these parties. The defenders argued that the Town Council ought to have exercised the right given to them by the clause which I have quoted, and withheld payment of the £400, which would have been more than sufficient to cover the loss sustained by the pursuer in completing the works; and that as the Town Council chose to pay away the fund, and thereby deprive the defender, as cautioner, of a security to the benefit of which he was entitled, he was freed from his obligation, and neither the Town Council nor the pursuer, who consented to the payment, had any claim against him.

In considering that argument I think that it is necessary to read, along with the clause in the contract upon which the defender founds, certain provisions in the general conditions and stipulations which were appended to, and formed part of, the contract.

By the 15th of these conditions it was provided that if the contractor should from bankruptcy, insolvency, or any other cause, be prevented from proceeding with the work with the requisite expedition, or fail to perform the same in a proper manner, the Town Council might, after written notice to the contractor, take the whole works out of his hands, and complete them themselves, in which case the contract should, at the option of the Council, become void as to the contractor, and "the amount already paid to the contractor shall be deemed to be the full value of the work executed by him up to that time, and no further claim shall be made by the contractor for work which may have been done by him up to that time."

Now if the pursuer had not intervened it seems to be certain that the result of M'Donald's illness would have been that the work would have come to a standstill, because M'Donald had no means and no one to carry on the contract for him. The position of matters contemplated by the 15th condition would therefore have arisen, and the Council would have been compelled to take the work into their own hands, or to employ another contractor. In that event I do not doubt that they would have been entitled to retain, and probably, in a question with the cautioners, would have been bound to retain, the £400 in question. But the occasion never arose for the Council to consider whether or not they would put an end to the contract and do the work themselves, because the pursuer stepped in and carried on the contract in M'Donald's name, and there was never any failure to carry on the work with the requisite expedition, or to perform the same in a proper manner. And it seems to me that the pursuer gives very good reasons for taking up the contract at once, and not allowing any interruption or delay to take place. He had for some time been visiting the work every day and keeping M'Donald up to the mark, and he knew exactly what the position of matters was. It appears that the pipes were being laid near the river Ettrick, and below the level of the river, and during the very week in which M'Donald took ill, the pipe trench had been flooded, and it was very important that the damage thereby caused should be put right at once, as delay would apparently have resulted in increased damage and greater expense. Then there was a squad of men employed who knew the work, and the pursuer desired to retain their services, because if he had not done so there might have been considerable delay in getting another set of workmen together, and in the meantime the works would have been stopped and the Council might have exercised their powers under the 15th condition, which according to the evidence would have resulted in greater loss to the cautioners. It therefore seems to me that the pursuer by his prompt action did what was best in the interests of all concerned—of the cautioners as well as of the Town Council.

The circumstances, therefore, never having arisen in which the Town Council were entitled to put in force the powers of the 15th condition, were they entitled (and therefore bound in the interest of the cautioners) to withhold payment of the £400 in terms of the clause in the contract?

Now under that clause the Council are authorised to withhold payment only "should the works not be carried on regularly and to their satisfaction." As matter of fact that condition of matters did not exist, because, owing to the intervention of the pursuer both before and after M'Donald's illness, the works had been and were being carried on regularly and to the entire satisfaction of the Council. No doubt the Council knew that what had induced the pursuer to carry on the contract was the fact that he was cautioner, but I do not think that that is of any importance as regards the present question. What is of importance is that M'Donald's contract was carried on without interruption and in a satisfactory manner. That being so, the Council had no right to withhold payment of a sum which had been certified as due and payable to M'Donald. In like manner the pursuer could not have required the Council to withhold payment of the money, because, by virtue of the right to intervene which his position as cautioner gave him, he had simply stepped into M'Donald's place, and was carrying on the contract for and in the name of the latter.

It therefore seems to me that the pursuer having adopted the course which he did there could be no question of withholding payment of the £400. Accordingly, the defender cannot found upon payment of that sum as freeing him from his obligation. If he is freed from his obligation it must be because the pursuer was not justified in adopting the course which he did, and that his having done so has been to the defender's prejudice. I have already said that in my opinion, so far from that being the case, the course adopted by the pursuer was the best which he could have followed in the interests of the cautioners, and accordingly the defender is, in my judgment, bound to relieve the pursuer of one half of the loss which has been incurred.

Some English authorities were quoted for the purpose of shewing that payment by an employer in a contract such as the present, to the contractor, of money which the employer was entitled to retain as security for the due completion and maintenance of the work, had the effect of freeing the contractor's surety or cautioner, at all events to the amount so paid. These authorities would have been directly applicable to the present case had the Town Council of Selkirk paid away the 20 per cent. which under the contract they were entitled to retain, one half till the completion of the work and the balance till the expiration of the period of maintenance, but, in my judgment, they have no application to the £400 in question, which was not a security fund under the contract, but a sum which, although it had been certified as due and payable to the contractor, the Council would have been entitled to retain if a condition of matters had arisen which in fact never did arise.

The only other question is in regard to one item in the account lodged by the pursuer, bringing out the loss sustained in completing the contract. That item is a charge of £75, being fee for superintending the work for nine months. It is proved that if a fee for superintendence is allowable at all the amount charged is moderate. I am of opinion that the charge must be allowed. It was necessary that someone should superintend the work, and if the pursuer had not done so himself he would have required to employ and pay someone else. I think, however, that the pursuer was quite right to supervise the work himself, because the attitude taken up by the defender had placed him in a very delicate position, and he was bound to see that the work was conducted as economically and efficiently as possible. To superintend the work, however, took up time which the pursuer would otherwise have devoted to his own business, and caused him additional expense in carrying on that business to an amount apparently, at all events, equal to the fee charged.

Upon the whole matter I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed and the interlocutor of the Sheriff affirmed.—29*th November* 1907.

228. Grant v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1 (1)—Accident Arising Out of and in the Course of the Employment — Onus of Proof — Railway Constable—Facts From Which Arbitrator Held Entitled to Draw the Inference That Accident Arose Out of and in the Course of Employment.

Stated Case.

This was a case stated under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, on a claim at the instance of the widow and children of Thomas Steele Grant, who was at the time of his death in the employment of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company. The Sheriff-Substitute at Ayr (Shairp) awarded compensation, and the Railway Company appealed. The stated case set forth the facts, inter alia, as follows:—

Thomas Steele Grant, doorkeeper or station policeman at Ayr passenger station, was run over by a train on siding No. 6 at said station, between ten and eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the 3rd day of July 1906, and sustained bodily injuries which caused his death on the same day in Ayr County Hospital.

When he was injured as aforesaid he was employed by the said company as door officer and station policeman at Ayr passenger railway station, and was dressed in railway police uniform. His duties were to go to and from a bank in Ayr with cash boxes, to despatch these cash boxes to different local railway stations of the said railway company, to attend in the guards' room, keep stationery for passenger guards, write up these guards' train arrival books, make out returns for them to be sent to the superintendent, and to keep unauthorised persons from being on, in, or about the said passenger railway station premises, and the entrances, exits, and platforms of said passenger railway station. In the execution of his duty of putting unauthorised persons (there is no evidence that such persons were present on the occasion in question) off No. 1 platform at said railway station, who, on being chased by him up the said platform past the end of the station buildings, might cross the sidings at said station where the accident occurred to get away from him, he was entitled to follow these persons, and see them off the railway company's premises, and himself to cross said sidings, including siding No. 6, or, similarly, to follow such persons from the loading bank shewn on the plan, No. 8 of process, across siding No. 6, in the direction of No. 1 platform.

Grant v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co.

The following are among the rules and regulations for the guidance of the officers and men in the service of the said railway company, viz.:—"24. (a) The servants of the company, more especially those engaged in the working of trains and in shunting and other similar operations, must not expose themselves to danger, and all are requested to prevent, as far as they possibly can, such exposure on the part of their fellow servants, and to spare no opportunity of warning those who neglect to take proper care; (b) reckless exposure of himself, or others, to danger on the part of any servant of the company will be treated as an offence against the company's regulations, and punished accordingly.

"25. (a) No person other than a servant of the company, in the execution of his duty, must be allowed to be, or walk, upon the railway, unless provided with written or printed permission to do so, signed by a properly authorised officer of the Company.

"(b) Unless instructions are issued to the contrary, any person trespassing must be requested to leave the Company's premises, and, on complying, must be warned not to go or pass thereon again. If such person refuse to quit, he must be requested to give his name and address, which must be handed to the nearest stationmaster or other superior officer with a report of the circumstances. In the event of the offender refusing his name and address, he must be detained and given in charge of the police.

"26. The Company's servants must not walk upon the line, except when it is necessary for them to do so in the execution of their duty."

About ten minutes before ten o'clock in the morning of the said third day of July 1906, Stanley Capstick, a railway vanman in the employment of the said railway company, drove the said Thomas Steele Grant and a number of cash boxes from said railway station to the Ayr branch of the National Bank of Scotland Limited, which is situated in Sandgate Street, and there delivered the contents of the cash boxes, and the said Stanley Capstick thereafter drove his van down High Street while the deceased Thomas Steele Grant went up that street towards Ayr passenger railway station, and about fifteen or twenty minutes past ten o'clock in the morning of said last mentioned day, was seen, shortly before he was injured, proceeding on foot in the direction of said passenger railway station along Kyle Street, which joins Smith Street; in Smith Street, near its junction with Kyle Street, there is a gate leading to a loading bank for horses and cattle, and said sidings, as shewn on the plan, No. 8 of the Arbitration Process, which gate should be locked except when something is being admitted or moved to or from said loading bank, but which gate was open at the time the said Thomas Steele Grant was injured. Nobody saw the said Thomas Steele Grant pass through said gate on said morning, and there is no evidence to shew how or why he came to be at the spot on siding No. 6 where he was injured. About 10.40 in the morning of the said third day of July 1906, Andrew Watt, one of the said railway company's engine-drivers, felt that the tender of his engine, which was taking carriages from siding No. 6 to make up a train, had passed over something, and stopped his engine, when he discovered that the tender, which was in front of the engine, had passed over the said Thomas Steele Grant, whom he had not previously seen; and the said Thomas Steele Grant, who was forthwith removed to Ayr County Hospital, was found to have sustained compound comminuted fracture of both arms and both legs, and compound fracture of both thigh bones, and died in said hospital on the same day from the injuries he had received.

Upon these admitted or proved facts, I found that the said Thomas Steele Grant might, in the course of his duties as station policeman, have legitimately been at the spot at which he was accidentally injured, and that it had not been proved that he was there for any other purpose than the discharge of his said duties as station policeman; that, accordingly, the said personal injuries which the said Thomas Steele Grant received, and which resulted in his death, were caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a station policeman under the said railway company.

The Question of Law for the opinion of the Court was:

Seeing that the spot where the said Thomas Steele Grant met with his injuries was one where he might legitimately and necessarily have been for the discharge of his duties as station policeman, but that it was not proved why he came to be at that spot at the time of the accident, or for what purpose he had gone there, was the arbiter entitled to presume and hold that the deceased was at that spot for the discharge of his duties as station policeman, and that, accordingly, the said personal injuries were caused to him by accident arising out of and in the course of his said employment as station policeman by the said Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company?

Argued for Appellants: The Sheriff-Substitute was not entitled to find that the accident arose out of the employment, because the deceased might have been at the place of the accident on the business of his employers. The onus was on the claimants to prove that the accident arose out of the employment, and they did not discharge that onus unless they proved that he went to the place on his employers' and not on his own business. Prima facie, he had no business to be where he was. The case was different from M'Nicholas v. Dawson [1899], 1 Q.B. 773, because there the workman was engaged in the business of the employers, although he was committing a breach of a regulation. The Sheriff-Substitute's finding in fact was that the deceased "might have been" where he was in the course of his duties. That was the fullest possible deduction he was entitled to draw from the facts stated, and it was not enough. The onus on the claimants was to prove that he was there in the course of his duties. Counsel quoted Haley v. United Collieries Ltd., 1907, S.C. 214, per Lord Kyllachy at p. 216.

Argued for Respondents: The Sheriff-Substitute was entitled to draw the inference from the facts which he did; and his inference was that the accident arose out of the employment. The facts stated were consistent with the inference, and justified it. It was not necessary to exclude all possibilities (M'Nicholas v. Dawson, cit. supra). The inference drawn was, considering all the circumstances, a reasonable inference to draw (Mitchell v. Glamorgan Coal Co., 1907, 23 T.L.R. 588).

The Court answered the question stated by declaring that the accident arose out of and in the course of the deceased's employment with the appellants, and affirmed the award of the arbitrator.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The way in which this case is stated by the Sheriff as arbiter is rather embarrassing. The facts as disclosed in the statement of the Sheriff are that this man, in accordance with his duty, went out of the station to do a certain thing for his employers, to take, as I understand, money boxes to the bank, and that he was returning undoubtedly to go back to his duty. In order to go back to his duty he had to go into the station, as it was there his duty was to be done. He might go back by the road round by the entrance to the hotel, or he might go back by the sidings. He might find the way by the sidings the more convenient of the two ways. He might also very well think that as it was part of his duty to prevent loiterers hanging about any part of the station premises, he would go over by the sidings and would take a look round as he came back. All these things are conjectural. All we have found in the case is that he chose to go back to the station by these sidings. There is no case made against him that he was guilty of wilful misconduct. I do not think that could be maintained. Of course, there was more risk in crossing the sidings while there may have been shunting operations going on than there was in going by the ordinary entrance to the station. But he was a railway servant and able to look after himself, although sometimes through inadvertence a railway servant meets with an accident, and sometimes a railway servant does not take sufficient care and is killed. But the question really is, Was the deceased when he was on that spot and killed, in such a position that the accident which happened arose out of, and in the course of, his employment as a servant of the Railway Company? I should be prepared to affirm that statement, and would be prepared to make that really our answer to the question which is put to us by the Sheriff in a somewhat unfortunate form.

Lord Low.—I have felt the question at issue to be attended with much difficulty, chiefly by reason of the way in which the case has been stated by the Sheriff-Substitute, but in the end I have come to the same conclusion as your Lordship.

No doubt a person claiming compensation under the Act must prove that the injury arose out of, and was sustained in the course of, the injured party's employment. But I agree with Mr Menzies that the onus may be shifted, especially when the claim is by a dependant of a workman who has been killed, and whose evidence is therefore not available. If in such a case facts are proved the natural and reasonable inference from which is that the accident happened while the deceased was engaged in his employment, I think that it falls upon the employer, if he disputes the claim, to prove that the contrary was the case.

Here the workman was station policeman at the railway station at Ayr. He had been in the town lodging certain money boxes at a bank in the performance of his duty, and when last seen alive he was walking along Smith Street (which is near the station) towards the station. The inference is irresistible, that having fulfilled a special duty, he was returning to the station to resume his general duties. The next thing which is known is that he was found mortally injured upon a siding close to the station, having no doubt been knocked down by a train which was being shunted. It cannot be said that the place where he was found negatived the idea that he could have been in the course of his employment when the accident happened. On the contrary, I do not think that it can be disputed that the station siding was, so to speak, within his jurisdiction as station policeman.

Therefore, although the way in which the case is stated, and especially the form of the second question (which is the only one we have to dispose of), is very embarrassing, the main facts are plain enough, and therefore I think that the difficulty may be overcome by answering the question as proposed by your Lordship.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair. I consider that the second question as put is unfortunately stated, and that the course to be taken ought to be as your Lordship suggests. The facts here apparently are quite simple, and I have some difficulty in seeing how the Sheriff-Substitute could have any doubt as to certain portions of the case. This unfortunate man, now deceased, was what is known as a railway policeman. But then he had some other duties, and one of them, as stated very distinctly in the case, was to go to a bank in Ayr from the station with cash boxes and deposits. It is also stated that on the morning on which he was killed he had been attending a vanman to the bank, and after the cash boxes were deposited the vanman went away to the stables with his horse, and this policeman in the discharge of his duties, having discharged one of them, went back to discharge another of them—namely, the duty of acting as policeman at Ayr Station. In doing so he was seen last in Kyle Street about 10.20, and at 10.30 unfortunately he was run over at a siding. I think it is perfectly evident from these facts, so much so that I may say it is proved, that in returning from his duty of depositing the cash boxes and going back to his duty as a policeman at the station he took a route which led him across the said siding, and in doing so was run over in the way narrated in the case. Now he had a right to be on the siding; and, furthermore, we can readily imagine, as has been said by your Lordship in the chair, that one reason why he may very reasonably be supposed to have taken this route was that he could take a look round the sidings at the end of the passenger platform to see that no evil-disposed persons or mischievous boys were loitering about. That would be essentially in the discharge of his duty as a policeman; and accordingly I think it is proved, or, if not directly proved, it is a clear inference from the facts which have been held to be proved, that when this accident happened he was in the course of his employment as a station policeman. Now the Sheriff-Substitute has put in a clause in the second question which I do not think it was necessary or proper to put in when he says "that it was not proved why he came to be at that spot at the time of the accident, or for what purpose he had gone there." In addition to what Lord Low has said in regard to the onus shifting, I think a very proper observation was made by Mr Menzies, that while in the general case it would be incumbent upon the claimant in an arbitration of this sort to prove why a deceased person was at a particular place, and to prove that the purpose he had gone there for was a purpose necessarily in the course of his employment, yet that in the case of a policeman the matter is really very different. Of course, every case must be taken upon its own facts. A railway policeman's duties are to go anywhere about a station for the purpose of seeing whether there are evil-disposed or mischievous persons loitering about, ready either to pilfer articles from carriages or trucks, or damage the Company's property; and it might be absolutely impossible in many cases for those claiming on the death of a railway policeman to tell what was in his mind in being at a particular place. He would keep that to himself. He might have been drawn anywhere about the station premises in the discharge of his duty, but nobody could tell after his death what was the particular purpose that took him there. I therefore think this case, which is the case of a policeman, cannot be decided on the same footing as an ordinary case would be, and that the same kind and amount of proof is therefore not required, provided the deceased was in a place where he had a right to be, and where it may be reasonably supposed that he would not have gone except in the discharge of his duties as a policeman. I therefore agree with the judgment proposed by your Lordship.—22*nd November* 1907.

BANKRUPTCY — TRUSTEE — ACCOUNTING — PETITION FOR PAYMENT OF MONEY—ACCOUNTING CONCLUSIONS ANCILLARY TO CONCLUSIONS FOR PAYMENT TO BANKRUPT—RELEVANCY—BANKRUPTCY (SCOTLAND) ACT 1856 (19 & 20 VICT. CAP. 79), SECT. 86.

This was a petition by James Somervell of Sorn, whose estates were sequestrated on 12th February 1901, against John Scott Tait, C.A., Edinburgh, the trustee on his sequestrated estates, and the commissioners thereon, and also against The Edinburgh Life Assurance Company, who were alleged to be responsible for the actings of the commissioners. The petition craved decree against the respondents to account for their intromissions and management as trustee and commissioners, or as being responsible for the commissioners, to reinstate the petitioner in his estates free of all charges or encumbrances subsequent to the date of sequestration, and to pay jointly and severally, or severally, to the petitioner the sum of £150,000, or otherwise the sum of £250,000, or such other sum as might turn out to be due to the petitioner on a true accounting. The petitioner based his right to call for an accounting on sect. 86 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, which is in these terms:—

> The judicial factor, the trustee, and commissioners shall be amenable to the Lord Ordinary and to the Sheriff, although resident beyond the territory of the Sheriff, at the instance of any party interested, to account for their intromissions and management, by petition served on them; and in case it shall appear that such application ought not to have been made, the party complained of shall be entitled to his full expenses, to be either retained out of the funds, or recovered from the party complaining, as the Lord Ordinary or the Sheriff shall direct.

The petition contained, inter alia, averments to the following effect:—

1. That the trustee had failed to call to account Guy Duke, Braehead, Kilmarnock, now deceased, first judicial factor and afterwards trustee on the petitioner's estates, and Francis More, also now deceased, 24 St Andrew Square, Edinburgh, who succeeded the said Guy Duke as trustee, for certain actings and intromissions alleged by the petitioner to have been ultra vires and made in mala fide.

2. That the trustee and commissioners wrongously refused an offer by The Clydesdale Bank, Ltd., whose claim for £26,616 was ultimately upheld by the Court, to withdraw their claim for a payment of £1400.

3. That the trustee and commissioners, in fraud of the unsecured creditors, presented a petition for disentail of the estates of Sorn and Hamilton's farm.

4. That the trustee, with the approval of the commissioners, embarked on vexatious and unnecessary litigation.

5. Failure to pay creditors, and particularly to pay interest and premiums due to the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company, when the rents of the farms charged with the loan were sufficient to pay them, and approval of this course by one of the commissioners, as representing the said Assurance Company, in order to enable the Company to claim penal interest.

6. Failure to pay an annuity to petitioner's mother, and to claim return of income tax.

7. That the trustee, with the approval of the commissioners, illegally insured the petitioner's life, and failed to have the estates inspected, kept in repair, etc.

8. The incurring of unnecessary expense, failure to concur in the letting of certain mineral fields, and delaying to pay creditors for the purpose of keeping up the sequestration and injuring the petitioner; and

9. Failure by the commissioners to superintend the proceedings of the respective trustees.

The arguments of the parties sufficiently appear in the Lord Ordinary's opinion.

The following authorities were cited by the respondents: Goudy on Bankruptcy, pp. 242, 378, 379; Bell v. Gow, 1862, 1 Macph. 84; M'Adam v. Martin's Tr., 1884, 12 R. 358; Henderson v. Henderson's Trs., 1882, 10 R. 188; Wilson v. Alexander, 1803, M. 13,968; and M'Taggart's Reprs. v. Watson, 1835, 1 S. & M'L. 553.

The Lord Ordinary dismissed the petition, with expenses.

Lord Guthrie.—The petitioner asks the Court to ordain his trustee in bankruptcy and the commissioners and the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company, and Mr Adam Wood, as responsible for the actings of two of the commissioners, "to account for their intromissions and management as trustee and commissioner foresaid, and to reinstate the petitioner in his estates free of all charges and encumbrances subsequent to the date of sequestration, and to pay to the petitioner, jointly and severally, or severally, the sum of £150,000 sterling; or otherwise to pay to the petitioner, jointly and severally, or severally, the sum of £250,000 sterling, or such other sum as may be ascertained in the proceedings to follow hereon to be the true sum due to the petitioner on a proper accounting with, and management of, the petitioner's sequestrated estate, all in terms of sect. 86 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1856."

It was pointed out by counsel for the trustee and commissioners that the conclusions for accounting were merely ancillary to a demand for payment of money to the bankrupt himself, and for his reinstatement in his estates. It was maintained that whatever might be the bankrupt's rights under sect. 86 of the 1856 Act to call on the trustee and commissioners to account for their intromissions and management, and to make up to the estate for any monies lost through their fault (as to which no admission was made), it was clear that the bankrupt could have no title to obtain an accounting that was merely ancillary to a demand for payment to himself, which, standing the sequestration, would be illegal. The petitioner got time to consider this objection, and at a later discussion tabled an amendment designed to meet it. This amendment, however, was subsequently withdrawn. The petition therefore falls to be considered as it stands.

I am of opinion that the respondents' contention is sound both in the representation of the conclusions for accounting as merely ancillary to a demand for payment to the petitioner himself, and in the argument that, standing the sequestration, no such payment can be asked in favour of the petitioner himself. The case is a fortiori of Duke v. More, 1903, 6 F. 190, per Lord M'Laren, pp. 194, 195.

I therefore dismiss the petition, and with expenses.

It is right to add that other questions of competency and relevancy were also argued before me at great length. The trustee and commissioners maintained that the conclusions of the petition were outwith the scope of sect. 86 of the Act, in so far as (1) the accounting asked for was merely ancillary to a demand for payment of money; and (2) even if it were competent to couple a demand for payment to the trust estate with a conclusion for accounting, such demand was not competent where, as here, it was a demand for payment of damages. So far as the petition sought to saddle the existing trustee with liability for failure to call his predecessors to account for their alleged wrongous acts, a separate objection was maintained to the competency by counsel for the trustee and commissioners. Counsel for the Edinburgh Life Assurance Company argued that no warrant was afforded by sect. 86 for a petition against persons neither trustees nor commissioners, but said to be responsible for the actings of commissioners.

On the relevancy, it was maintained that in so far as the averments were specific the acts complained of were all, or most of them, matters of discretion, into which the Court would not enquire, even although the averments might be peppered with averments of fraud.

In the view I take of the case, it is not necessary for me to consider these questions, or the formidable arguments and citation of authority by which they were supported.—16*th November* 1907.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling and Ardwall.)

230. Denholm's Trustees v. Denholm's Trustees.

Succession—Testament—Construction—Subject of Gift—Gift With Power to Consume Such Portions of Capital During Lifetime of Donee as He Might Find or Think Necessary — Power to Donee to Realise, Sell and Dispose of Estate—Gift of Such Portions of Estate as Might Be Unconsumed by Donee at His Death to Trustees for Certain Purposes — Estate Realised by Donee and Immixed With Own Funds—Held (Dissenting Lord Ardwall) That Donee Had Gift of Fee Subject to Limitations, and That Onus Was on Person Claiming Estate to Shew There Was Some Unconsumed.

By mutual settlement executed by a husband and wife, the wife, in consideration of provisions made in her favour by her husband, conveyed to him, in the event of his survivance, her whole estate, "with full power to my said husband to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary, and also power to him to realise, sell and dispose of my said estates, heritable or moveable, by public roup or private bargain, as he may think proper, and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself"; and she conveyed "such portions as may be unconsumed by my said husband" to trustees at his death for certain purposes. Power was reserved to the spouses to alter the settlement during their joint lives by mutual deed, and to the survivor to do the same, "but only in so far as regards our separate estates." The husband survived. After a second marriage he executed a deed by which he revoked, so far as he competently could do so, the mutual deed above mentioned. On his death the present action was raised by the trustees nominated in the mutual deed by his first wife against the trustees nominated by the husband in his subsequent deed for an accounting. The defenders pleaded that by virtue of the terms of the mutual deed the surviving husband had a full and unlimited fee in his first wife's estate. This plea was repelled, and a proof was allowed.

Evidence was led before Lord Dundas, who held that the only portion of the deceased wife's estate unconsumed by her surviving husband at the date of his death was a bond for £6000, and gave decree in terms of the conclusions of the summons in respect of that bond, and, quoad ultra, assoilzied the defenders.

Denholm's Trustees v. Denholm's Trustees.

His Lordship added the following note to his interlocutor, viz. :—

Lord Dundas.—On 5th June 1906 I decided that, upon a sound construction of Mr and Mrs Denholm's mutual settlement, Mr Denholm did not take a full vested right in and to the whole estate of his deceased wife; and, quoad ultra, I allowed a proof. In the opinion then delivered, I pointed out that I did "not propose at present to attempt to define the limits of the restrictions upon Mr Denholm's right of fee, or those of his power to 'consume' his wife's estate." On 7th November 1906 the Second Division adhered to my interlocutor. The case is reported in 14 S.L.T. 394. All, therefore, that was determined up to that point was that Mr Denholm's right was not one of full fee; its precise nature and extent have now to be considered. It may be well to recal the terms of the sixth purpose of the mutual settlement. The words used at the outset of the clause were, standing by themselves, sufficient to confer upon Mr Denholm an absolute fee in his wife's estate. The clause continues: "With full power to my said husband to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary, and also power to him to realise, sell and dispose of my said estates, heritable or moveable, by public roup or private bargain, as he may think proper, and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself." Mrs Denholm proceeded to appoint her husband to be her sole executor; and upon his death, if he should survive her, she assigned to trustees (who are now represented by the pursuers), "All and Sundry my said estate or such portion as may be unconsumed by my said husband" in trust for the purposes thereafter specified. It seems, therefore, that what would have otherwise been an absolute fee in Mr Denholm is limited by the destination to other parties of so much of the wife's estate as might be "unconsumed" by him at his death. In Lord Stormonth-Darling's words (14 S.L.T. 396), Mr Denholm had "a right limited to sale, administration, and consumption during his lifetime." To attempt a closer definition of his right, one must, I apprehend, study the clause as a whole, and endeavour to give due weight to all its parts. On the one hand, I think that the wide expression—"and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself"—must be read so as to harmonise with the power to "consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary"; and, on the other hand, the latter phrase must be taken in conjunction with the wider words. The result, in my judgment, is that Mr Denholm was undoubtedly entitled to "consume" the whole of his wife's estate during his lifetime — though he might not dispose of it by mortis causa deed—subject to the rather unsubstantial qualification that he himself should "find or think" it necessary to do so. The word "consume" has no special or technical signification. The main idea etymologically is, I think, that of taking complete possession. Dr Johnson defines it as "to waste; to spend; to destroy." The "unconsumed" portion, if any, of Mrs Denholm's estate must, therefore, in my judgment, be represented by what now remains extant, and can be identified as having formed part of it. I was referred to cases in which clauses, more or less similar to the present, were construed by the Court. The light to be derived from these is at best indirect. It may be sufficient to allude quite briefly to two of the decisions. In Reddie's Trs., 1890, 17 R 558, a surviving widow had power under a mutual settlement "to use or encroach on the funds, means and estate hereby conveyed on either side." The Court held that these words must be "read in a reasonable sense"; that the widow was not entitled to give the estate away without consideration; but that, in so far as necessary for her maintenance, she might encroach upon the capital,—"only for herself, and not for anyone else." The language of the deed in Reddie's case was obviously much more restricted than that here under consideration. A case more nearly resembling the present is Sprot, 1855, 17 D. 840. There a husband declared that his wife, if she survived him—(which she did)—should "be at liberty to appropriate out of the stock of my said trust estate such sum or sums, from time to time, as she may find needful for her own use, over and above the free income, or as she desires to have for her own purposes and disposal, without limitation as to the amount of such sum or sums." It was held that the widow was not entitled, as in exercise of this power, to dispose of the whole estate by mortis causa deed. The Lord Justice-Clerk (Hope) pointed out that the "appropriation out of the stock . . . . clearly refers to an act of the wife, in her lifetime, taking the sums herself for her own use. Her deed of settlement is not such an act at all. She has appropriated nothing out of the stock"; but his Lordship also made it plain that the widow could, during her life, "have gone any length in the way of expenditure."

Subject, then, to the views which I have expressed, the question that arises seems to be one of fact, viz. what, if any, "portion" of Mrs Denholm's estate can be shewn to have remained extant and "unconsumed" by Mr Denholm at the time of his death? It is now admitted by the defenders—although they disputed it down to the date of their letter of 21st January 1907—that one such portion of the estate remains "unconsumed"; namely, a bond in Mrs Denholm's favour for £6000 over the estate of Press, which is described in the summons and condescendence. But it appears that the whole rest of her estate was realised by Mr Denholm during his life, and its proceeds immixed with his own funds, so as to make it impossible to identify them or trace their subsequent history. Mr Denholm was a stockbroker, and prior to 1894 had also an insurance agency. His business books were kept with regularity; but he seems to have made no private record at all of the income and out-goings, either of his own means or of his wife's estate. He had several bank accounts, and would shift money from one to another of these. When he realised successive portions of his wife's heritable estate, he immediately placed the proceeds in one or other of these accounts, immixed them with his own funds, and went on drawing upon the account for his ordinary expenditure and other purposes. Upon this general sketch of the situation, a question as to onus probandi arises. The pursuers' counsel argued that it was for the defenders to prove "consumption" by Mr Denholm so far as they could do so; that to "immix" is not necessarily to "consume"; that, as Mr Denholm had kept no private accounts, it was impossible for the defenders to prove that any definite portion of his wife's estate had been "consumed" by him; and that the pursuers were therefore entitled to receive and administer the amount of her estate as known to exist at the date of her death. I think that this argument is erroneous. It lies, in my opinion, upon those who seek to administer "such portion" of Mrs Denholm's estate "as may be unconsumed by" her husband, to identify the whole portion of it which they say is unconsumed, as they have succeeded in identifying the bond for £6000. It is true that Mr Denholm was his wife's executor; but he was also the fiar (subject to the qualifications already explained) in her estate. He was not, I apprehend, under any obligation to keep account of that estate, though it would have been more regular to do so. He intromitted with her estate and mixed it with his own; and if the pursuers are, in these circumstances, unable—as I think they are—to trace or identify it (with the exception of the bond) they fail, in my judgment, to discharge the onus of proving that it remained "unconsumed" at Mr Denholm's death. Now, the nature and value of Mrs Denholm's estate at her death are shewn in a statement, No. 10 of process, to which I shall afterwards have to allude more particularly. The correctness of the statement is impugned upon certain heads by both parties, but may be held as sufficient for present purposes. If one discards the bond for £6000, which remains "unconsumed," a balance of jus relictæ from the estate of Mrs Denholm's former husband, and "paraphernal effects" of trifling value, it appears that that lady's estate consisted, at her death, of three heritable properties. The first of these—a house in Manor Place—was sold by Mr Denholm in 1895 and the price placed immediately in one of his bank accounts. I may observe in passing that I think the pursuers have failed to prove in fact that a part of these proceeds was used in paying off a bond for £917 or thereby upon another property belonging to Mr Denholm; and further that, even if the alleged application of this money had been established, I should have been disposed to hold that Mr Denholm had "consumed" it within the meaning of the settlement. In 1900, the subjects in High Street were acquired by the Corporation of Edinburgh; and the property in South Bridge had been sold by Mr Denholm in the previous year. In both of these cases, as in that of Manor Place, the price was placed by Mr Denholm in bank, and immixed with his other funds. In my opinion, Mr Denholm thus "consumed" his wife's estate (except the bond), according to the ordinary use of the word, and its meaning in the mutual settlement. But the pursuers' counsel argued that it would be little short of absurdity to say that Mr Denholm could "find or think" it necessary to "consume" the whole of his wife's estate,—excepting the said bond. It was, they urged, proved that he had a stockbroking business worth not less than £2000 a year, besides heritable properties of his own; and in 1899 he succeeded to a fortune of about £27,000 under the will of a Mrs Booth. I think that Mr Denholm's professional income is overstated at the above figure; but the truth is that, as Mr Cockburn Miller frankly puts it, "it is somewhat difficult to determine accurately the position of a man who has not made a balance-sheet shewing his own affairs, and I don't know if we have knowledge of all his assets or liabilities." Further, it appears to be at least highly probable that, when Mr Denholm sold the Manor Place house in 1895, he might "find or think" it necessary to use and consume the price for his own purposes; because his assets consisted chiefly of heritage, and of certain bank stock which he utilised as cover against overdrafts on his account. A similar observation may, I think, be fairly made as to the sales of Mrs Denholm's other two properties and the "consumption" of their prices by Mr Denholm; for he had not, it seems, actually received any part of his succession from Mrs Booth's estate until after the completion of these transactions. There is at all events no evidence to shew that Mr Denholm did not find or think it necessary to consume the estate which he had in fact mixed with his own funds. The pursuers' counsel presented a further argument, based upon the statement No. 10 of process to which I have already referred. This statement is continued in Mr Denholm's ledger, and is signed by him as being as near as possible a correct statement of the estate of his late wife at the date of her death, "and is engrossed here with reference to the directions expressed in my will, dated 17th April 1902." This will is a very lengthy document, and seems to have been the outcome of deliberations between the testator and his law agent, extending over a series of years. It contains a clause of forfeiture directed against his two daughters and his stepson in the event (which has not occurred) of any of them raising questions, inter alia, "with reference to the distribution or division of the estate left by their mother, my wife, or taking exception or making any objection to the amount thereof as the same may be set forth in any statement subscribed by me." The pursuers' counsel maintained that Mr Denholm's subscription of No. 10 of process, coupled with the clause just quoted, sufficiently instruct an intention on his part that the amount or value of the estate belonging to Mrs Denholm at her death should, upon his death, pass to the trustees of her own will, for the purposes expressed by her in the mutual settlement, notwithstanding his intromissions with it during his life. I leave out of account entirely such fragments of oral testimony as exist in the proof as to Mr Denholm's expressions of intention in regard to his wife's estate. Such passages, if competent—which I doubt—are quite vague and inconclusive. In my opinion, the documents founded upon are not sufficient to rebut the strong presumption, arising from the facts of the case, that Mr Denholm intended to consume, as in my judgment he actually did consume, during his lifetime, the whole of his wife's estate, except the bond for £6000. The evidence discloses that Mr Denholm was made fully aware by his successive law agents, Mr Dalziel and Mr Kerr, of his powers of consumption, and that he deliberately abstained from putting his wife's estate beyond those powers by creating a separate trust. Further, it is made clear by Mr Kerr's evidence that the purpose for which the statement No. 10 of process was prepared and subscribed was not that which was suggested in the argument for the pursuers. Mr Kerr states that he had no knowledge of Mr Denholm's dealings with his wife's estate; but that he advised him to put upon record a definite statement of the amount of it, as received by him at her death, "to prevent any question when he was dead. The real purpose was to fix the amount of the estate as at her death as received by him, so that there might be no question by beneficiaries coming forward and saying, 'This is far more than the sum our mother left.'" I confess that I am unable to understand from Mr Kerr's evidence—the truth of which I accept implicitly—the precise idea which he had in mind in so advising Mr Denholm; but whatever the idea may have been, Mr Kerr's statements establish beyond question that it was not in order to secure that the original amount of Mrs Denholm's estate should be taken out of Mr Denholm's estate, so as to be made subject to the trust purposes of her settlement. I may add that, in considering the case, doubts have occurred to my mind as to the admissibility of Mr Kerr's evidence upon this matter, though no objection to its competency was suggested by the pursuers' counsel either at the proof or in his speech at its conclusion. But, for the reasons stated, I should arrive at the same result apart altogether from Mr Kerr's evidence. Upon the whole matter, therefore, I think that the pursuers are entitled to decree substantially in terms of the conclusion of the summons for declarator and delivery; and that, quoad ultra, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

I have not found it necessary to advert in detail to the evidence given by the accountants engaged on either side. But I may say that these gentlemen appear to have gone into the whole case, upon such materials as were available, with great ability and industry; and I have not failed to study carefully their oral evidence, and the numerous "States" which they produced as explanatory of and relative to the same.

The pursuers reclaimed.

Argued for Reclaimers: Mr Denholm was a liferenter with power to consume and administer. Consumption implied a personal user. It must be to fill a need, not to make up businees books. It must be shewn that he had applied his mind to the matter and found encroachment on the capital of his wife's estate was necessary. The onus was on the defenders to prove consumption of all portions of the estate which were not forthcoming, and to shew the purposes for which they were consumed. Mr Denholm's duty as administrator was to account or prove consumption. Counsel referred to Houldsworth v. Brand's Trs., 1875, 2 R. 683 at 690; In re Thomson's Estate, 1879, 13 Chan. Div. 144; Reddie's Trs. v. Lindsay, 1890, 17 R. 558 at 564; Sprot v. Pennycook, 1855, 17 D. 840 at 850, 853.

Argued for Respondents: The onus of proof was on the reclaimers. Mr Denholm had power to do what he liked with his wife's estate during his lifetime. He was not a mere liferenter, and was not bound to keep accounts. Consumption was completed by conversion and appropriation. The proper distinction was between capital hoarded and capital used for reproduction. That was the sense in which John Stuart Mill used the word consume, and it was the proper sense to employ here.

The Court (dissenting Lord Ardwall) adhered.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case is not unattended with difficulty, as is demonstrated by the fact that there is a difference of opinion between your Lordships upon it. Your Lordships have both very fully and very clearly stated the grounds of the opinions you have formed, and by your kindness I have had an opportunity of considering these opinions. Before doing so I had arrived at the conclusion that it could not be held in this case that there was any ground for holding that the funds which are in question had not been consumed by the deceased Mr Denholm during his life, and that having been so consumed the demand made in this case cannot receive effect, as I hold he was entitled to consume as he did, and was not bound to keep accounts by which the mode and details of consumption should be capable of ascertainment. Having considered your Lordships' opinions, I have come to the conclusion that my view formed on consideration is right. And as Lord Stormonth-Darling's carefully formed and expressed opinion expresses very fully and exactly my views on the case, I feel it to be unnecessary to restate them at length.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—This case came before this Division more than a year ago, and was then heard by Lord Kyllachy, Lord Low, and myself. What we then decided, affirming the Lord Ordinary, was that on a sound construction of the mutual settlement by the spouses, the late Mr Denholm did not take a full and unlimited right of fee in the estate of his first wife. I then said, delivering the judgment of the Court, that, taking all the clauses of the deed together, "their true effect was to cut down the absolute right of fee originally conferred on the husband, not to a liferent (because a liferent would have been inconsistent with the powers which she (the wife) wished him to have), but to a right limited to sale, administration, and consumption during his lifetime." The Lord Ordinary has now taken a proof, and, as the result of it, has in substance found that the whole estate of the first wife, with the exception of a bond for £6000 over the heritable estate of the husband, was "consumed" by him during his lifetime, within the meaning of the mutual settlement. I think the Lord Ordinary is right.

If the passage I have quoted from the former judgment of this Court be well-founded (and it was not challenged), there was an absolute right of fee originally conferred on the husband by the wife's conveyance. It is not qualified in any way, by trust or otherwise. It is a conveyance of "my whole estates," under burden of debts, as well as of certain annuities which the lady creates by the settlement, and under burden also of maintaining and educating her whole children, including her son by a former marriage. Then follow certain powers which, as we formerly found, were truly rather limitations of the husband's rights than powers properly so called, and, in the event of his surviving her, she appoints him her sole executor. Consistently with that, the trust conveyance which she goes on to make to her own trustees at her husband's death is limited to "my said estate, or such portion as may be unconsumed by my said husband." The conveyance to the husband, therefore, is in point of title absolute, and differs in that respect from the right conferred on the wife in the English case cited by Mr C. D. Murray of In re Thomson's Estate, 1879, 13 Ch. D. 144, where it was controlled by the words "for the term of her natural life," although words were added which gave the wife some power of disposition over the capital. These words were, "To be disposed of as she may think proper for her own use and benefit according to the nature and quality thereof, subject only to the payment of my just debts and funeral expenses and the charge of proving and registering this my will." The practical effect of this form of conveyance was as nearly as possible the same as Mrs Denholm's conveyance here. But in point of title the Court could not hold that the donee of this power had anything but a life interest, or any right to affect by testamentary instrument what remained undisposed of at her death, which was what the donee in that case tried to do. Here there was no such attempt by Mr Denholm, for he did not try to take advantage of the circumstance that his title was absolute in point of form. I agree that the attempt would have been unsuccessful if he had made it, because of the limitation of his powers to consumption during his lifetime; and there was no real repugnancy between that limitation and the absolute nature of the title.

But that leaves untouched the question, What was the meaning of the "full power to my said husband to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary" which Mrs Denholm gave him? It may be that such a power is exceptional and, if you like, rather anomalous. It does not fit in exactly with our ideas of either fee or liferent. But it was used by a testatrix who had plainly unbounded confidence in her husband (as shewn, e.g., by her entrusting him with the maintenance and education of her son by a former marriage and making him guardian of the boy), and she must also be taken to have known that, although he was a landowner, and living at a very bountiful rate, he was a stockbroker and liable to considerable risks in business. Accordingly, when she made him the absolute judge of what parts or portions of her estate (amounting in all to between £10,000 and £11,000 in houses and money) it was "necessary" for him to "consume" during his lifetime, and what portion he was to leave "unconsumed" at his death, I think she was doing a very different thing from giving the net income of her whole estate to trustees and superadding a discretionary power to them to encroach upon capital as they might deem necessary, which was what the husband did in his part of this mutual deed. I therefore attach no importance, except as affecting mutuality, to the recital with which the wife's conveyance opens: "In like manner, and in consideration of what is before written." The two conveyances, so far as affecting construction, must each be regulated by its own terms. And therefore, when the Lord Ordinary comes to the conclusion that the "unconsumed" portion of Mrs Denholm's estate must be represented by what now remains extant, and can be identified as having formed part of it, I cannot but agree with him. Mr Robertson-Durham, after a careful examination of the documents in process and of the books kept by the late Mr Denholm, shewing his financial transactions, is asked whether he can identify any of the estate extant at his death as belonging to his wife. And his answer is: "Only the £6000 bond over Press; everything else, so far as I can follow the items, was consumed by Mr Denholm, immixed with his estate and swallowed up."

Now, it is not disputed by the wife's trustees that her estate, both heritable and moveable, was in point of fact realised and immixed with the husband's funds by being paid into his various bank accounts, and that it is impossible now to trace the proceeds. The case would have been different if all that the husband did, when he realised the house property belonging to his wife, had been to reinvest the proceeds in some other recognisable form. That might not have been "consuming" the proceeds any more than if he had put them into the traditional old stocking and had kept them there. But what he did was not that. He used the money to pay off debt and reduce overdrafts, and he dealt with it generally in such a way that the most skilled accountants cannot tell what became of it in the end. For aught I know, this very impossibility of tracing the proceeds may account for the extremely wide terms of Mrs Denholm's part of the will. Knowing that her husband was immersed in fairly large money transactions, that he had several bank accounts (frequently overdrawn), that his landed and house property was burdened, and that he had need of capital both for his own and his clients' purposes, she may have wished to give no third party the right to enquire what he did with her money any more than with his own, and so may have used an indefinite term to cover his use of the money in any way that he found most for his advantage. Certainly I cannot accept the reclaimers' main argument, viz., that "consumption" means only personal user, for it seems to me that that, besides creating at the outset the difficulty of settling what "personal user" means, would be giving no effect to the words "as he may find or think necessary," which are the words of the will. Nor do I think that this difficulty is got over by implying some vague kind of trust, where trust there is none. There is always, of course, the ultimate arbitrament of conscience. But I must say, in fairness to the late Mr Denholm, that nothing has either been established by the proof, or advanced in argument, to shew that there was any failure on his part to observe the rules of good conscience as regards the beneficiaries ultimately and contingently called under his wife's part of the settlement. By his own will he seems to have dealt with them all (his stepson as well as his own two daughters) as one family. By that instrument he no doubt mentions provisions as made both by her and himself for their children, and there is a clause of forfeiture of any share or interest under his own will in the event of any of the children making any claim (inconsistent with his will) or raising any question about a statement subscribed by him relative to her estate at the date of her death. But that statement merely referred (and referred, apparently, with substantial accuracy) to the different items of her property, heritable and moveable, and does not of course touch the question in any way of what Mr Denholm was entitled to do by way of consumption of his wife's estate during his own life. I do not therefore see that either the statement No. 10 of process or the passages in Mr Denholm's own will materially affect the only question of importance in the case, viz., whether the husband did "consume" the wife's estate by using it to pay his debts, and so making it impossible of identification.

I think that the test proposed by Mr Constable for the husband's trustees is the true one, viz. whether the husband was bound to keep accounts of his wife's estate. And I think there is no ground for saying that he was. If he was not so bound there is an end of the argument that the mutual will contained anything in the nature of a trust or quasi trust. I demur altogether to the notion that although Mr Denholm may not have been bound himself to keep accounts, his trustees are under an obligation to account to his wife's trustees for anything except the bond for £6000. Beyond that, what are they to account for, and where are the materials for enabling them to do so? It is suggestsd that the document No. 10 of process forms an acknowledgment under Mr Denholm's own hand that, to the extent of the difference between the sum of £6000 in the bond and the sum of £10,000 which he acknowledges to have received as the net amount of his late wife's estate at the date of her death, he never "consumed" his wife's estate, or intended to consume it. That seems to me rather a strong inference to draw from a document made out alio intuitu altogether. It is also an attempt to divert the question from the construction of Mrs Denholm's will in 1893 to the meaning to be attached to a jotting of Mr Denholm's made with reference to his own will in 1902. But the strongest objection to the suggested inference is that the fact of consumption or non-consumption is to be ascertained, not from ambiguous declarations, but from positive acts of his own.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary that the onus probandi lies on the pursuers. It is for them to shew that there was any portion of the wife's estate "unconsumed" at the husband's death: it is the very groundwork of their title. They have had no difficulty in shewing that with respect to the £6000 bond, because it remained exactly as it was at the lady's death. But quoad ultra they have, in my judgment, failed to shew that any portion remained unconsumed when their trust title emerged; and on the whole matter I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Ardwall.—This is an action raised by the trustees of the deceased Mrs Denholm against the trustees of her husband the deceased George Denholm. It concludes, first, for declarator regarding a sum of £6000 contained in a heritable bond by Mr Denholm in favour of his wife; the Lord Ordinary has granted decree in terms of that conclusion, and the defenders acquiesce therein. The second conclusion of the action is for count, reckoning and payment, whereby the amount due by Mr Denholm at the time of his death to the pursuers may be determined. A proof has been led with reference to this conclusion, and it has now to be decided whether, under the mutual settlement of Mr and Mrs Denholm, dated 10th November 1891, the pursuers, who are Mrs Denholm's trustees under that settlement, are entitled to the accounting and payment they ask.

The important facts seem to be as follows:—

On 10th November 1891 Mr and Mrs Denholm executed the mutual settlement under consideration. Mrs Denholm died in 1893. She left heritable estate which, after discharging the bonds secured over it, realised about £4752, the bond for £6000 above referred to, and a small amount of money, in all about £10,100. The details of the estate are given with sufficient accuracy in the statement signed and authenticated by Mr Denholm in reference to his own will, to which I shall afterwards refer.

At Whitsunday 1895 Mr Denholm sold the house 43 Manor Place, Edinburgh, which had belonged to his wife, at a price which, after paying the bond thereon and expenses, left £2690. At Whitsunday 1899 he sold the one-half of the property 92 South Bridge at a price which, after paying expenses, left £1482. The High Street property was compulsorily taken by the Corporation of Edinburgh in pursuance of an Improvement Scheme in August 1900, and the value of Mrs Denholm's half thereof, after deducting expenses, amounted to about £580. The proceeds of all these properties were at once carried into one or other of Mr Denholm's three bank accounts and merged with his other funds. It is explained by the accountants who examined his books that he kept no private accounts of his expenses of living, education of children, or anything else, so that it cannot be said what he spent year by year in these ways. It is important to notice, however, that long before his wife's death he was possessed of capital to the amount of about £5000, and that in February 1899 he succeeded to a sum of £27,000 under the will of a certain Mrs Booth. On 17th April 1902 he made a will, in which he revoked the mutual settlement so far as regarded his own estate, and gave directions with regard to it, and shortly after he drew up the statement already referred to and had it engrossed in one of his books with reference to the directions expressed in his will. He adopted the statement and docquet as holograph, and, in addition, had it witnessed by his cashier. At his death Mr Denholm's estate was found to amount to about £40,000. He had been, from the time of his marriage to Mrs Denholm onwards, in business as a stockbroker, and it is estimated that he had a professional income, generally speaking, of about £2000 a year, but, as he speculated a good deal on his own account, it is difficult to say precisely what his annual income was, and possibly the figures above given as to his capital at various times and at his death are sufficient for the purposes of this case.

From the above statement it appears that the only portion of Mrs Denholm's estate which can now be said to exist in forma specifica is the £6000, about which there is now no question. The whole of the rest of her estate was immixed with her husband's funds and may be regarded as having been invested in his business, because although it appears, so far as the direct application of it was concerned, to have been used for general expenses, yet, by so using it, Mr Denholm was enabled to keep more money in his business. It is now indistinguishable from the rest of Mr Denholm's estate, but, if the defenders are bound to account for it to the pursuers, there seems no practical difficulty in recovering it, as Mr Denholm's estate is well able to pay the whole amount sued for.

On these facts the Lord Ordinary has held that the whole estate of Mrs Denholm, "with the exception of the bond for £6000, was consumed by the late George Denholm, her husband, within the meaning of the mutual settlement referred to on the record"; and he says in his note that the question is what portion of Mrs Denholm's estate can be shewn to have remained extant and unconsumed by Mr Denholm at the time of his death.

I cannot agree with the view taken by the Lord Ordinary and now concurred in by your Lordships. This case was formerly brought before this Division on a reclaiming note by the defenders, and it was then decided (see 1907 S.C., p. 61) that under the said mutual settlement the husband "did not take a full and unlimited right of fee in the whole estate of the wife," and the first question to be determined is, What was the nature of the husband's right in that estate? In my opinion he was constituted a trustee upon the said estate, in the first place for payment of Mrs Denholm's debts, deathbed and funeral expenses, and executry expenses; second, for paying her two aunts free annuities of £10 sterling each at Whitsunday and Martinmas in each year, and for the purpose of maintaining and educating the whole of her children out of the income of the estate. It is not said that Mr Denholm is to have a liferent of the estate subject to these burdens, but I think that must be held as implied.

With regard to the capital, there are two powers given to Mr Denholm. First, the power of consuming such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he might think necessary—in other words, a power of encroachment—on the construction of which this case largely turns; and second, a power of administering and using the estate. Then upon the death of her husband, should he survive her, Mrs Denholm dispones and assigns to certain trustees who are the pursuers in this action "All and Sundry my said estate or such portion as may be unconsumed by" her husband in trust for certain purposes which are therein specified. I think it plain that these provisions have the effect of placing the husband in the position of a trustee with very large powers of administration and use of the estate, but with a limited power of consumption, and the result in law is that should he use the estate by mixing it up with his own, or taking investments in his own name, his trustees would, notwithstanding, be liable to account for that estate upon his death subject only to deduction of such portions as they could shew to have been consumed in terms of the only power to encroach on capital conferred by the deed.

From the provisions above recited it is, I think, apparent that the husband as trustee was bound to defray out of the income of the estate the life annuities and the expense of maintaining and educating the children, and this could only be done by his retaining the capital of the estate and applying the income to these purposes. The only power given to him to encroach upon the capital I shall afterwards more particularly consider; but it is plain that so far as not consumed in terms of the power, the testatrix intended that the whole of the capital of the estate, however dealt with under the power of administration, should be available for the purposes of her trust after her husband's death, to carry out which trust she appointed trustees in succession to him.

I have difficulty in understanding what view the Lord Ordinary takes of the character in which Mr Denholm held his wife's estate, but he has apparently reached the conclusion that under the combined powers of consumption and administration Mr Denholm was entitled, as soon after his wife's death as he pleased, to realise her whole estate and mix it with his own funds, and thus free himself and his executors from all obligation whatever to account for it to the beneficiaries under the mutual settlement. I do not think that this view is tenable. It is, I think, at variance with the former decision in this case, because it results in this, that while by the general scheme of the deed the husband had not an absolute right to the fee, yet under the powers in the same deed he could at once secure such right to himself as soon as he pleased after the death of his wife by the simple process of realising the estate and mixing it with his own and thus defeat the whole of the carefully-drawn provisions with regard to the use to which the income and finally the capital of the estate were to be put. The Lord Ordinary adverts to the dispositive clause as helping to lead to this result. It is as follows:—"I, the said Sarah Louisa Liddall MacLaren or Denholm, do hereby give, grant, assign and dispone to the said George Denholm, my husband, in the event of his surviving me, All and Sundry my whole estates, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever description, together with the whole writs, titles and instructions thereof, but under burden always," etc. Now I would point out that the terms of this gift are of little importance in the present question, because they are the terms in which almost every trust disposition is granted, and are as near as may be the same terms as Mr Denholm himself uses in giving his part of the trust estate over to his trustees, and although Mr Denholm is not named a trustee, yet if the directions given him and the powers and duties entrusted to him were those appertaining to trustees, I do not think that his character as such is altered by what the Lord Ordinary calls the absolute terms in which the disposition is granted. Mr Denholm by the deed is nominated his wife's "executor," and it has been decided that if an executor is charged with duties implying a continuing trust he is in the same position as if he had been nominated a trustee (Ainslie v. Ainslie, 1886, 14 R. 209). In the next place, it appears to me that the Lord Ordinary has mixed up with the power to consume the power of realising and administering the estate, which is a totally separate power, and ought not, in my opinion, to be confused with the very special power given Mr Denholm to consume the capital thereof which precedes it.

I will now proceed to consider what is the meaning and effect of the clause giving power to consume capital.

1. I first take the clause by itself, prefixing, however, the words which immediately precede it in the mutual settlement, and which I think are not unimportant. It is in these terms: "Also under burden of maintaining my whole children, including the said William Benjamin Liddall MacLaren, until they are capable of maintaining themselves, and of educating them in a manner befitting their station, with full power to my said husband to consume such parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he may find or think necessary." The word "consume," I take it, simply means to use up, but it is a word which is appropriate to the use by way of supporting or keeping in comfort a husband or children, and is not so appropriate as an expression equivalent to squandering and dilapidating an estate. In Mr Denholm's part of the mutual settlement, which I shall presently advert to, the trustees are directed to pay over parts of the capital to Mrs Denholm, but of course Mr Denholm being himself the trustee, it would have been ridiculous to direct him to pay over to himself, and accordingly the power takes the form of a power "to consume" such parts or portions, etc., the capital being in his own hands. But the power given is not to consume such parts of the capital as he may think proper, or as he may please, but as "he may find or think necessary." Effect must be given to these last words, and the only reasonable effect which can be given to them is to hold that they limit the husband's power of consuming to what he might find or think necessary for the comfortable maintenance of himself and his own and his wife's children. It would be doing violence to these words to hold that they could possibly apply to such a cause as mixing the whole of his wife's estate with his own, or that his doing so can be held in any sense to be an exercise of the limited power of consumption conferred on him.

2. This settlement, however, is a mutual settlement, and although there was a power of revocation given to the husband which he has exercised with regard to his part, yet the original mutual deed should be read as one, and being a mutual settlement it ought to be so interpreted as to render the provisions made by the husband and wife in favour of each other respectively as nearly as possible counterparts of each other. This observation is applicable to all mutual settlements. It is so more particularly in this case, because the provision made by Mrs Denholm in favour of her husband which is now under consideration is introduced by these words: "And in like manner, and in consideration of what is before written, I, the said Sarah Louisa Liddall MacLaren or Denholm, do hereby," etc.

Taking then, first, the provisions under the fourth head of Mr Denholm's part of the mutual settlement, we find them to be these. (1) The net income of his whole estate, under burden of certain annuities, is to be paid to his wife as an alimentary allowance for herself and "our children"; then follows this clause: "And my trustees are hereby authorised to pay over to her from time to time for her use such portion or portions of the capital of the said residue as my trustees may deem necessary, or which they think she may require, she being always bound to maintain our said children, and that until they are capable of maintaining themselves, and to educate them in a manner befitting their station." I have above quoted the corresponding clause in Mrs Denholm's part of the deed, and comparing these two clauses, I remark that the contemplation of the later clause in the deed is that the capital of the estate shall be preserved for the ultimate beneficiaries except such portion, not as her husband may consume, but as he may find or think necessary to consume. This is almost in terms the same direction as is given to the trustees by the first portion of the deed, and I think it would do violence to the intentions of both parties to the deed—and it is a mutual one—to hold that the husband was entitled to squander or appropriate all his wife's estate as he pleased without ever putting the question to himself whether the consumption of capital was necessary presumably for the purposes of the needful expenses of himself and the children. It will be noticed that what the trustees in the former part of the deed are bound to do, is to pay over to Mrs Denholm such parts of the capital as they may deem necessary or which they think she may require, and my opinion is that the power given to Mr Denholm was not intended to be a whit wider than that given to the trustees; in other words, that the power given to Mr Denholm to consume parts or portions of the capital during his lifetime as he might find or think necessary was a limited power only, a power to be exercised sub modo, although the duty is put upon himself and not other trustees to act as a good trustee ought to act, and as the trustees in his own portion of the deed are directed to act.

But now follows a clause which, I think, has been mixed up by the Lord Ordinary with the power to consume capital, but which has nothing to do with it, being concerned with a wholly different power, namely, of administration. That clause is in the following terms: "As also power to him to realise, sell and dispose of my said estates, heritable or moveable, by public roup or private bargain as he may think proper, and in general to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself." It will be noticed that this clause is introduced by the words "and also," and that it deals with a power which seems to be purposely kept quite distinct from the power to consume given in the immediately preceding clause. I think, therefore, that it cannot be supposed that the words "to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself" apply at all to the power to consume, but only to the power of realising, sale, and administration. A power of administration and reinvestment will be found in almost every trust deed, but the peculiarity of the power under consideration is that while in the ordinary case trustees are by law strictly prohibited from using trust funds for their own purposes or investing them in their own businesses, in the present case Mr Denholm has practically unlimited power of using and investing the money, just, in fact, as if for these purposes it was his own, as the power indeed sets forth, and I cannot help thinking that it was the intention of both parties by this clause to enable Mr Denholm to invest in his own business, directly or indirectly, such portions of his wife's realised estate as he thought proper. This of course would be a great convenience to him in carrying on the business of a stockbroker, but the fact that he did so invest it in his business through his bank accounts, cannot reasonably be held to have the effect of absolving him from all obligation to account for money so invested to those who ultimately have the beneficial right to it. I accordingly am of opinion that this clause adds nothing whatever to the power to consume portions of the capital, and indeed has nothing to do with it. And as matter of construction I consider it out of the question to hold that the words "to deal and intromit therewith as freely as I could have done myself," are to be tacked on to the clause giving power to the husband to consume such portion of the capital as he might think necessary. It was doubtless with the view of giving Mr Denholm full power to change these investments, and, if he pleased, to have the command of this money during his lifetime for the purposes of his business, that the power took the somewhat unusual form it did; but I think that a sound construction of the whole of this part of the deed, keeping always in view the provision made by Mr Denholm himself regarding his capital, is that Mr Denholm should have the use of the income of the estate, for the word "liferent" is used in no part of the deed; that he should be entitled to consume such portions of the capital as he might think or find necessary, and should have practically unlimited power to handle the estate and invest it in such way as he pleased. I therefore revert to what I have already said, that the deed, by first giving an absolute disposition and then inserting provisions which imply, as has been held by the former decision, limitations on the absolute right, has truly the effect of placing Mr Denholm in the position of a trustee with power to encroach on the capital of the estate should he think or find it necessary for certain purposes, and with the widest powers to invest and use the rest of the capital as he pleased during his lifetime, but subject, of course, to an obligation to account for such capital to the ultimate beneficiaries—an obligation, I may observe, not the least inconsistent with the right to use the capital in his business or otherwise and to mix it with his own funds.

If I am right in what I have already said, I think it follows that the defenders are bound to account to the pursuers, as Mrs Denholm's trustees under the mutual settlement, for the whole value of Mrs Denholm's estate except such part thereof as they can shew to have been consumed under the power to consume which I have just been dealing with. In all cases where trustees or persons in the position of trustees are charged with the management and administration of funds belonging to a deceased person, it is undoubted that it is for them to account for those funds to persons having the ultimate beneficial interest in the reversion; and if they cannot shew affirmatively that capital funds have been properly consumed or used under the powers in the trust deed, they must make good these funds out of the general estate of the trustee in the event of his death if such estate is sufficient for the purpose.

Now there is no doubt here of the sufficiency of the estate, for Mr Denholm left some £40,000, and the fact that under the power of administration in the trust deed he mixed his wife's funds with his own cannot absolve his trustees from the obligation to account. It appears to me, I must say, absurd to hold that they can escape that obligation merely because Mr Denholm mixed his wife's estate with his own, and because that estate accordingly does not now exist in its original form. I can find nothing in the scheme of the mutual settlement to countenance such an extraordinary result.

But I think that the pursuer's case derives great support from a consideration of Mr Denholm's will and the statement which is incorporated and practically forms part of it. I may first observe that Mr Denholm having left the sum I have mentioned, and having been all his life apparently in prosperous circumstances, and all along having had considerable capital at his command, there was really no necessity for him to consume any portion of the capital of his wife's estate, and there are indications in some parts of the oral evidence, the competency of which I cannot admit, that it was not his wish to do so. But a consideration of the deeds I have referred to, I think, makes it plain that not only did he never exercise the power to consume the estate, but never intended to do so, and was under the belief that after his death the whole of the capital of Mrs Denholm's estate as at her death should be and would be disposed of in terms of her part of the mutual disposition and settlement. Mr Denholm's will is dated 17th April 1902. It sets forth the reserved power to revoke in the mutual settlement as regarded the separate estate of each party, and that his estate had been very considerably increased since the date of the mutual settlement. The deed then proceeds thus: "All which make it highly expedient that I should execute a new will giving expression to my wishes as regards the disposal of my means and estate after my death." He then defines that estate, and says that it is to be referred to hereinafter as the "trust estate." It may be mentioned that Mrs Denholm had been previously married to a Mr MacLaren, and that her son of that marriage, named William Benjamin Liddall MacLaren, survived both Mr and Mrs Denholm. Then by her marriage with Mr Denholm Mrs Denholm had two daughters, both of whom survived their parents. In Mr Denholm's will the following provisions occur: "Further, I specially declare that in the event of my daughters, or either of them, or my stepson, the said William Benjamin Liddall MacLaren, raising any question with reference to the distribution or division of the trust estate, or taking exception or making any objection to my power to revoke said mutual settlement, or claiming that any part of the trust estate falls thereunder or is thereby in any way regulated, or raising any question with reference to the distribution or division of the estate left by their mother, my wife, or taking exception or making any objection to the amount thereof, as the same may be set forth in any statement subscribed by me, they or any of them raising such questions regarding such distribution or division, or taking exception or making any objection or claiming as aforesaid, with reference either to the trust estate or to the estate of their mother, shall forfeit right, not only for themselves, herself or himself, but also for their, his, or her issue in and to any share of or interest in the trust estate as aforesaid, which shall thereupon accresce to the other beneficiaries in their order and in terms of this my will and any codicil thereto."

The statement referred to in the foregoing passage is the statement No. 10 of process. It sets forth the whole net value of Mrs Denholm's estate at the date of her death (being over £10,000), and appended to it is the following docquet:—

"The above is as near as possible a correct statement of the estate of my late wife at the date of her death, and is engrossed here with reference to the directions expressed in my will, dated 17th April 1902.

"The above adopted as holograph.

"(Signed) GEORGE DENHOLM.

"(Signed) William Dickison, witness, cashier to George Denholm."

But although it is, as it professes to be, a statement of Mrs Denholm's estate "at the date of her death," it is clear from the directions expressed in Mr Denholm's will, and which the statement is signed with reference to, that Mr Denholm intended that the whole amount there set forth should be regarded as the estate of his wife and as falling under the mutual disposition and settlement executed by her. No other satisfactory construction can be put on the passage in his will, taken along with the statement. He refers to the possibility of his stepson jeopardising "the provisions made for him by his mother and myself." It will be noticed that what he provides against is any of the children raising questions with reference to the distribution or division of "the estate left by my wife"; not the balance or the unconsumed portion of "my wife's estate," but the "estate left by my wife," and he fixes the amount of it by a reference to the statement. Now the three heritable properties belonging to his wife had been realised and the proceeds carried into Mr Denholm's bank accounts in the years 1895, 1899, and 1900, and now in 1902 he treats the whole of his wife's estate as extant and as subject to the provisions of her settlement, and he warns her children under penalties against calling in question the amount of that estate as set forth by him in the statement under his hand. I think these propositions are legitimate inferences from the paragraph above quoted from the will, taken in connection with the statement I have referred to. First, That by the phrase "the estate of their mother" or "the estate left by their mother," is meant the estate set forth in the separate statement above referred to, amounting, as therein stated, to £10,100; second, that the trust estate (that is, the estate dealt with by Mr Denholm in his will) excludes and is contrasted with the estate of Mrs Denholm, or, as it is called, the estate of their mother; third, that Mr Denholm regarded the amount of his wife's estate as defined in the separate statement as still extant and falling to be dealt with under the mutual settlement, Mr Denholm's own trust estate being dealt with by his will.

I do not think it is possible to have clearer evidence that Mr Denholm considered that he had not consumed any part of his wife's estate in the sense now contended for by the defenders, and that, notwithstanding that he had taken the use of it in his business and otherwise by throwing a great part of it into his bank accounts, he contemplated that it should be dealt with after his death as his wife's separate estate, and that his trustees should account to Mrs Denholm's trustees for the amount set forth in the statement referred to which is signed with reference to his will, and which includes all the monies which for many years before had been mixed with his own funds, and could not be traced as separate sums of money. I consider it manifest from this that Mr Denholm did not consider that he had consumed any part of his wife's estate or exercised the power to do so, and this, I think, is the best evidence we can have that he did not, in the words of the mutual settlement, "find or think necessary" to consume any portion of it, and never supposed for one moment that the effect of his taking the use of the money was equivalent to "consuming" it.

On the whole matter I am of opinion first, that the power to consume such parts or portions of his wife's estate as he might find or think necessary, was a power to be exercised sub modo and as a conscientious trustee would exercise it; second, that there is no evidence that Mr Denholm ever exercised that power or ever found or thought it necessary to do so. On the contrary, there is to be found in his own will and the statement referred to therein the best evidence now possible that he did not consider that he had either consumed or appropriated his wife's estate to any extent; third, that Mr Denholm's using the proceeds of the realised portions of his wife's estate in his own business and for his own purposes, while legitimate under the very wide powers of use and administration given to him, does not absolve his trustees from accounting for the value of his wife's estate although that may no longer exist in forma specifica, the estate left by him, which includes ex hypothesi the proceeds of part of his wife's estate, being amply sufficient to allow for the payment of the amount of his wife's estate to the pursuers, who are the persons entitled to administer it under the mutual trust disposition and settlement.

I am accordingly of opinion that the latter part of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor should be recalled, and that the defenders should be ordered to lodge an account bringing out the amount of the capital of Mrs Denholm's estate as at this date, subject to all burdens and expenses properly chargeable against it.—29th November 1907.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

(Reported supra, p. 460.)

The Petitioner reclaimed and argued: The pleadings as a whole were sufficient to shew that no enquiry was necessary. They shewed that the petitioner was living apart from her husband, and that she was doing so with his consent. The passages in the answers referred to by the Lord Ordinary were inconsistent with the general tenor of the answers. There was no averment that the wife had deserted her husband, and therefore his consent to their living apart must be presumed. The husband's curatorial duty to his wife was to protect her from suffering damage from her own acts, and there was no averment that the sale of the business would be to her detriment (Bryce, 1878, 5 R. 722 at p. 728). There was sufficient material in the averments to justify an application to the Court to exercise its discretionary power and dispense with the husband's consent (Niven, 1883, 20 S.L.R. 587).

Argued for Respondent: The respondent in his answers clearly averred a case of no consent. He averred four occasions on which the respondent's offer to join the petitioner had been refused. Short of overt act, they shewed that every means had been taken by the respondent to induce the petitioner to live with him. No admission of consent could be inferred from these answers, and proof must be allowed.

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and granted the prayer of the petition.

The Lord President.—This is an application to the Court by a married lady, who has for some years conducted a business, to dispense with the consent of her husband to a deed relating to that business—namely, a deed in which she proposes to sell it. Her husband has refused to give that consent, and she makes this application under the 5th section of the Married Woman's Property Act of 1881. The answer that is made by the husband, who appears, is that she is not within the words of that section, the words of the section being that where a wife is deserted by her husband, or is living apart from him with his consent, then such dispensation may be granted by the Court. The husband says that she is not a wife who is either deserted by her husband or is living apart from him with his consent. The Lord Ordinary has thought it necessary to allow a proof upon that matter; but in the argument before your Lordships counsel for the petitioner have asked your Lordships' judgment upon the facts as disclosed by the respondent, the husband. That is to say, they are content to put their case as if everything which the respondent says in his answers were proved upon a proof. I think they are quite entitled to take that position, and I do not think that the respondent can ask that we should go through the trouble of a proof in order simply to put in the mouth of witnesses what he has put in his statement. He cannot expect to prove more than he has averred, and if what he has averred is taken for the purposes of the argument as true, it surely is not for him to complain. Taking all that is averred as absolutely true, it seems to me that this lady is in the position which is contemplated by sect. 5, because I think she is a wife who is living apart from her husband with his consent. The state of affairs, as disclosed by the husband's answers, and I look at nothing else, is that these parties, who were married secretly, have, as a matter of fact, never lived openly as husband and wife before the world. There were certain reasons as to why they should be married secretly originally. There may have been, and I assume that there was, a different view between the spouses at a subsequent time as to the cogency of these reasons as preventing a change of their position, and as preventing their taking up life as married people in the face of the world. Whatever the view may be as to who was right as to the cogency of the reasons, the fact is that no change was de facto made, and that this separate life went on just as it had commenced. In fact, as disclosed to us, the parties, except for a short honeymoon when they were married, have never lived together as man and wife; and according to the two tests of living as man and wife—that is to say, living at bed and board, as the expression is—they have lived at neither, although as a matter of fact they seem to have actually seen each other very frequently. It seems to me, when one looks at the section of the statute, and the reason why it is put there, one sees that in a case of this sort the Court is not called upon to go into the matter in the way in which it would have to go into it in a purely consistorial case; that is to say, if parties were asking for divorce for desertion or for separation, a different class of enquiry would require to be made. What seems to me to be desiderated by the statute is that the wife is de facto living apart from the husband, and that de facto the separation from the husband is due either to the husband's desertion, or to his consent, which I really think comes to no more than a non renitentia on the part of the husband to the state of affairs. It has been urged by Mr Fraser, and I take his statement, as we are bound to do, that the husband on many occasions objected to this state of affairs; but I think the fallacy of the argument based thereupon rests in this, that a person may often consent to a thing to which he greatly objects and against which he protests. You may consent in fact to something which you do not at all like, and which you would much sooner have otherwise. Upon the circumstances as disclosed by the husband himself, I think it is perfectly clear in this case that there was consent in fact by the husband to the wife living apart from him as she did.

In granting this petition your Lordships are really just exercising the curatorial power from the same point of view as the husband; and the only proper point of view of the husband in exercising his curatorial power is, not how it will affect himself, but how it will affect his wife's interests. It is shewn to us that this lady has had a successful business in the city, and not being in very good health she wishes to turn her business into money. That seems perfectly right from the point of view of the wife, and I cannot doubt that any prudent husband would give his consent. Accordingly I think we ought to recal the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor and grant the prayer of the petition.

232. Parish Council of Kinloss v. Morgan and Others.

Poor—Parish—Legacy—"Poor of the Parish"—Bequest to Parish Council for the Benefit of the Poor of the Parish—Held That Bequest Might Be Applied for Benefit of Poor Persons Other Than Those in Receipt of Parochial Relief.

This special case was concerned with the interpretation of a provision in the testamentary settlement of the late Rev. J. A. D. Dunbar, of Seapark and Kinloss. The fourth purpose of the said settlement was in these terms:

"I leave and bequeath in the first place for the benefit of the poor of the parish of Kinloss the sum of Two thousand pounds; and in the second place for the benefit of the poor of the burgh of Forres the like sum of Two thousand pounds; declaring that the legacy to the poor of Kinloss parish shall be paid over by my trustees to the Parish Council of that parish to be administered by them for behoof of said poor, and that the legacy to the poor of the burgh of Forres shall be paid over by my trustees to the Town Council of Forres, to be administered by them for behoof of said poor."

The parties to this special case were the Parish Council of Kinloss of the first part, and certain ratepayers and paupers in the parish, of the second and third parts respectively.

The parties' contentions were:—

The first parties maintain that the bequest being given for the benefit of the poor of the parish, subject to administration by them as the proper parochial authority, is a bequest exclusively for behoof of the legal poor persons entitled to parochial relief. The second parties, on the other hand, maintain that the terms defining the objects of the bequest are open to construction, and that on a sound construction of the clause in question in said trust disposition and settlement, the intention of the testator was to benefit the occasional poor, or poor persons not in receipt of parochial relief, or at all events to include such within the class of persons entitled to participate in the benefits of the bequest.

The Questions of Law included the following:—

I. Is the bequest for the benefit of the poor of the parish of Kinloss contained in said trust disposition and settlement limited to the poor of said parish who are in receipt of parochial relief? Or

II. Are the first parties entitled to apply said bequest for the benefit of poor persons who are not in receipt of such relief?

Argued for the First Parties: The first parties were the body entrusted with the statutory duty of administration of poor relief in the parish, and could not make payments to persons other than the statutory recipients of poor relief without the sanction of the Court (Liddle v. Kirk-Session of Bathgate, 1854, 16 D. 1075, per Lord President at p. 1079 and Lord Rutherfurd at p. 1082; Whyte v. Kirk-Session of Kinglassie, 1867, 5 M. 869, per L. Deas at p. 883; Flockhart v. Kirk-Session of Aberdour, 1869, 8 M. 176; Paterson's Trustees v. Christie, 1899, 1 F. 508).

Argued for the Second and Third Parties: The question was one of construction of the settlement merely, and the first parties were bound to administer the fund according to the ascertained intention of the testator. On a sound construction of the clause in question, all poor persons, whether in receipt of parochial relief or not, were entitled to share in the benefits of the legacy.

The Court answered the second alternative of the first question in the affirmative.

The Lord President.—The late Rev. John Archibald Dunbar Dunbar, of Seapark and Kinloss, by a clause in his trust disposition and settlement, left a legacy in the following terms [His Lordship quoted the fourth purpose sup.].

The question raised before your Lordships by this special case is whether the Parish Council of Kinloss, who are entitled to this legacy of £2000, are bound to administer it for the "legal" poor alone, as that expression has been currently used; that is to say, are they bound to put this legacy into their coffers along with the rates, or are they entitled to administer it as a separate fund, and to apply the benefit of it to any such people as may be held to fall within the description of "poor" in the ordinary significance of that word?

Like all such matters it turns on the question of testamentary intention, and, if it had not been for the complication of authority, I should have thought the matter was too clear for argument. The result of putting this legacy into the coffers of the Parish Council would be, not the relief of the poor, but the relief of the ratepayers of the parish. That such was the intention of the testator cannot for a moment be suspected,

Parish Council of Kinloss v. Morgan and Others.

The Lord President.

There is, however, a certain amount of authority on the interpretation of the word "poor," but on consideration I have come to the conclusion that it does not stand in the way of giving to this bequest the effect which I believe the testator intended.

The decided cases all turned on what sums fell or did not fall to be dealt with under sect. 52 of the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. cap. 83). Let me remind your Lordships of what that Act really did. It introduced for the first time into Scotland a thoroughly national system of Poor Law administration, and it created powers for a universal assessment for relief of the poor, but it also enabled the new Poor Law authorities, who were created by the Act, to make use of any existing funds that were devoted to the relief of the poor. Hence we have sect. 52, which transferred the existing funds to the new parochial boards. Now the questions raised on that section were whether certain bequests fell or did not fall within the words of the section. It is to be observed that that section only applied to existing funds, and had no application to any subsequent bequest, and now that it is more than half a century old it is obvious that the questions that arise under such a destination in modern times are very different from those that fell to be decided under that section. There is this further observation to be made, that the question which is now before us could not have arisen in the old days prior to 1845. For in these days the distinction between able-bodied poor and others, with regard to the right of relief, had not been settled, and if you had used the phrase "legal poor" in these days it would not have been known what you meant. The kirk-session, who were then the only body in charge of the poor, relieved any necessitous person, and did not confine their relief to the legal poor in the modern sense. So that, in their former days, when a testator left a bequest for such purposes, it would never occur to him that any distinction could be drawn as to the persons to be benefited according as he left the administration of the bequest to the then poor authority, viz. the kirk-session, or to others. He would believe that, however he destined it, it would be applied for the relief of necessitous persons in the same way. Consequently, if in these decisions the words have got a certain significance, that interpretation has been put on them in the light of what I have been saying, and it will not necessarily apply to a bequest made by a modern testator under totally different conditions of the Poor Law.

There are expressions, particularly in the opinion of Lord Rutherfurd, in the case of Liddle, 16 D. 1075, that seem to go the length of laying down the law that the word "poor" means "legal poor" only. I don't think that that view of the law has been adopted in subsequent decisions, and I will only instance the dictum of Lord Deas in the case of Flockhart, 8 Macph. 176 at p. 182, where he says: "I do not call in question the principle of the cases of Bathgate and Linlithgow, that the words 'for behoof of the poor' did not necessarily mean those who are called the 'legal poor,'—that is to say, the poor who by law may claim relief; and that it is in every case a question of circumstances whether that construction is to be put on the words or not." I think that is a just statement of the law; and, therefore, as far as authority goes, I do not think it can be said that "poor of the parish" is limited to the "legal poor" only.

I also think that the implication that was sought to be drawn from the fact that the body chosen to administer the bequest was the Parish Council, loses its force when we consider that the Parochial Board existed solely for the purpose of administering the Poor Law, while the Parish Council has many other duties to perform. Where the body chosen existed only for the relief of the poor, the natural implication was that it was intended that the bequest should be administered in the same way as the only other funds in their hands. Here the selection of the Parish Council was no doubt occasioned by the fact that the testator wanted to benefit the people within two areas well known to himself, namely, the parish of Kinloss and the burgh of Forres; and therefore he selected the Parish Council of Kinloss and the Town Council of Forres to be the administrators, as best defining the areas to be benefited. I think therefore that he used the word "poor" in the sense in which it is used in ordinary language, and that the word must be held to cover any necessitous person. The second alternative of the first question will therefore fall to be answered in the affirmative.

Lord M'Laren. — I agree that the Parish Council who put these questions are in no way restricted as to the class of persons who may be put on the roll of beneficiaries, except in so far that they must be poor persons in the ordinary sense. In so deciding we are in no way enlarging the meaning of the word "poor." It is the Poor Law Act and the decisions of the Court which, for the purposes of the administration of public funds, have put a limited meaning upon the word—or perhaps it would be more accurate to say, have divided the poor into two categories: those who from age or physical infirmity are unable to gain a livelihood by industry, and those who are able to work but who are unable to find employment. The first of these classes is the object of the benefits of the Poor Law, the second is not. But in the construction of Mr Dunbar's bequest we have nothing to do with this artificial distinction, because his bequest has to be applied for the benefit of the poor of the parish, a description of persons which includes able-bodied but necessitous poor, as well as those who are poor and infirm. I have no doubt that it would be open to this Parish Council to give assistance to persons having a legal claim as an addition to the relief given from the rates, as well as to others who have no claim upon the rates. I am of opinion that the second branch of the first question should be answered in the affirmative.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1 (3)—Charge by Workman for Payment of Compensation Awarded by Sheriff in Petition for Review of Compensation—Agreement between Parties Prior to Award for Deductions to be Made from Compensation Awarded—Suspension of Charge—Suspension Not Excluded by sect. 1 (3) of Workmen's Compensation Act 1897—Charge Suspended Quoad the Deductions Agreed on.

This was a Note of Suspension at the instance of the Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company Limited against William Rowan, contractor, Lochgelly. The note set forth that the complainers had been charged at the instance of the respondent to make payment of 15s. a week as from and after 24th June 1907 by virtue of a certified copy judgment under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, in a petition at the instance of the complainers against the respondent, dated at Kirkcaldy 24th June 1907. The complainers prayed the Court simpliciter to suspend the said charge and whole grounds and warrants thereof; et separatim, to suspend the said charge quoad the sum of £3, 13s. 4d.

The facts of the case were as follows. The respondent on 12th December 1905, while in the employment of the complainers as a stone miner, sustained injuries at the time totally incapacitating him for work. The complainers and respondent agreed that the compensation payable to the respondent during total incapacity was £1 a week. A memorandum of this agreement was registered, and compensation was paid at this rate till 24th June 1907. The complainers applied by petition to the Sheriff of Fife for review of the weekly payments in terms of sect. 12 of the first schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and proof was fixed for 13th March 1907. Prior to that date the parties, at the respondent's request, agreed that the proof should be postponed till 3rd May, and subsequently till 14th June 1907. The complainers averred that they acquiesced in the postponement of the proof on an agreement that the Sheriff's interlocutor when pronounced should take effect as if it bore the date of 13th March, and that the complainers were to go on paying compensation at the rate of £1 a week till the Sheriff's judgment, but that when the judgment was pronounced they should be allowed to deduct from the compensation then awarded any overpayments for the period from 13th March till the date of the Sheriff's judgment. This agreement the Lord Ordinary held to be proved by the correspondence between the parties' agents. The Sheriff delivered his judgment on 24th July 1907 and reduced the compensation to 15s. a week. The overpayments between 15th March and 24th July amounted to £3, 13s. 4d. The respondent claimed payment of compensation at the rate of 15s. per week from 24th July 1907, and charged the complainers therefor. The sum charged for amounted to £5, 0s. 9d., of which the respondents only disputed liability for £3, 13s. 4d.

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

Wilsons and Clyde Coal Co. Ltd. v. Rowan.

Sect. 1 (3) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 is as follows:—

> If any question arises in any proceedings under this Act as to the liability to pay compensation under this Act, ... or as to the amount or duration of compensation under this Act, the question, if not settled by agreement, shall, subject to the provisions of the first schedule to this Act, be settled by arbitration, in accordance with the second schedule to this Act.

The complainers pleaded, inter alia:

"3. The respondent being barred personali exceptione from claiming from the complainers more than £1, 17s. 5d. of the sum charged for, suspension, either in toto, or at any rate quoad £3, 13s. 4d. of the sum charged for, should be granted."

The respondent pleaded, inter alia:

"2. The warrant for the charge sought to be suspended being in order, the reasons of suspension fall to be repelled.

"3. The present process is excluded by sect. 1, subsect. 3, of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and by sect. 14 of the first schedule annexed to the said Act."

The Lord Ordinary sustained the second alternative branch of the third plea in law for the complainers, and suspended the charge quoad the sum of £3, 13s. 4d.

Lord Dundas.—The complainers have been charged by the respondent for payment to him of 15s. per week, as from and after 24th June 1907, in virtue of a judgment under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, pronounced by the Sheriff-Substitute at Kirkcaldy on the said date in a petition at their instance for review, by way of diminution of the compensation being paid by them to the respondent at the date of their application, under an agreement between the parties. The amount actually charged for was £5, 0s. 9d.; and the complainers say that the charge ought to be suspended quoad the sum of £3, 13s. 4d. This sum represents the difference during the period from 13th March to 24th June 1907, between the rate of 20s. per week, which was the standard of the original agreement of the parties, and 15s. per week, which was the rate decerned for by the Sheriff-Substitute as from and after 24th June. I have come, not without reluctance, to the conclusion that the complainers' contention must prevail. The proof in the application to the Sheriff-Substitute was fixed for 13th March. It appears that, at the request of the respondent, and with consent of the complainers, that diet was postponed to 3rd May, and again to 14th June. I do not think that there is really any dispute as to the terms and conditions upon which the complainers agreed to the postponement of the diets of proof. The correspondence produced is admitted to be genuine, and counsel for both parties, at the discussion in the Procedure Roll, very properly agreed that a proof in this Court ought, in the circumstances, to be avoided if possible. Upon a consideration of the record, the correspondence, and the arguments of counsel, I think that I can decide what the agreement between the parties—originally verbal, but confirmed and extended in scope by writing—really came to. The verbal agreement seems to have been that the proof should be postponed on condition that the Sheriff's interlocutor, when pronounced, should take effect as if it bore the date of 13th March. As the correspondence proceeded, the parties, through their agents, appear to have agreed that the complainers were to go on paying 20s. per week to the respondent until the Sheriff's judgment was pronounced; but that when that judgment was obtained, and if it should be for a diminished rate of compensation, the complainers should be allowed to make deduction of any overpayment they had made, as if the reduced rate contained in the Sheriff's judgment had been decerned by him on 13th March. If this was, as I think it was, the agreement of parties, there was nothing, so far as I see, illegal in it; it did not, I think, involve any question under the Workmen's Compensation Act; it was simply a collateral agreement between parties litigants, and not one involving any difficulty in its extrication.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Dundas.

The respondent's counsel argued, in support of his 2nd plea in law, that suspension should be refused, because the warrant for the charge is ex facie in order. But I think that an orderly proceeded charge may be suspended, if it can be shewn that it would not be in accordance with justice that the charge should be allowed to take effect. In the present case, if the terms of the agreement between the agents of the parties was as I have indicated, it appears to me that the complainers are entitled to the suspension which they crave.

The third plea in law for the respondent consists of two branches, the second of which was not insisted in at the discussion. The first branch is based upon sect. 1 (3) of the Act of 1897. I am not sure that the arbiter might not, in this case, have been competently and properly invoked to decide the question which I am now determining. But the complainers had their own reasons for declining to agree to such a course; and I cannot affirm that they were not entitled to resort, as they have chosen to do, to the method of suspension. It appears to me to be regrettable that a matter involving such a paltry sum should be made the subject of proceedings in this Court. But counsel for the complainers stated that other cases similar to the present are in dependence, which may be ruled by this decision; that considerations of general policy are involved, and that the only competent method of obtaining justice was that to which their clients have resorted It is sufficient for me to say that the present case appears to be competently raised, and that I must therefore dispose of it in the manner and for the reasons indicated.—13*th November* 1907.

(Sheriff-Substitute Reid and Sheriff Crawford, K.C., at Banff.)

234. Henderson v. Hossack.

CAUTIONER—POINDING—INTERDICT AGAINST SALE—BOND OF CAUTION—DAMAGES—HELD THAT THE WORDS "PAYMENT TO THE DEFENDER OF ALL DAMAGE WHICH HE MIGHT SUSTAIN" OCCURRING IN A BOND OF CAUTION GRANTED BY A PARTY FOR BEHOOF OF THE PURSUER AS A CONDITION OF HIS OBTAINING INTERIM INTERDICT, COVERED BOTH THE JUDICIAL AND EXTRA-JUDICIAL EXPENSES TO WHICH THE DEFENDER HAD BEEN PUT IN DEFENDING THE INTERDICT PROCEEDINGS.

In this case the pursuer, who had been the defender in an action of interdict in which interim interdict had been granted, on caution being found, raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen, Kincardine and Banff at Banff, against the cautioner for the pursuer in the interdict proceedings, and, founding on his right to payment "of all damage" in terms of the bond of caution, claimed payment as "damages" of both the judicial and extra-judicial expenses to which he had been put in defending the action of interdict.

The defender (the cautioner) pleaded that "the claim for expenses, judicial and extra-judicial, not being covered by the bond of caution," he was entitled to absolvitor. The facts and arguments of the parties appear from the notes of both the Sheriff-Substitute and the Sheriff. The Sheriff-Substitute (Reid) held that the word "damages" covered the costs, and granted decree. He added the following note:—

Note.—On 31st August 1906, the pursuer, in virtue of a decree obtained at the Small Debt Court at Banff on 31st July 1906 for £5, 10s., poinded a horse and cart then in the possession of his debtor, Abraham Glickman. On 21st September 1906, Morris Glickman, a relative of Abraham Glickman, and who had apparently for a time been residing with him, presented a petition for interdict against the pursuer selling the horse and cart; and interim interdict was granted, on caution to the extent of £20, for payment to the defender of any damage which he may instruct he has sustained by the granting of the interim interdict craved, should it ultimately be found that the pursuer was in the wrong in seeking said interdict. On 24th September 1906 the defender, who was acting as agent in Court for the said Morris Glickman, lodged a bond of caution by himself, which proceeded on the narrative that "Considering that the Sheriff-Substitute granted interim interdict as craved, on the pursuer" (the said Morris Glickman in the interdict process) "finding caution acted in the Books of Court to the extent of £20, for payment to the defender" (in the interdict) "of all damage which he might sustain," he (the defender) bound and obliged himself to make payment "of whatever sum of money the Court may modify as the damages which the said Alexander Henderson" (the pursuer) "has or shall have sustained by the granting of said interdict, should it ultimately be found that the pursuer" (in the interdict) "was not entitled to the same."

The pursuer in the interdict failed to appear at the diet of proof, he having, it was stated, left the country some time before, and the action was dismissed with expenses.

This action is raised by the defender in the interdict proceedings, as pursuer, to recover from the defender, the cautioner of Morris Glickman in the interdict proceedings, certain sums in name of damages, for which the pursuer contends the defender is liable under his bond of caution in the interdict.

The two items are (1) a sum of £5, 18s. 1d., the judicial expenses, and (2) the sum of £8, 7s. 6d., the extra-judicial expenses in the same process. These sums of money have been spent by the pursuer in consequence of the wrongous proceedings in the interdict by the defender's principal, and for whom he became cautioner, and I am of opinion that they fall under or are covered by the defender's bond of caution. It was contended on benalf of the defender that the defender's liability under his bond was limited to the deterioration of the subject (the horse and cart), in consequence of the proceedings in the interdict. I cannot adopt this limited construction of the terms of the bond of caution, and the words used, as I read them, cover expenses incurred in consequence of the interdict, as well as damages occasioned to the subjects through the proceedings of interdict. If the defender's construction of the bond was to be sustained, a cautioner would never be liable for expenses occasioned by his principal's wrongous proceedings, and in the event of the principal's insolvency or disappearance (as in this case), the expenses of the interdict would fall wholly on the person who is eventually found to be in the right.

The practice apparently in the Court of Session is to include in the bond of caution special liability for expenses as well as damages occasioned by the suspension or interdict proceedings, while in the Sheriff Court the form of bond does not appear to include expenses specially. But although not included specially, it does not follow that they are not to be included under the general head of damages occasioned by the interdict; and no sufficient reason has been stated, in my opinion, why they should be allowed in the Court of Session and not in the Sheriff Court. It was also contended that the limitation of liability to £20 shewed that expenses were not meant to be included under damages. It appears to me that the words limiting liability were used and intended merely for the purpose which they express, and cannot be founded on as indicating in any way what kind of claims were to be included under the head of damages.—6*th August* 1907.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Crawford, K.C.), who affirmed the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute, except in so far as it continued the cause, and added the following note:—The facts are clearly narrated in the judgment under review. For a judgment debt of £5 odds, the pursuer was lawfully proceeding to sell a horse and cart belonging to his debtor, which he had poinded. Morris Glickman intervened with an action of interdict, and interim interdict was granted upon a bond of caution by the present defender. I need not repeat its terms. If the pursuer was to be prevented from following out his diligence, which gave him a complete remedy, he was entitled to security that the interim interdict would not prejudice him pecuniarily, and that if the action of interdict failed, he should be in as good a position as before. In the circumstances, the expenses of the action of interdict were precisely the item of pecuniary damage, which had most to be guarded against. If the word "damage" in the bond did not cover those expenses, and objection had been taken to it on that ground, I do not think that any judge would have granted interim interdict, if he thought that interpretation correct. Objection was not taken, and the question now is, whether that was an oversight on pursuer's part. His agent followed Mr Sellars' Sheriff Court Styles, in which there is no separate mention of expenses. In the form of bond in the Juridical Styles used in the Court of Session there is a separate obligation for expenses. The case of Stewart v. Forbes, 1897, 24 R. 1112, is an example of such a separate obligation. But it also shews that the expenses of an interdict case are a proper charge against a cautioner. Besides the argument that the form used in the Court of Session shews that expenses must be specified, it was argued that as expenses must be claimed in an action, the rule must be the same. The analogy is, to my mind, fallacious. In an action the pursuer makes a certain claim, and if he also claims the expenses of enforcing it, he must say so. That is the settled rule, an arbitrary rule, not in the sense that it is in any way unjust. But it would have made no difference which way it was settled. But then the pursuer's claim in an ordinary action is not one for damage, except in actions of damages, where the damage must be specified and relevantly averred. But in a question between a pursuer holding a decree and a cautioner who intervenes to enable a third party to get interim interdict, the loss incurred by defending the action of interdict is damage in the strictest sense, quite as much as the deterioration of a poinded subject. Therefore I think that the Sheriff Court style is the more logical of the two. But ob majorem cautelam, I think it would be more prudent to mention expenses.

It follows that no distinction can be drawn between judicial and extra-judicial expenses. The principle which rules expenses between party and party is not applicable. The question is what pecuniary damage the pursuer has unavoidably incurred. But extra-judicial expenses must be rigidly taxed. In this case they exceed the judicial expenses. I can hardly conceive that that is susceptible of legitimate explanation. For example, the fact stated at the Bar, that there were two agents, one, I think, at Aberdeen, cannot enlarge the defender's liability.—19*th October* 1907.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow.

This was an appeal in an action of multiplepoinding raised in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow, the fund in medio being certain barrels of oil which were held by the pursuers, who were storekeepers in Glasgow. The facts are set forth in the following excerpts from notes to interlocutors issued by the Sheriff-Substitute (Boyd).

This is an action of multiplepoinding at the instance of Thomas Hayman & Son, storekeepers, Glasgow, against (First) the trustee on the sequestrated estates of John M'Nairn & Co.; (Second) The American Cotton Oil Company, New York; (Third) The International Banking Corporation, London; and (Fourth) Ferguson, Shaw & Sons, oil merchants, Glasgow. The question really arises between the second and fourth parties. The latter bought from M'Nairn & Co. fifty barrels X 2 and fifty barrels Y 2 of cotton oil, and paid for them before delivery. M'Nairn & Co. became bankrupt, and delivery was stopped. The American Cotton Oil Company, from whom M'Nairn & Co. had received the goods, claimed them, on the ground that the property had never passed from them to M'Nairn & Co. Ferguson, Shaw & Sons maintain that they bought from M'Nairn & Co. as agents for the American Cotton Oil Company.

It is admitted that M'Nairn & Co. were appointed exclusive agents in Scotland, and later, in the United Kingdom, for the American Cotton Oil Company. The appointment was advertised in the "Glasgow Herald" of 22nd April 1898, and with the approval of the American Cotton Oil Company, M'Nairn & Co. had the appointment printed on their letter paper.

These two lots of oil were sold to M'Nairn & Co. by the American Cotton Oil Company on 12th September 1904, on invoices which bore that the price was payable by a draft at sixty days' sight with documents attached. The oil was shipped on 28th December 1904, on the Anchor Line steamer "Ethiopia," at New York. On 30th December 1904 a bill of lading was granted by the Anchor Line, making the oil deliverable to the American Cotton Oil Company's order, and on its arrival the oil was put in the stores of the pursuers, in name of the Anchor Line, for behoof of the holders of the bill of lading. The American Cotton Oil Company, on shipment, negotiated a draft for the price with their bankers in New York, and this, along with the bill of lading and policy of insurance, was forwarded by the said bankers to their Glasgow correspondents, who had the draft accepted by M'Nairn & Co., and retained the same until it should be retired by the acceptors.

On 31st January 1905, Ferguson, Shaw, & Sons bought from M'Nairn & Co. two hundred barrels P.S.Y. American cotton oil, including the two lots of X 2 and Y 2. They paid the price and received an invoice and delivery order on the pursuers Hayman & Son. The delivery order was immediately lodged and honoured to the extent of one lot of fifty barrels and three barrels of another lot of fifty. The remainder of the lot has been otherwise dealt with, leaving, as before explained, lots X 2 and Y 2 for decision here.

The draft matured on 13th March 1905, but as M'Nairn & Co. became bankrupt on 9th February 1905, the American Cotton Oil Company met it, and at the same time got up the bill of lading and insurance policy, which had never left their correspondents' hands. On 31st March 1905 the American Company presented to the Anchor Line the bill of lading for the two lots X 2 and Y 2, and they took on payment of freight and charges, granted to the American Company, a delivery order on the pursuers for the oil, which was refused as claimed by other parties.

The question is, What was the position of M'Nairn & Co. when they sold the oil to Ferguson, Shaw & Sons? The latter say that M'Nairn & Co. acted as agents for their disclosed principals the American Company, who were in fact the vendors. The American Company say that M'Nairn & Co. were buying agents—distributing agents, with the sole right of buying their goods and selling them in this country: that all the agency meant was that M'Nairn & Co. got a monopoly of the business, but that to any buyer here they were merchants, keeping any profit and suffering any loss. In this contention they maintain that they are not contradicting the documents of contract between them and M'Nairn & Co., but construing them.

But even assuming that as between the American Company and M'Nairn & Co. the latter were only distributing agents and not the real vendors in sales in this country, their description as agents for the American Company was so explicit and so public that I think Ferguson, Shaw & Sons might successfully shelter themselves behind it, unless there were some circumstances to bring home to them that M'Nairn & Co. were acting on their own behalf. To ascertain this, one must attend in particular to the features of this special transaction.

On 31st January 1905 Mr Stevenson met Mr Ferguson in Lang's Restaurant in Glasgow, and told him that he was pressed for money, and he offered the oil at 1s. per cwt. below the market price. Mr Ferguson immediately accepted the offer and paid cash. There was no mention of the American Company as being interested in the sale. It was what is known as a "spot" sale, that is, a sale of goods already in this country and on the spot for immediate delivery; there was no contract note, only an invoice was necessary. The motive of the sale was to put Mr Stevenson in funds which he badly needed. If the oil had been the property of the American Company this price would have gone to them, and Mr Stevenson's gain would only have been a few pounds as commission. I think it follows that Mr Ferguson thought he was dealing with M'Nairn & Co. directly as vendors and not as agents, and, if so, Ferguson, Shaw & Sons' claim, which is based on M'Nairn's alleged agency, must in my opinion fall.

The Sheriff-Substitute, after a proof, found in fact that the American Cotton Oil Company sold two lots of cotton-seed oil, of fifty barrels each, to John M'Nairn & Co; and on arrival in this country, per the Anchor Line steamer "Ethiopia," it was placed in the stores of the pursuers, Thomas Hayman & Son, in Glasgow; that a draft for the net price, with documents attached, was forwarded by the said American Cotton Oil Company to their correspondents in Glasgow; that the said draft became payable on 13th March 1905, but the said John M'Nairn & Co. became bankrupt on 9th February 1905, and the draft and documents were never in their possession, but were retired by the American Cotton Oil Company; found in law that the property in the said goods never passed from these claimants, and they, being in possession of the documents of title, were entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim; therefore ranked and preferred the American Cotton Oil Company to the oil in dispute.

In the course of the proof Mr Ferguson gave, in cross-examination, the following evidence:—

The sale price was 15s. 3d., which was about 1s. a hundredweight below the market value of that particular day. Cotton Oil had jumped up. It was a cheap sale. I thought I was getting a good bargain. Mr Stevenson pressed me very hard to buy, and he expressed the view that he was hard up at the time. I understood at the time that he was rather badly wanting money. Of course if he were selling as an agent for a principal he would not be entitled to give a cheap price owing to the fact that he personally was hard up. I did not understand perfectly well at the time that Mr Stevenson was making a transaction for his own benefit. (Q.) How do you account for his saying to you that he was hard up, and pressing you to buy on that account? (A.) I can account to-day from my knowledge of his flour embarrassment; he was embarrassed in the purchase of flour and he wanted money. It was he personally who was hard up; he did not say it was the American Cotton Oil Company that was hard up. It is not clear to me now that he was making the sale for himself.

Ferguson, Shaw & Sons appealed.

2nd Div.

Ferguson, Shaw & Sons v. The American Cotton Oil Company.

Argued for Appellants: (1) M'Nairn & Co. were constituted and held out in Scotland as the exclusive agents of the American Cotton Oil Company by documents, published advertisements and correspondence. The dealings of Ferguson, Shaw & Sons with M'Nairn had all been on the footing of agency. In these circumstances private instructions by the principals to their agents did not bind Ferguson, Shaw & Sons, to whom they were not communicated. The evidence of the Oil Company, therefore, in so far as it was directed to shew that the term agent did not mean agent, but buyer or something else, was irrelevant. The term agent implied a mandate that the agent was entitled to bind his principal in any contract within the scope of his ostensible authority. Apparent authority to vend was real authority as in a question with the public. Cases cited on the question of fraud had no application. A principal was always liable for the fraud of his agent when the agent was acting within the scope of his authority. In addition to that rule there was another, that when an agent exceeded his authority and was fraudulent the principal was liable if he took benefit from the fraud. If one party had to lose by the act of M'Nairn & Co., the American Company should be the losers, because they put M'Nairn in the position in which he was enabled to cause loss to one or other. (2) There was nothing to shew that this contract was in any way different from previous contracts between the same parties, or that the purchaser did not look to the known principal. The mere fact that he knew that the agent was hard up, or badly wanting money, did not suggest that the agent desired to make a contract of a different kind from others. It would only suggest to the purchaser that he was in want of ready cash, and not that he was insolvent. There was no notice to the purchaser that the agent was in the act of committing a fraud.

Argued for Respondents: (1) The word agent was not a nomen juris. It was an elastic term, and capable of explication by proof. There were various kinds of agents, and a distributing agent, such as we had in this case, who bought the goods from his principal and sold them as himself a principal, was a well-known form of the relation. M'Nairn & Co. were all along principals so far as Ferguson, Shaw & Sons were concerned. And their relation to the American Oil Company might well be termed agency. The question of agency was one of circumstances, and the man who treated with another as agent assumed the onus of proving what the agent's powers were. There was fraud on the part of Stevenson in this transaction. The American Company as principals were not therefore bound by his act unless they took benefit from it, and they did not. (2) The contract was obviously made to meet the personal convenience of the seller, and an allowance on the price was given for that reason. The sale was therefore made, not for the benefit of the principal, but for that of the agent. In these circumstances Ferguson had knowledge which shewed or should have shewed him that this was not an agency transaction.

The Court found in fact and in law in terms of the findings in fact and in law in the interlocutor appealed against, and dismissed the appeal.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The competition in this case relates to certain parcels of oil which were shipped from America to Glasgow by the American Cotton Oil Company, and which are in the hands of the Anchor Line of steamers. It is clearly established by the evidence that some time previous to this dispatch of goods to this country, the American Oil Company had appointed the firm of M'Nairn & Co. to be their exclusive agents for the sale of their oil. It is further conclusively proved that they held out M'Nairn & Co. to proposing purchasers of their oil as being their sole agents, and that any business done must be through their agents, one exception only being stipulated for—any supply to Lever Brothers, the makers of Sunlight soap. They informed such proposing buyers that they were represented for the sale of their various brands by M'Nairn & Co., whom they, in plain words, called their "agents," and expressed the desire to "be favoured with your business through them," stating that "we cannot make offers except through our agents."

It seems to me plain that M'Nairn & Co. were held out as being the American Company's agents in quite distinct terms, and without any qualification whatever. So far, the case seems clear enough. In any ordinary sale M'Nairn & Co. must be held to be selling for the American Cotton Oil Company by delegated authority, binding that Company as if they themselves had directly made the contract of sale. In that view of the case it is unnecessary to consider any question as to whether as between themselves the Company and M'Nairn & Co. had some special arrangement whereby, although the latter were held out as agents, and only as agents, the position of M'Nairn & Co. to the Oil Company was of a special nature, and did not put M'Nairn & Co. in the position of ordinary agents. Of that the customers could know nothing, and certainly the claimants Ferguson, Shaw & Sons knew nothing.

If, then, the sale which is in question here had been a sale in the ordinary course of business, in which the purchasers dealt with M'Nairn & Co. under the accrediting of them by the Oil Company as their agents, the disposal of the case would have been easy. But the case is complicated by special circumstances, which require careful attention. It appears that M'Nairn & Co., being in financial straits, were endeavouring to obtain money to tide them over their difficulties, and that Mr Stevenson, who was the sole partner of M'Nairn & Co., met Mr Ferguson in Lang's luncheon-room in Glasgow, and there offered him a quantity of American Company's oil on the footing of a spot sale—that is, a sale with the goods at hand or on the sea, and so ready for delivery. It is admitted by Ferguson that at the time Stevenson pressed him to buy, indicating that he personally was "hard up" and "badly wanting money," and that he was willing to sell at a cheap price, 1s. per cwt. below the market price of the day, the market being a rising one. Now Mr Ferguson is driven to admit that if Stevenson were selling for a principal he would not be entitled to give a cheap price because he was personally hard up. That being so, it is very difficult to see how it can be held that Ferguson, in buying, can be held as doing anything else than buying from Stevenson as a principal. If so, he did not effect a purchase from the Oil Company through an agent of theirs, and that being so, it follows that M'Nairn, his principal, having failed to give him delivery of the oil which he professed to sell, he cannot get delivery from the Oil Company, from whom he did not buy.

The evidence leads me clearly to the conclusion that Ferguson cannot be held in this particular transaction to have dealt with M'Nairn & Co. as agents for the American Oil Company, and, if so, his firm cannot be held entitled to carry off the Company's oil, which forms the fund in medio.

If this be a sound view of the case upon the facts, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question whether the property had ever passed, or whether it was still in the American Oil Company, whatever was the position of M'Nairn & Co. towards them. But I may say that on that question, had it been necessary to decide it, my view would have been the same as the Sheriff-Substitute's. The Oil Company, which had never parted with the goods, could not be held liable to suffer because M'Nairn & Co. had fraudulently, for their own purposes, professed to be able to give immediate delivery as on a spot sale, they being no parties to the fraud, and obtaining nothing by it.

(Lord Salvesen.)

235. Forrest's Trustees v. Rintoul's Trustees and Another.

I. Property — Title to Land — Personal Bar.

II. Property — Disposition — Mutuality — Contract by Reservation.

By disposition dated in 1883, Rintoul disponed to Forrest and others the surface of the lands of A. The disposition narrated that by lease dated in 1875 the whole minerals below these lands had been let to Baird, the termination of this lease being Whitsunday 1903. The disposition provided that until Whitsunday 1903 the mineral tenants should have all the powers and privileges conferred by the lease, and that the disponees during that period should have no claim in respect of the tenant's operations. The lease was one of the writs appended to the disposition, and the plan of the subjects let was communicated to the disponees.

The disposition further provided that if after the termination of the lease there should remain unwrought minerals in the lands, the same should thereafter belong to the disponees, and that the disponees should be bound to execute and deliver in their favour a valid conveyance of the same. In implement of this obligation the disponer executed and delivered a disposition dated in 1904 and a supplementary disposition dated in 1905.

After the disposition of 1904, but before the disposition of 1905 had been executed and accepted by the disponees, the parties first became aware that the disponer's title to part of the minerals was subject to challenge. In the event of such a challenge proving successful, the results as regards title would be, that at the date of the disposition in 1883 the property of part of the minerals disponed must be held to have been already vested in the disponees. As regards the minerals lying beneath one small area of the lands, the disponer did not at the date of the action assert or qualify any title in his favour, but quoad ultra he maintained that the title to the whole minerals had at the date of the disposition been duly vested in him. His title, as at that date, to part of the minerals was admitted. It was further admitted that during the currency of the lease the minerals had been worked by the tenants in the areas as to which the title was either in dispute or was admittedly not in the disponer, and that no mineral had been worked in the area which was the disponer's undisputed property. It was disputed whether the workings could or could not have been profitably restricted to this latter area.

In an action in which the disponees claimed damages in respect of the working by the disponer's tenants of mineral which was, at the date of working, the property of the disponees, held, assuming in favour of the pursuers that they could establish a title to part of the minerals independent of the disposition granted in 1883 by the defender, that the pursuers were not entitled to damages in respect (a) that the pursuers did not conclude for reduction of the disposition of 1883 on the ground of mutual error, and (b) that this deed contained a contract regulating the rights of parties in the premises, and in particular conferring upon the defender a license to work the minerals through his tenants, which contract was binding on the pursuers, inter alia, by reason of their acceptance in 1904 and 1905 of beneficial provisions conferred thereby.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Salvesen.—The pursuers are proprietors in trust of the lands of Auchinraith and Woodhouse, in Lanarkshire, which contain valuable seams of coal. In this action they sue for a sum of £7000 as the value of a quantity of coal, which is said to have been illegally removed by Messrs William Baird & Co. Ltd., and their predecessors, under a lease granted in their favour by the late Peter Rintoul, father of Robert Rintoul, whose trustees are the leading defenders. The mineral tenants, William Baird & Co. Ltd., have also lodged defences; but they were not represented at the debate, as the other defenders have assumed responsibility for their workings. I shall accordingly speak of Rintoul's Trustees as "the defenders."

It is common ground that the lands of Auchinraith originally extended, so far as the mineral field in question is concerned, to the medium filum of the river Clyde; and part of the claim in this case relates to coal which is said to have been worked beneath the solum from the south bank of the river to its centre line. The other illegal workings are said to have taken place immediately to the south of the river, beneath land the surface of which is the property of the Caledonian Railway Company, or at one time belonged to that Company. A reference to the plan in process shews the disputed areas on the north marked with the numbers 5 and 6; and there are various other numbers applicable to the ground over which the Railway Company's line is constructed, or which was at one time acquired by them for accommodation works. The two largest pieces of ground shewn on the plan were part of the lands called respectively "Gardiner's" and "Jackson's" lands of Auchinraith. These lands are held under different titles; and it is not disputed that the minerals in the said large area forming part of Jackson's lands, during the period of the workings in question, belonged to the defenders or their authors.

In 1847 the titles disclose that John Gardiner was proprietor of the lands to the west of the green line which bisects the areas in dispute. In that year he sold the portions Nos. 1, 1*a*, 3, and 10 on the plan, and the ground to the south of 10, on which a railway was afterwards constructed, to the Caledonian Railway Company. In 1850 he sold the portions Nos. 2, 7, 8, 4, and 12 to the same Company. The conveyances by him in favour of the Company proceed upon the narrative that compulsory powers had been granted for the construction of a railway, and that the lands disponed required to be taken and occupied by the Company for the site of its railway and for accommodation works and other purposes. The defenders now admit—what they disputed on record—that under these conveyances the Railway Company only acquired the surface of the lands disponed, and that the property in the minerals remained in the disponer. The defenders, however, base their title to the minerals on a disposition dated 1st and 12th March 1853, under which the Railway Company disponed to William Forrest the lands so acquired by them, except in so far as they were actually used at that time for railway purposes. As the Railway Company, however, owned only the surface of the lands, they could give no better title to their disponee than they themselves possessed; and the defenders, who derive their title from William Forrest, would not thereby have become vested in any of the minerals if the Railway Company had been the sole disponers. The disposition, however, bears to be granted "with the special advice and consent of John Gardiner of Auchinraith, in the parish of Blantyre, and the said John Gardiner for himself his own right and interest"; and as John Gardiner was the owner of the minerals the defenders maintain that under this disposition there was conveyed the whole of the lands described a cœlo ad centrum. The pursuers, on the other hand, maintain that the conveyance of 1853 only conveyed the lands as vested in the Caledonian Railway Company, and that John Gardiner was conjoined as a disponer merely for the purpose of curing any defect that there might be in the Railway Company's title in respect of the statutory provisions as to the sale of surplus lands. On the other hand, they, as I understood, admitted that the title was one under which the minerals below the estate might be acquired by prescriptive possession.

The boundary on the north is, in this disposition, the river Clyde; and, as there is a conveyance of "all rights and pertinents belonging to the said portions of land above conveyed, and all such right title and interest in and to the same as we or our foresaids are or shall be possessed of," the defenders say that the conveyance included the solum of the river Clyde up to the centre, notwithstanding that no account is taken of this area in the measurement, and that the land conveyed is described as an enclosure. Precisely the same question arises with regard to "Jackson's" lands, which were disponed to the defender's author by disposition dated 13th and 17th May 1853. The ground so known is therein described as follows:—"All and Whole that piece of ground lying on the north side of the said railway, and extending to six acres and 22·853 thousandth decimal parts of an acre or thereby, marked number 4 on the said plan; and bounded . . . . on the north by the river Clyde."

In this state of the titles,—which gave Mr Rintoul an undoubted right to the whole surface of the lands in question, at all events up to the southern bank of the river Clyde, and to the minerals in Jackson's lands, which formed the largest part of the coal-field,—Mr Rintoul let to William Baird & Co., by a lease dated 16th July 1875, the term of entry under which was declared to be Whitsunday 1872, the whole seams of coal so far as unwrought lying in and under said subjects. In addition, probably, per incuriam, there was let the coal under the Railway Company's lands to which Mr Rintoul had no title whatever, and which belonged either to Mr Gardiner of Auchinraith and his successors or to the pursuers' author. This lease was admittedly communicated to the latter in 1883, and constituted one of the writs appended to the disposition in his favour by Robert Rintoul after referred to. The plan of the subjects let was also communicated to the pursuers' author, John Clark Forrest, in 1883. This plan included all the subjects now in dispute, the minerals in which are claimed by the pursuers.

In 1880 Peter Rintoul conveyed to the Caledonian Railway Company, first, certain parts and portions of land extending to 1 acre, 1 rood, 5 poles and ¼ of a pole, which may be described as part of Gardiner's lands of Auchinraith adjoining the railway; and second, a strip of ground adjoining the railway which formed part of Jackson's lands—but under reservation of the whole mines and minerals in the lands thereby conveyed.

It may be assumed that as the defenders' author let the whole minerals in the lands delineated on the plan in question, he believed that he was the owner of these; and for nearly thirty years no person has disputed his claim, although the coal has been worked continuously and in large quantities by the mineral tenants from 1875 onwards. The pursuers' author, John Clark Forrest, must also have believed that he had no claim to these minerals, for he accepted a disposition dated 14th, 15th and 16th November 1883, by Robert Rintoul in his favour, the terms of which are consistent only with the view that he recognised the right of the disponer to the minerals in the lands in question. By this disposition the surface of the lands was disponed to Mr Forrest, along with other lands which it is not necessary to mention. This deed contains a reference to the lease granted in 1875 to William Baird & Co., and provides that until the term of Whitsunday 1903, being its actual termination, "the mineral tenants should have all the powers and privileges conferred by the said lease upon the tenants, and that the disponee and his foresaids, during the said period, should have no claim in respect of the operations of the said mineral tenants." The deed further provides that if after Whitsunday 1903 there should remain any unwrought coal, etc., in the lands, the same should thereafter belong to the disponee (Mr Forrest), and that the disponer should be bound to execute and deliver in his favour a valid conveyance of the same with his whole right, title and interest, present and future therein.

On the expiry of the mineral lease in 1903, the pursuers demanded and obtained from the defenders a disposition, dated 7th and 9th May 1904, which conveyed to them "All and Whole, the whole coal and other metals and minerals, in so far as still unwrought, lying in and under" the lands described in and disponed by the disposition. They say that they were unaware at that time of their right to the claim made in this action. They became aware of it, however, on their own admission some time prior to March 1905, when a supplementary disposition was granted conveying to them substantially the minerals in the lands disponed to the Caledonian Railway Company by the disposition of 1880. Even now they do not propose to set aside the disposition of 1883, by which they acquired the surfaces of the land, or the disposition of 1904, by which they acquired the coal still remaining unwrought. They propose, therefore, to take the benefit of deeds which they say were executed under essential error, and which, on that ground, might be reduced, and at the same time to make claims which were expressly excluded by their acceptance of the disposition of 1883.

In my opinion this position is inadmissible. If in 1883 the pursuers had claimed the minerals now in controversy, it is not by any means certain that they would have been able to acquire the surface from Mr Rintoul on the same terms. Further, even if they could it does not follow that the workings would have been conducted without regard to the particular lands below which the coal lay. It would certainly have been in the interests of the defenders and their author to have induced the mineral tenants to work out the coal under Jackson's lands, and not to touch the coal in the disputed areas; and although the pursuers say that the mineral workings could not conveniently have been confined to Jackson's lands, the defenders were at all events entitled to the opportunity of limiting them, as far as possible, to these lands. Under the disposition of 1904, which the defenders were bound to grant by the obligation in the deed of 1883, the pursuers got the benefit of all coal remaining unwrought under Jackson's lands; yet they now wish to make the defenders responsible for the coal which their tenants have taken out in the disputed areas, so that if their claim is admitted they would get a double advantage from their silence. I feel myself, therefore, on the admissions of parties, in a position to dispose of the case by sustaining the 1st and 6th pleas for the defenders, Robert Rintoul's Trs., and assoilzieing the whole defenders from the conclusions of the action.

[Said pleas in law were as follows:—

"1. In respect that the pursuers do not offer restitution of the rights acquired by them under the disposition of 14th and 15th November 1883, and do not conclude for reduction of the same, the action is incompetent.

"6. In respect of the rei interventus following upon the disposition of 14th and 15th November 1883, et separatim of the personal exception arising in terms of the said deed against them, the pursuers are excluded or barred from asserting a title to the said minerals or from disputing these defenders' title thereto.]"

My view is that if the pursuers did not choose to found upon the mutual error under which they allege the disposition of 1883 to have been granted to the effect of setting aside the disposition, they must be dealt with exactly on the same footing as if no error in fact existed. If so, it is plain that they have homologated the lease of 1875 with regard to the whole coals thereby let, and have expressly barred themselves from claiming any compensation in respect of the operations of these mineral tenants.

In this view it is unnecessary to dispose of the somewhat difficult questions of title which were raised. I may say, however, that if I had been in the pursuers' favour, I should have thought it better to reserve these until there had been enquiry as to the extent of possession. —23rd November 1907.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

The Defenders reclaimed.

After the reclaiming note had been sent to the Roll of the First Division, certain of the defenders lodged a minute of disclaimer in which they stated that they had given no instructions or authority for appearance being entered in their names, and moved in Single Bills that their names be taken out of the case and that they be found entitled to their expenses against the remaining defenders who had lodged defences.

The motion was opposed by the petitioners and by the remaining defenders.

The Court refused the motion.

The Lord President.—The point which is before us arises out of a petition and complaint presented by certain burgesses of Glasgow in order to have certain expenditure of the Common Good Fund of the city of Glasgow, which they allege to be illegal, checked. The Common Good of Glasgow is administered by the Corporation of Glasgow, the Lord Provost, Magistrates and Town Council, and accordingly in the petition, which is based, inter alia, upon an Act 2 & 3 Geo. IV. cap. 91, in the prayer of the petition warrant is asked for service upon "The Right Hon. William Bilsland, Lord Provost," then follows a string of names and addresses, and at the end of these names and addresses come these words, "all members of the Town Council of Glasgow, being the Lord Provost, Magistrates and members of the Town Council of the City and Royal Burgh of Glasgow, and to ordain them to lodge answers hereto, if so advised, within eight days after such service; and thereafter, upon resuming consideration hereof, with or without answers, and after such enquiry as to your Lordships shall seem proper, to disallow the said item of £2457, 2s. 1d., as a charge against the Common Good or Revenues of the City and Royal Burgh of Glasgow . . . . and to ordain the said account to be rectified accordingly." Now to this petition answers have been put in, and these answers have been put in in precisely the same form as was set forth in the prayer of the petition, viz. "For The Right Hon. William Bilsland, Lord Provost, etc.," followed by the list of names and by the concluding words I have just read, "all members of the Town Council of Glasgow, being the Lord Provost, Magistrates and members of the Town Council of the City and Royal Burgh of Glasgow."

Mr Gordon appears for six of these gentlemen, and in a Minute he says that they gave no instructions or authority for appearance being entered in their names, and upon that he moves that his disclaimer should be sustained, that the names of these parties be taken out of the case, and that they be found entitled to their expenses against the others who have lodged defences. It seems that something of the same character was done in the Outer House upon the motion of certain other of the defenders, but that is a matter which is not before us.

I have come to the conclusion that there is no ground for this motion. If answers were put in for these individuals as individuals, and if these individuals say that they never gave any authority, it is clear that they are entitled to have their names taken out of the unauthorised paper and entitled to their expenses against the persons who put in the unauthorised paper. But it seems clear that the simple answer here is that there was no appearance for these individuals as individuals.

The common way of citing a Corporation is to cite it by its corporate name. This seems to be the appropriate manner of citing all common law corporations, and I think the Corporation of Glasgow is a common law corporation. But further, the Corporation of Glasgow has the right of citing and of being cited by its corporate name assured to it by several Acts. But though that is so, I have never heard that a pursuer might not cite members of a corporation, provided he goes on to explain that he cites them not as individuals but as members of the Corporation. That this has been done here is clear from the print. So I think that when these answers were put in, echoing the prayer of the petition, they were put in for the Corporation and not for the individuals cited. Mr Gordon's clients may say that they do not wish to defend the action, but they cannot avoid being there in their representative capacity only as long as the majority of the Corporation desires to defend.

Lords M'Laren, Kinnear, and Pearson concurred.—12*th November* 1907.

Upon the main question the arguments of counsel and the various statutory provisions involved are fully summarised in the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and of the Lord President infra.

The Court of new repelled the preliminary plea for the defenders, and ordained the defenders to produce in process a detailed account with relative vouchers of the item of expenditure in dispute.

The Lord President.—The only point raised in the petition and complaint at this stage was whether certain objections that had been stated to the petition and complaint at the instance of the burgesses against the Town Council are in time or not, and that depends upon the regulations laid down for making objections to the accounts in the Act of Parliament dealing with the accounts. The Act of Parliament that deals generally with the accounts of municipal bodies in Scotland is the Act of 1900. But there is a provision in that Act by which what are known as the larger burghs are enabled by resolution to prevent the Act applying to their accounts, and really to maintain the status quo ante. That provision was taken advantage of by Glasgow. The Act which deals with the Common Good, the expenditure of which is here called in question, is the Act of 1822. That Act, by the first section, requires that the accounts of the Common Good and revenues of every royal burgh in Scotland, made up to the day preceding the general annual election of magistrates in each burgh, shall be annually stated and deposited in the manner directed by this Act. Then in sect. 3 there is what I may call a time-table, which I really need not go through, but which provides for the time within which objections may be taken and explanations called for, and then, if the explanations are unsatisfactory, there is allowed an appeal to the Court of Exchequer. Assuming that that time-table applies, it is admitted that these objections are in time. But the respondents, the Town Council of Glasgow, say that they are not in time, and for this reason. They say that although under the Act

Eadie and Others v. Magistrates of Glasgow.

The Lord President.

the accounts are to be made up to the day preceding the annual election of magistrates, which is some time in November, this has been changed by subsequent Act of Parliament, and that the time has been changed with it, and if the time-table is reckoned from the 31st May, which is what I may call the modern date, then it is equally admitted by both parties that these objections are not in time.

Now the first change that took place was in the Municipal Reform Act of 1833, which changed the time of making up and bringing down the account from the date of the election to the 15th day of October. One can easily see for what reason that was done. It was done at the time of the great reform of municipal corporations; and it was done, not I think for the purpose of making any difference in the objections that might be made to the accounts, but for the purpose of allowing the electors—who were now brought into existence, in the proper sense of the word, for the first time—to consider whether there had been undue expenditure or not in view of their choice of their future representatives. But that again was altered, so far as Glasgow was concerned, by the private Act of 1879, called the Glasgow Municipal Act. That Act in sect. 10 provides that the state of affairs which was required to be made up annually—that is, the then existing one, the one on or before 15th October—shall be made up as at the 31st day of May, and then it goes on to say that "no other annual state of affairs or account than that hereby authorised shall be required to be made up by them." That, of course, is perfectly plain; the date provided by that Act of 1879 for the Glasgow annual state of affairs is the 31st May and no other date in the year. But the Act does not deal with the question of objections to the accounts; that is allowed to remain upon the old statute.

It has been urged to us by Mr Macmillan, the learned counsel for the appellants, who said everything that could be said, that it is very awkward and very ungainly to have a time-table for objections starting from a different date from the time at which the account is to be made up. I think that may be conceded. But nevertheless what the learned counsel is asking us to do here is to take away these burgesses' right of objection—for that is what it comes to—simply because these burgesses have not been able to put together two Acts of Parliament and spell out a different result from what the Act of Parliament really says. I do not think that argument can be given effect to, for this very plain and simple reason that, if in the Act of 1879 the Glasgow Town Council wanted to change the calendar during which objections could be made, nothing in the world was easier than to say so. If, on the contrary, they left the matter alone, then I think the Act of Parliament must be read according to its plain letter as it stands, and we are not by inference to read into the Act of Parliament different dates from what are there set forth. Therefore I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has come to a right decision.

[His Lordship afterwards dealt with the terms of the order to be pronounced, holding that the defenders should be ordained to produce the items of and vouchers for the expenditure of the whole sum of £2457, and not merely those relating to the sum of £1142.]

Lord M'Laren.—I should have thought that a great Corporation like the municipality of Glasgow, when any part of their administration is challenged, would be anxious that the fullest light should be thrown upon their management of funds entrusted to them. Agreeing with your Lordship as to the proper construction of these statutes, I do not participate in the scruples which the Magistrates and Council seem to have as to the regularity of the present proceedings, but think they are perfectly within the scope of the statutes. Indeed it is as much in the interest of the Corporation as of the ratepayers that the legality of this expenditure should be determined by the Court, in order that in future cases there may be a guide to town councils as to how far they are entitled to burden the Common Good. I rather think I have seen some indications that municipal bodies are inclined to take too much out of the Common Good, and it is just as well that they should be reminded that such charges are subject to statutory audit or enquiry when necessary. The question will always be, whether the subject of the expenditure is fairly within the scope and duties of municipal bodies, and is for municipal purposes. I agree in all the observations your Lordship has made upon the Acts of Parliament.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree upon the simple ground which your Lordship has stated, that we cannot disregard the plain words of the Act of Parliament in order to make a series of Acts more coherent than Parliament itself has found necessary.

PROCESS—DISCLAIMER—EXPENSES—DEFENDER—ALLEGATION BY ONE OF SEVERAL DEFENDERS THAT DEFENCES LODGED WITHOUT HIS AUTHORITY—QUESTION OF AUTHORITY A DISPUTED FACT—PROCEDURE—FORM OF INTERLOCUTOR.

The pursuer in this action was the holder of a certificate of licence for 67 Carrick Street, Glasgow, and he sought to reduce a pretended deliverance of the Licensing Appeal Court held in Glasgow on 7th May 1907, which professed to sustain an appeal against, and to recal a deliverance of, the Licensing Court granting a renewal of said certificate. The grounds of reduction were, inter alia: (1) That the said Appeal Court was not validly convened and constituted; and (2) that the appeal to the said Court was not truly authorised by the parties' appellant. The pursuer called as defenders (1) the whole members of the said Appeal Court entitled to act, and its clerk; (2) certain persons alleged to be householders in Glasgow and to have been objectors in the Licensing Court and respondents in the Appeal Court. Among the latter was David Moore, residing at 81 Carrick Street, Glasgow. The action concluded for reduction and that "the defenders, but only such of them as appear to oppose the conclusions hereof, ought and should be decerned and ordained" to pay the pursuers' expenses. Defences were lodged on behalf of all the defenders.

Before the closing of the record, David Moore, one of the said defenders, lodged a minute of disclaimer narrating that he had given no authority to said defences being lodged in his name, and moved the Court to sustain said minute and to find Messrs Clark & Macdonald, the agents responsible for the lodging of said defences, liable to him in (1) the expenses of the disclaimer; (2) relief from all expenses to which he might be liable in a question with the pursuer.

For Messrs Clark & Macdonald it was stated that they did not now maintain their authority to defend for the minuter, but that originally they possessed prima facie authority in having received instructions from their Glasgow correspondents along with the service copy summons served upon the minuter, and acted in good faith.

Counsel for the minuter stated that the minuter was not even a householder or entitled to object in the Licensing Court, that his objection in the Courts below had been unauthorised, and that possession of said service copy summons in this action was obtained in the following circumstances. Messrs Clark & Macdonald's Glasgow correspondent called in minuter's absence at his address at Glasgow, and demanded and received the service copy from the minuter's mother, who was aged and unable to understand the purpose of the demand, even if it had been explained to her, as it was not.

These statements were not admitted.

In these circumstances it was maintained for the minuter (1) that he was at least entitled to the expense of the disclaimer; (2) that he was and remained liable to the pursuer for expenses incurred up to date by virtue of the implied mandate of the advocate's gown, and was therefore entitled to relief from these.

The Lord Ordinary expressed the view that as there was a difference of facts on which (the matter being so small) he was not inclined to allow a proof, he could not dispose of the question of expenses in this process, and pronounced the following interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary, of consent of the defenders Robert Henderson and others, sustains the minute of disclaimer for David Moore, No. 9 of process; and on the question of expenses, reserves the disclaimer's right to constitute his claim for said expenses in any competent Court against the person or persons who used his name without his authority."—16*th November* 1907.

ARBITRATION—AWARD—OVERSMAN—DEVOLUTION—OVERSMAN APPOINTED BY ARBITERS UNDER A WRITTEN AGREEMENT—FAILURE OF ARBITERS TO AGREE—AWARD BY OVERSMAN—HELD THAT WRITTEN MINUTE OF DEVOLUTION NOT NECESSARY FOR VALIDITY OF AWARD.

The Opinion of the Lord Ordinary sufficiently reports this case.

The oversman, who was called for any interest he might have, did not lodge defences.

Lord Salvesen.—This is an action for the reduction of an oversman's award, in a reference entered into between the pursuer and defender. There are various grounds on which the award is challenged, most of which require enquiry; but the pursuer maintained that he was entitled to have the award set aside de plano, on the ground that there was no signed minute of devolution by the arbiters devolving the reference upon the oversman, and that the award was consequently a nullity.

The reference in question was constituted by minute of agreement and submission, dated 24th and 31st August 1906, entered into between the pursuer as the incoming tenant of the farm of Broomknowe, Forfarshire, and the defender as the outgoing tenant. By this deed the parties submitted and referred to John Milne and David Morgan Graham, as arbiters and valuators, to visit and examine and thereafter to determine the true and correct values of certain subjects which were enumerated. The deed conferred power on the arbiters to appoint an oversman to act in case of difference between them. By minute dated 31st August 1906 the arbiters accepted office, and appointed John Robertson, farmer, West Drums, Brechin, to be their oversman, and he at the same time accepted of the office of oversman. This minute was executed before the arbiters had commenced to value any of the articles to be taken over by the pursuer. In taking this precaution, in case of difference, the arbiters acted according to a practice which has now become very general, and which has been approved of by the Court.

According to the pursuer's averments, one of the arbiters — Mr Graham — being dissatisfied with some information he had obtained with regard to the oversman, declined to adjust the prices of the various items with his co-arbiter until he had received satisfactory explanations from the oversman.

Thereafter Mr Milne called upon Mr Graham to pronounce a finding, intimating that he would hold his refusal to do so as a devolution of the reference upon the oversman; and as Mr Graham persisted in his attitude, the oversman was applied to and issued an award signed on 25th November 1906. It is admitted that he proceeded to act in the submission without a minute of devolution in his favour having been signed by the arbiters.

The pursuer avers that the arbiters had not differed as to the prices of the various items to be valued by them; but although it is unnecessary that I should decide this at present, there appears to me sufficient in the pursuer's averments to shew that they differed as to procedure; and any deadlock, whether occasioned by a difference on the merits or a difference as to the procedure to be followed, seems prima facie to justify the oversman in proceeding with the submission to him. As it is admitted, however, that a proof will be required on the other parts of the case, I shall not further deal with this question in the meantime.

There is admittedly no case in which it has been held that where there is a written appointment of oversman by the arbiters, a written devolution of the submission on him is necessary as matter of solemnity. The best writers on the subject all concur in the view that in a formal reference there ought to be a written minute of devolution as well as a written appointment of the oversman, but none of them categorically affirms that such a devolution is essential to the validity of the oversman's award, and I confess that I am unable to see why it should be. It was expressly decided in the case of Colquhoun v. Corbett, 1784, 2 Pat. 626, that it was competent to prove by parole evidence that two arbiters have differed in opinion, and that thereafter the oversman had a right to intervene and to pronounce a decreet arbitral. It is plain that this judgment would not have been necessary unless there had been no written devolution by the arbiters on the oversman, and, indeed, it appears from the statement of facts in the case that such a devolution was not in fact executed. The award was signed by the oversman and one of the arbiters, to wit, the arbiter who had called upon the oversman to proceed. It seems to have been assumed that if a difference of opinion had really arisen between the arbiters the interference of the oversman was well warranted; and this was the view both of the Court of Session and of the House of Lords. Lord Chancellor Thurlow gave his judgment in a single sentence to the following effect: "I am of opinion that, in the circumstances of this case, the umpire had a right to interfere"; and the order of the House of Lords expressly treats this as the ground of decision.

The pursuer, however, founded upon two more recent cases which, at first sight, seem to conflict with the decision just referred to. The first was the case of Frederick v. Maitland, 1865, 3 M. 1069; but that case is distinguishable on the ground that the oversman had neither a written appointment nor a written devolution in his favour. In the case of a formal submission it has always been held that a nomination of the oversman must be in writing. The passage in Lord Cowan's opinion on which stress was laid seems to me not to conflict, but rather to support, the decision in Colquhoun v. Corbett. He says: "But such a nomination [that is, of an oversman] is never made under a formal submission except in writing; and in this case a written devolution was necessary in order to validate the appointment of the oversman; and, further, to give the oversman jurisdiction to act, even when regularly appointed, the arbiters must have differed in opinion. Now there exists no evidence either of difference of opinion between the arbiters or the appointment of the oversman, whether at the outset of the proceedings or upon the arbiters having differed." This opinion seems to proceed on the assumption that if there had been a written appointment of the oversman, and evidence that the arbiters had differed in opinion, the oversman would have been entitled to act.

The other case is that of Sinclair v. Fraser, 1884, 11 R. 1139. In that case a petition was presented to the Sheriff praying for decree ordaining an arbiter to join with his co-arbiter in issuing an award; or otherwise to join with his co-arbiter in devolving the submission upon the oversman. The Sheriff-Substitute having examined the arbiters, found, in point of law, that a declinature by one of the arbiters to proceed in the reference constituted such a disagreement as to call the umpire's powers into exercise; and he ordained the arbiters to execute a devolution in favour of the umpire. The Sheriff recalled the interlocutor, and dismissed the action on the ground that it was unnecessary; for if—as the pursuer alleged—the arbiters had differed in opinion, no minute of devolution was required to devolve the submission on the oversman. The Sheriff proceeded as follows: "The arbiters having at the outset appointed Mr Winton as oversman in the event of their differing in opinion, the difference of opinion between them was of itself sufficient to devolve the submission on the oversman whenever the arbiters differed. The proper course for the pursuer was to have called on the oversman to proceed with the submission which had in consequence devolved upon him."

That judgment was reversed by the Second Division—Lord Young dissenting; and the decision undoubtedly creates a difficulty. I do not, however, read it as doing more than affirming the proposition that the appellant had selected a competent remedy (not necessarily the only remedy), and one which, in the circumstances of that case, was highly expedient. Lord Craighill, who gave the only reasoned opinion in support of the decision, nowhere says that an oversman acting under a written appointment might not have proceeded with the reference if the arbiters differed; and I think it would be unfortunate that such a rule should be established. In the present case, where the subjects to be valued would all pass out of existence within a few months, the whole reference might be rendered nugatory by one of the arbiters refusing either to proceed with the valuation or to devolve the reference on the oversman; for the case of Sinclair shews that a very considerable time might elapse before a final judgment was obtained on such a petition as was there presented. It is true that where there is no written minute of devolution, there is always a risk of the award being set aside, if it can be established that the arbiters never differed so as to bring the oversman's jurisdiction into operation. But in the nature of things it appears to me that this risk must be a very small one, and not comparable to the disadvantage to which the other remedy is exposed.

I shall accordingly make a finding in terms of my opinion, so as to enable the pursuer to have my decision reviewed at this stage, and allow parties a proof of their averments.—27*th Nov.* 1907.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIII. p. 4, and Vol. XIV. pp. 11 and 360.)

The pursuers reclaimed.

The facts of this case appear from the previous reports.

In addition to the argument which was put before the Lord Ordinary, and which is fully dealt with in his Note—that is to say, the argument that the road in question being de facto a public road, the duty of its maintenance lay upon the Railway Company—the reclaimers further argued that the terms of the Special Act, The Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers Act) 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. cap. cxiv.), under which the railway in question was constructed, imposed such a duty on the Railway Company. The sections of the latter Act and of the Railways Clauses Act referred to in argument read as follows:—

The Railways Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845.

Sect. 39. Crossing of roads.—If the line of railway cross any turnpike road or highway, then, except where otherwise provided by the Special Act, either such road shall be carried over the railway, or the railway shall be carried over such road, by means of a bridge . . . . and such bridge, with the immediate approaches, and all other works necessarily connected therewith, shall be executed, and at all times thereafter maintained, at the expense of the Company. . . .

1ST DIV.

Corporation of Glasgow v. Caledonian Railway Co.

The Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act 1872.

Sect. 4. Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Company may make and maintain . . . . the railways hereinafter described. . . . The railways . . . . referred to and authorised by this Act are: . . . . (A) Railway No. 2 . . . . (the railway in question).

Sect. 26. In constructing Railway No. 2, the following provisions shall be binding on the Company, who shall construct the works hereinafter specified in the manner hereinafter directed.

(3) The road or thoroughfare numbered on the deposited plans 4, in the parish of Calton, may be diverted as shewn on those plans, and shall be carried over the railway by a bridge not less than forty feet wide between the parapets, and the diverted road shall not be less than forty feet wide between the fences.

The argument upon this point appears fully from the judgment of the Lord President, infra.

The Court adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the question in this case is whether the Caledonian Railway Company are bound to maintain the highway which goes over their bridge in Strathclyde Street. The case as argued before the Lord Ordinary seems to have turned entirely upon whether the words "public highway," as used in sect. 39 of the Railways Clauses Act, do or do not apply to a road or street in the position of Strathclyde Street. That depends on whether the expression "public highway" means public de jure, or means a highway to which as at the date the public are de facto admitted. My Lords, upon this matter I agree with the Lord Ordinary. I think we must take the word "public highway" as meaning public de jure, because I think that is the only thing that squares with the general conception of the Railways Clauses Act. The Railways Clauses Act, of course, is an Act of general application which is framed with the view of being read into special Acts which shall hereafter come into being.

When a railway goes through the country it is quite certain that it will meet roads, and those roads must be in one of two conditions. They must either be public roads in the full sense of the term—that is to say, public roads de jure, whether these roads were turnpike or whether they were statute labour does not matter—or they must be private roads. In the case of a railway meeting a private road it would, of course, be necessary, quite apart from the question of a road, for the railway company to take the land, because, quite apart from the question of the road as a road, the soil belongs to the proprietor a cœlo usque ad centrum; and if the railway company want to occupy that soil, at whatever height of the stretch that comes a cœlo ad centrum, they must of course take the land. Accordingly, I think it follows from that quite clearly that there is no necessity for making any special provision as to what railway companies should do when they cross private roads as roads. Of course the effect of taking a person's road, and going through it and blocking it up, may be of great moment to the proprietor in question, and his interests are safeguarded in the Act in other ways, in particular in two ways: in the first place, there are the sections which give compensation for injurious affections; but, more than that, there are all the sections which deal with what are known as accommodation works. I only mention that to shew that I have not forgotten it, and merely in order to exclude that fasciculus of sections which, beginning with the 16th section of the Scottish Act—and there are corresponding sections in the English Act—deal with the interference which railways may make with roads, not with the view of permanency, but with the view of construction of the line. Those stand by themselves upon another basis. But passing from private roads to public roads there is, of course, nobody from whom to take the surface of the road: the surface of the road does not belong to anyone who can be compensated and paid. My Lords, probably at different periods of legal history there have existed different theories as to the actual property of the solum of public roads, and I am not sure that even at this modern time the legal theory in England and in Scotland is quite the same. But however that may be, I think I may say without doubt that no one ever heard of a road authority being compensated for the surface of a public road being taken, and accordingly it was necessary to make some provision that public roads should not be interfered with, and that provision is represented by sect. 39. It seems to me, therefore, that upon the construction of the general scope of the Act, sect. 39 was only meant to deal with public roads in the fullest and proper sense of the word—de jure public roads. That, of course, only leaves the question of fact as to whether this was a public road or not. The Lord Ordinary enquired into the whole matter, and I think has come to a conclusion that cannot be avoided, that this road at the time this railway was authorised was not a public road, although no doubt it was a road which was used by large numbers of the public, and no doubt practically would always be so: but still and none the less it seems to me the legal position of the road was that if the superior of the ground and the whole of the feuars had chosen to come to an agreement, they might have shut up the road if they wished, either replacing it by another or not as seemed good to them. Accordingly, on the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has put his judgment, and so far as the case was argued before him, his judgment is perfectly right.

But, my Lords, there is another aspect of the case which was argued before your Lordships, but which was not, I think, argued before the Lord Ordinary, and which, I confess, has given me a great deal more trouble to make up my mind upon than the other, and that is this: this particular bridge owes its existence to a special provision of the Act of 1872 under which it was made (Caledonian Railway (Additional Powers) Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. cap. cxiv.)). First of all, there is what I may call the ordinary works clause in sect. 4, and one of the works is a railway called Railway No. 2, which is the railway upon which admittedly this bridge stands. Then in sect. 26 of the same Act there comes the following provision:—"In constructing Railway No. 2 the following provision shall be binding on the Company who shall construct the works hereinafter specified in manner hereinafter directed." Then certain works, with which I need not trouble your Lordships, are specified, and then subsect. 3 says: "The road or thoroughfare numbered on the deposited Plans 4 in the parish of Calton may be diverted as shewn on these plans, and shall be carried over the railway by a bridge not less than forty feet wide between the parapets, and the diverted portions of the road shall not be less than forty feet wide between the fences." The bridge which is there referred to is admittedly this bridge over Strathclyde Street; and accordingly the question is whether the fact of this particular bridge being a special work enjoined by the Act of Parliament does not impose upon the Railway Company, quite apart from the general sections of the statute, the duty to maintain. My Lords, the 4th section of the Act, the works clause, says that the Company may make and maintain the works aftermentioned, and undoubtedly this is one of the works aftermentioned. But, my Lords, I think it is quite certain that, although at one time it was held both in this Court and in England that such a provision created a contract between the Company and anybody who could shew an interest that the works should be carried out, that doctrine was long ago upset, and the law in this Court was laid down first in the case of Lord Blantyre, 1853, 16 Dunlop 90, and was approved by the House of Lords in several cases, and especially in the case of Edinburgh, Perth and Dundee Railway Company v. Philip, 1857, 2 Macqueen 514. It is not merely well settled, I think, that, as regards construction, the powers are permissive merely, but I notice there is quite a recent case in which that has been in terms applied not only to the construction, but to the maintenance of a work once constructed. I refer to the case Reg. v. The Great Western Railway Company, 1893, reported in 62 L.J. Q.B. 572. Accordingly, upon those authorities it is, I think, quite clear that the Railway Company are not bound to maintain in respect of the works clause. Clause 26, however, is not permissive. That clause is an obligatory clause on the Railway Company if they construct Railway No. 2 at all. They need not construct Railway No. 2, but if they do, then clause 26 is obligatory. Therefore, it is quite certain that they were bound, whether they liked it or not, if they diverted the road, to carry it by this bridge over the railway; and the whole question therefore comes to be, What is the effect of the omission of the word "maintain"?

My Lords, so far as I can discover, and I have searched with considerable diligence the authorities, this is a new question. I have not been able to discover any case in either England or Scotland where that question arose as in the case of a work which was specially enjoined by the special Act. I have not found a case where the thing in question is a bridge specially enjoined by the special Act and crossing a private road. There are plenty of cases where the bridge specially provided for crosses a public road, but then, of course, the peculiar question does not arise, because it is perfectly obvious that the general sections apply. But upon the best consideration the only conclusion I can come to is that the omission of the word "maintain" is fatal to the construction of the pursuers. It seems to me that the very anxiety with which in the general statute the word "maintain" is always put in shews that if it were not there there would not be an obligation of maintenance. "Maintain" is put in not only in sect. 39, but it is put in also in all the clauses that deal with accommodation works. In a clause of this sort I think that the person who was stipulating for the work, who, I suppose, would be the proprietor, must fairly be taken as proferens of the clause, and that the clause must be construed literally according as it stands. I am not omitting the consideration that I think this argument really logically leads to this, that the Railway Company are not bound to maintain the structure of the bridge any more than they are to maintain the roadway. I say that notwithstanding the concession on the part of the Railway Company's counsel in one part of the argument that they were so bound. I do not think that concession ought logically to be made. But I do not think that fact in any way shocks me, for this very good reason, that it would be perfectly evident that the Railway Company would be bound to maintain the structure of the bridge, not because they were made to by the terms of the obligation, but for their own security. If they allowed the bridge, being an overhead bridge, to get out of order and become in a dangerous condition, it is quite evident that they would subject their own property to grave risk, and subject themselves to very grave risk of damages if through the falling of any portion of the bridge anybody who was using their railway was hurt. Therefore I do not think that the absence of an actual clause binding them to maintain the structure of the bridge very much matters. Upon the whole matter, and I found the point one of some difficulty upon which to make up my mind, I have come to the conclusion that in a doubtful case we must take the Act as we find it, and inasmuch as there is an obvious distinction made between making and maintaining in other sections where we find making and maintaining, the section must be read literally as it stands. Consequently here there is no obligation upon the Railway Company to maintain this bridge upon the ground of the special clause, because maintenance is not there expressed, and there is no obligation in the general clause, because this bridge is not over a road to which the general clause applies. The fact that there may be bridges to which an obligation of maintenance on the part of a railway company does not apply, seems to me to be recognised—although I do not put too much stress upon this argument—by another statute—namely, the Abandonment of Railways Act 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. cap. 83), which in sect. 22 deals with the matter thus:—"Be it enacted that, where the line of any railway so authorised to be abandoned shall have been wholly or partially laid out, and no road shall have been carried across such line of railway by means of a bridge or tunnel over or under such railway, which bridge or tunnel the Company to whom such railway belonged would, in case the same had not been abandoned, have been liable to keep in repair, then in every such case except where such bridge or tunnel shall, with the permission of said Commissioners, be by such Company removed, and such road restored to the like or an equally convenient and good state as the same was in, before it was interfered with by the makers of such railways, to the satisfaction (in the case of difference between such Company and the owner or persons having the management of such road) of the Commissioners, such Company shall pay to the owner of such road, if it be a private road, or to the trustees, surveyors of highways, or other person having the management of such road, if it be a turnpike or other public road, a sum of money, to be determined by arbitration as aftermentioned, in lieu and discharge of their liability to keep such bridge or tunnel, and also the roadway, over the same in repair." Now, I think that is quite consistent with the view that I have taken, because, in the first place, it distinguishes between the case of public and private roads, and then in all these things it distinguishes between the cases where the Company would, if the railway had not been abandoned, have been liable to keep it in repair, and cases where it would not. Accordingly, I think it is fair to say that it was in the contemplation of Parliament when it enacted that section that there might be bridges in just the condition I have come to the conclusion this one was, namely, a bridge over a private road which the Railway Company were not under obligation to repair; and I remind your Lordships that that bridge could not be an accommodation bridge, because, so far as an accommodation bridge is concerned, there is always the obligation to make and maintain.

My conclusion, therefore, is that this special point does not disturb the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary.

Lord M'Laren.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with your Lordship that the difficulty in the case is that there are no precedents to guide us as to the construction of the Caledonian Railway Company's private Act. Under the works clause the Company, of course, were under no obligation to make the Railway No. 2 over which this bridge is constructed. But then if they did decide to exercise the power to make the railway, it was obligatory upon them to construct the bridge. The clause authorising the Company to construct the bridge, from its form and substance, appears to be of the nature of what is called a protection clause—a clause possibly drawn or at any rate suggested by the proprietor whose interests it was intended to safeguard. Therefore I think it must be taken that this protection clause represents all that has been claimed from the Company for the interference with the continuity of the road by the railway being run across it. Now, as the Act only puts the Company under obligation to construct, and says nothing about maintenance, it follows, as I think, that no action can be brought by the city to compel the Company to maintain the road. What would happen in the case of a railway being abandoned seems to be quite clear, but of course we have not that point before us. It is only useful by way of illustration of what, I venture to think, is the conclusion to be drawn from the two clauses of this private Act which are under consideration.

Justiciary Cases — Licensing Acts — Allowing Assistant to Sell to Child Under Fourteen Years of Age—Failure to Give Instructions to Assistant—Sale Outwith Knowledge of Licensee—Licensing

ACT 1903 (3 EDW. VII. CAP. 25), SECT. 59—CONVICTION SUSTAINED.

Stated Case.

This was an appeal by stated case against a conviction obtained against the appellant in the police court at Leith on a complaint which charged a contravention of sect. 59 of the Licensing Act 1903, by allowing a sale of liquor to a child under the age of fourteen years, contrary to that section.

The case set forth :—

This is a cause wherein the appellant was charged in the Leith Police Court, on the 10th day of July 1907, at the instance of the respondent, with contravening sect. 59 of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903, in respect that, on the 29th June last, within the licensed premises occupied by him at 23 and 24 Bridge Street, Leith, he did knowingly allow David Inglis, an assistant in said premises, to sell and deliver exciseable liquor, namely—a half pint of ale and a half pint of porter, to Beatrice Nicholson, an orphan, residing with John Furlong, a labourer, residing in Carpenter's Land, Coburg Street, Leith, who was then eleven years and two months and under fourteen years of age, for consumption off the said premises, such exciseable liquor not being sold and delivered to the said Beatrice Nicholson in corked and sealed vessels in quantities not less than one reputed pint for consumption off said premises only.

The appellant at the said diet of appearance on 10th July pled not guilty, and the diet was adjourned to 13th July, at 10 o'clock. On said latter date the appellant again appeared, and, adhering to his plea of not guilty, the case went to proof. After hearing evidence for the burgh prosecutor and for the respondent, and having heard the burgh prosecutor and the appellant's agent, I adjourned the diet to 18th July for judgment. On said latter date I pronounced judgment.

The following facts were held by me to be proved, viz. : On the evening of Saturday, 29th June, between nine and ten o'clock, the said Beatrice Nicholson entered the appellant's licensed premises mentioned in the complaint by the jug bar. The jug bar is entered from the street by a separate door from that by which the public bar is entered. The public bar and the jug bar are divided outside the bar by a screen which is carried the breadth of the counter, and both are supplied from behind the counter. Beatrice Nicholson ordered half a pint of ale and half a pint of porter from David Inglis, an assistant in the appellant's shop. The said David Inglis has been in the appellant's employment as assistant since he purchased the business seven years ago. The said David Inglis supplied the said Beatrice Nicholson with the liquor ordered, as libelled. The appellant was not at the time either in the public or jug bar, but was engaged in a room in another part of the shop, and Beatrice Nicholson was supplied by the said David Inglis outwith the appellant's presence and actual personal knowledge. The said Beatrice Nicholson had left the appellant's shop without his having seen her, and he only saw her when she was brought back to the shop by the police, who noticed her leaving the shop with the beer and porter in open pitchers, and immediately took her back to the shop to ascertain whether she had been supplied there, and by whom she had been served.

The said Beatrice Nicholson was eleven years and two months of age, and her appearance in the witness box shewed that she was diminutive and youthful looking even for a girl of that age. She had previously frequented the shop with her mother. Her family was well known to the said David Inglis, who had a conversation with the mother about the girl's age, the mother stating that the girl was a twin and diminutive for her age. Inglis must or ought to have known that the girl was under fourteen years of age.

No notice was displayed in the appellant's shop warning assistants to be careful to observe the provisions of the said section of the Act alleged to be contravened, and it was clear to me that sufficient instructions, verbal or written, had not been given to the said David Inglis not to supply children under fourteen years of age with exciseable liquor, except as provided in said section.

No complaint before the present has been made against the appellant or his servants.

On the facts proved I found the appellant guilty as charged, fined him in the sum of twenty shillings, and in default of immediate payment, sentenced him to seven days' imprisonment.

The Question of Law for the opinion of the Court was: Do the facts proved warrant a conviction?

The Licensing Act 1903 provides by sect. 59 :

LIX. Sale of exciseable liquors to children under fourteen illegal.—(1) Every holder of a certificate who knowingly sells or delivers, or allows any person to sell or deliver, save at the residence or working place of the purchaser, any description of exciseable liquor to any person under the age of fourteen years for consumption by any person on or off the premises, excepting such exciseable liquors as are sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels in quantities not less than one reputed pint for consumption off the premises only, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for the first offence, and not exceeding five pounds for any subsequent offence.

Argued for Appellant: The essence of the charge was knowledge on the part of the accused. That was expressly negatived by the stated case. The sale took place outwith his knowledge and presence. In order to support a conviction, there must be either knowledge or connivance on the part of the accused. Nothing less would do. Failure to give instructions could never be the same thing as knowingly allowing a sale. The section was a repetition of sect. 2 of the Intoxicating Liquors (Sale to Children) Act 1901 (1 Edw. VII. cap. 27). The following cases had been decided under that Act, viz.: Emary v. Nolloth, [1903], 2 K.B. 264; Conlon v. Muldowney [1904], I.R. 2 K.B. 498; M'Kenna v. Harding, 1905, 69 J.P. Cas. 354. No doubt in these cases instructions had been given, but if instructions were necessary such instructions as were there given were insufficient.

Counsel for the respondent was not called on.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

Lord M'Laren.—In this case the question is, What constitutes an offence against the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903, sect. 59? That section

High Court of Justiciary

Greig v. M'Leod.

imposes a penalty on "every holder of a certificate who knowingly sells or delivers, or allows any person to sell or deliver, save at the residence or working place of the purchaser, any description of exciseable liquor to any person under the age of fourteen years, for consumption by any person on or off the premises, excepting such exciseable liquors as are sold or delivered in corked and sealed vessels."

In the present case the facts as found proved by the magistrate made it clear that such liquor was supplied in an open vessel to a girl of eleven years of age, whose appearance was suggestive that she was even younger, and that no notice or instructions had been given to the assistant, David Inglis, not to supply children under fourteen years of age in such a manner. The question is, therefore, the liquor having been sold in these circumstances by an assistant, has an offence been committed? In the case of Emary v. Nolloth we have the authority of Lord Alverstone for this construction of the provisions of the section, that if a person in the position of the appellant delegates the conduct of his business to another, he is responsible for the acts of the person to whom he has given the institorial power, as if he had made the sale himself. Now I think it is not an illegitimate extension of the rule thus laid down if I say that every licensee who delegates the conduct of a part of his business, is at least responsible to the extent that he must give instructions to his assistant as to compliance with Acts of Parliament which regulate the spirit trade.

The magistrate here has given the facts very clearly, and we must take his findings as conclusive on the facts. He says: "It was clear to me that sufficient instructions, verbal or written, had not been given to David Inglis not to supply children under fourteen years of age with exciseable liquor, except as provided in the section." In the absence of any such instructions, I think it is consistent with a sound construction of the statute to hold that if the appellant does not instruct his assistant to give obedience to the requirements of the statute, he must be taken as assenting to what is done under his authority, and that in this case he has contravened section 59 of the Act. I am therefore of opinion that the argument for the appellant fails, and that this appeal falls to be dismissed.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with your Lordship. I only desire to add that the question which the case purports to raise is one of fact, and I see no ground in law for disturbing the magistrate's finding on the facts.

Lord Pearson.—I am of the same opinion.—4th December 1907.

Justiciary Cases—Motor Car—Regulation by Secretary for Scotland—Ultra Vires—Local Authority—Road Partly in Burgh and Partly in County—Management Devolved on County Council by Burgh Authority under Roads and Bridges Act—Motor Car Act 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 36), sects. 9, 18—Roads and Bridges Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. cap. 51), sects. 11, 47—A County Council Held to be the Local Authority Entitled to Petition the Secretary for Scotland for an Order Regulating the Rate of Speed on a Road Partly in County and Partly in Burgh, the Burgh Authority having Devolved the Management of the Road on the County Council.

Bill of Suspension.

This was a bill of suspension of a conviction obtained against the suspender in the Sheriff Court at Haddington on a complaint which charged

That Daniel Stewart, motor car driver, No. 70 Donaldson Street, Kirkintilloch, on 3rd July 1907, on the public highway leading between East Linton and Dunbar, and particularly at a part thereof in the village of West Barns, in the parish of Dunbar, in the county of Haddington, near the Public Hall, West Barns, he being the driver of a motor car then on said public highway, did drive said car along said highway, place aforesaid, at the rate of 17 miles per hour, being a speed exceeding 10 miles per hour, contrary to the Motor Car Act 1903, sect. 9, and the Motor Cars Regulation (County of Haddington) (No. 2) Order 1905, dated 31st October 1905, regulating the speed of motor cars within certain limits or places in the county of Haddington.

The grounds of suspension and the answers thereto were as follows:—

Stat. 2. The complaint was served upon the complainer, and in answer thereto he appeared before the Sheriff-Substitute at Haddington, on the 15th day of July 1907, when the diet was adjourned to the 12th of August 1907. At this adjourned diet the complainer's agent pleaded that the complaint was irrelevant, but the objection was repelled. The Sheriff-Substitute convicted the complainer of the contravention charged and fined him £5, which was immediately paid at the Bar.

Ans. 2. Admitted that the first or pleading diet was on 15th July 1907. Explained that the case was adjourned till the 22nd July 1907, when evidence was led. No objection was taken to the relevancy of the complaint, but, in cross-examination of the witnesses for the prosecution, it came out that there was a doubt as to whether part of the road in the village of Westbarns was or was not in the burgh of Dunbar. The agent for Daniel Stewart (the present complainer) produced a sheet of the Ordnance Survey, shewing that for a certain distance the centre of the public road in the village of Westbarns is the boundary of the burgh of Dunbar, and gave evidence in support thereof. No interlocutor was pronounced repelling a plea on the relevancy, and no objection thereto was noted.

The case for both prosecution and defence was closed on 22nd July, but the Sheriff-Substitute, to allow time for consideration of the point raised, adjourned the diet to 12th August, when he gave his decision convicting the complainer.

Stat. 4. The complainer maintains that the Motor Cars Regulation (county of Haddington) (No. 2) Order 1905, dated 31st October 1905, referred to in the complaint, which pretends to regulate the speed of motor cars over the portion of the road on which the complainer's car was travelling, is invalid and ultra vires in respect that the regulations were not made by the Secretary for Scotland on the application of the local authority of the area in question as provided by sect. 9 (1) and sect. 18 of the said Act. In terms of said regulations and of sect. 10 of said Motor Car Act, the County Council of Haddington have placed posts on the east and west side of the said village of West Barns. One of these posts has been placed at a point 40 yards west of the bridge which crosses the Biel Burn, and the other at a point 40 yards east of the road which leads to the school, both on the road leading from East Linton to Dunbar. These posts purport to indicate the limits within which the speed of motor cars must be restricted to the rate of 10 miles per hour. The distance between these two points is about 480 yards. The County Council of the county of Haddington is not the local authority within the meaning of said Motor Car Act for the portion of said road marked off by the said two posts. The said portion of roadway is partly within the area of the said County Council as local authority and partly within that of the Town Council of the burgh of Dunbar, which is a royal burgh. For the space of 213 yards or thereby, the boundary between the burgh of Dunbar and the landward portion of the parish of Dunbar runs along said roadway. Within that distance the centre of the roadway forms the southern boundary of the said burgh for a distance of 130 yards, and for the remaining 83 it forms the northern boundary of a detached portion of the said burgh. The said roadway is accordingly for part of the distance mentioned in said regulations not within the jurisdiction of the County Council of the county of Haddington, as local authority within the meaning of said Motor Car Act 1903.

Ans. 4. Denied that the Order referred to is ultra vires of the Secretary for Scotland, and reference is made to separate Statement of Facts for respondent. Admitted that the County Council of Haddington, as the local authority in terms of the Order referred to, and of the provisions of the Motor Car Act 1903, placed posts at the east and west ends of the village of Westbarns, on which are displayed copies of the Order referred to, indicating that the speed of motor cars on the road between the posts is limited to 10 miles per hour. The distance between the two posts is 544 yards. Admitted that for a certain distance the boundary of Dunbar burgh appears from the Ordnance Survey to be the centre of the road in the village of Westbarns. Quoad ultra denied.

Stat. 5. The said order was obtained solely upon the application of the County Council of Haddington. The Town Council of the burgh of Dunbar, who are the local authority entrusted with the management of said roadway for part of said distance, equally with the County Council of Haddington, took no steps to have said road scheduled or an order obtained from the Secretary for Scotland with reference thereto. Said order was therefore wholly inept, or at all events it was invalid and ultra vires quoad that part of the roadway which was not within the jurisdiction of the said County Council. Further, the complaint is irrelevant from want of specification as to the precise point at which the alleged offence was committed, or upon which side of the road the car was travelling. The northern half of the said roadway, within said limits to the extent foresaid, is situated entirely within the burgh of Dunbar, and no offence was committed by driving a car thereon over ten but under twenty miles per hour. On behalf of the complainer the burgh boundaries were pointed out to the Sheriff-Substitute in evidence given by the town clerk of Dunbar, and no evidence was led by the respondent as to which side of the road the car travelled on.

Ans. 5. Admitted that the Order was obtained solely upon the application of the County Council of Haddington, which is the road authority of said county and the local authority within the meaning of said Motor Car Act. The locus libelled in the complaint was quite specific. Quoad ultra denied.

Statement of Facts for Respondent.

Stat. 1. In the end of 1904 the County Council of the county of Haddington, which is the Road Authority of said county and the Local Authority within the meaning of the Motor Car Act 1903, with a view to the safety of the public, applied to the Secretary for Scotland to have the speeds of motor cars restricted within certain limits in the county. One of the roads referred to in the application was the main road passing through the village of Westbarns. Notice of the application was advertised in the local papers, "The Haddingtonshire Courier" and "The Haddingtonshire Advertiser" of 2nd December 1904, and parties objecting were requested to lodge objections with the Secretary for Scotland at the Scottish Office, Whitehall, London, within fourteen days of the date of publication of the advertisement. Parties objecting were also asked to send a copy of such objections to the county clerk.

A further advertisement was inserted in the said local papers of 17th February 1905, intimating that the Secretary for Scotland had appointed Alexander Stuart, Esq., advocate, General Superintendent to the Local Government Board, as Commissioner to hold a public enquiry in regard to the foresaid application, and that such public enquiry would be held in the County Buildings, Haddington, on Monday, 27th February 1905. Objections were lodged by one individual and by two motor clubs to the application in toto, but no objections were lodged or stated for the Town Council of the burgh of Dunbar, or by any other person, with regard to the part of the road in question in the village of Westbarns. Thereafter the Regulation Order was made by the Secretary for Scotland, of date 31st October 1905.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY

Stewart v. Todrick.

STAT. 2. The part of the road as defined by the Secretary for Scotland's Order is the main road passing through the village of Westbarns, from 50 yards before the first to 50 yards beyond the last house. The area within which the speed limit is restricted is indicated by a post placed on the north side of the road at the west end of the village and a post on the south side of the road at the east end of the village. The distance between the two posts is 544 yards. Each post has a copy of the Secretary for Scotland's Regulation affixed to it, and is surmounted by a hollow disc with 10 M. P.H. (10 miles per hour) printed upon it.

STAT. 3. The evidence led on 22nd July at the trial applied not to the whole of the road lying between the two posts, but to 400 yards of it measured from the eastmost post westwards to Westbarns public hall, over which an uninterrupted view was obtainable. From an Ordnance Survey sheet produced, and from evidence given by the present complainer's agent, Mr White, town clerk of Dunbar, it appeared that for 83 yards of the 400 the boundary between the burgh of Dunbar and the county is the centre of the public road, the northern half of the road for this distance being within the burgh. For the remainder of the said 400 yards the road lies wholly within the county and outwith the said burgh. From the evidence of Mr White, it also appeared that the roads within the burgh of Dunbar were maintained by the County Council, the Town Council of Dunbar paying the County Council for doing so. Application having been duly made, in terms of the Motor Car Act 1903, to the Secretary for Scotland, by the County Council, which, as the County Road Authority and the Local Authority within the meaning of said Act, has jurisdiction over the road in question, the Secretary for Scotland was entitled, if he thought the safety of the public required it, to pronounce the Order founded on. The population of the burgh of Dunbar, according to the last census, is 3357. For the purposes of said Act, the said burgh is to be deemed to form part of the county of Haddington.

The suspender pleaded:

"1. The complaint is irrelevant from want of specification.

"2. The said regulation of the County Council of Haddington is invalid and ultra vires; et separatim is invalid and ultra vires quoad the portion of said roadway not under their jurisdiction."

The Motor Car Act 1903 provides:

Sect. 9.—(1) Sect. 4 of the principal Act (which relates to the rate of speed of motor cars) is hereby repealed, but a person shall not, under any circumstances, drive a motor car on a public highway at a speed exceeding twenty miles per hour, and within any limits or place referred to in regulations made by the Local Government Board with a view to the safety of the public on the application of the local authority of the area in which the limits or place are situate, a person shall not drive a motor car at a speed exceeding ten miles per hour.

Sect. 18. In the application of this Act to Scotland—

(1) A reference to the Secretary for Scotland shall be substituted for a reference to the Local Government Board; and

(2) A reference to the council of a royal, parliamentary, or police burgh, containing within its boundaries, as ascertained, fixed, or determined for police purposes, a population according to the census for the time being last taken of or exceeding fifty thousand, shall be substituted for a reference to the council of a county burgh, and every other burgh shall be deemed to form part of the county within which it is situate; and

(3) the road authority of any county or of any royal, parliamentary, or police burgh shall be the local authority within the meaning of the provisions of this Act which relate to the rate of speed and the erection of danger boards.

The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act 1878 provides:

Sect. 11. In each county the management and maintenance of the highways and bridges within the county shall be vested in and incumbent on the county road trustees, and the management and maintenance of the highways and bridges within each burgh situated in or partly situated in such county shall be vested in and incumbent on the burgh local authority.

Sect. 47. The highways and bridges situated within any burgh shall be by virtue of this Act transferred to and vested in the local authority of such burgh, and such local authority shall have the entire management and control of the same, and shall possess the same rights, powers, and privileges, and be subject to the same liabilities in reference to such highways and bridges (including the construction of new roads and bridges) as the trustees under this Act possess and are liable to in reference to roads, highways, and bridges (including as aforesaid) in the landward part of the county, including the right to any assets belonging thereto, and shall also have and may exercise with reference to the construction, maintenance, and repair of the roads, highways, and bridges within their respective boundaries, such and the like powers and authorities as they possess with reference to any streets within their respective boundaries: Provided that the local authority of any burgh not containing more than ten thousand inhabitants according to the census last taken may, by a resolution passed at a meeting summoned for the purpose, on not less than one month's notice, by special advertisement, devolve the management and maintenance of the highways and bridges within the boundaries or forming the boundary thereof upon the trustees of the county within which such burgh or any portion thereof is situated, on payment to such trustees of such an annual sum or upon such terms as may be agreed upon.

Argued for Suspender: The road was partly in the burgh and partly in the county. Therefore both the burgh and the county authorities ought to have petitioned for the regulation. As they did not do so, the regulation proceeded on an invalid petition, and was therefore ultra vires. The county authority had no power to procure the passing of a regulation affecting a road outwith their jurisdiction, and any regulation passed at their instance was invalid. The fact that the County Council had imposed on them the management and maintenance of this road by the Town Council under sect. 47 of the Roads and Bridges Act 1878 did not make the County Council the local authority under the Motor Car Act. The County Council were thereby merely made the contractors for the upkeep of the road. "Management and maintenance" did not cover the control of the traffic on the road (Lanarkshire Road Trs. v. Kelvinside Estate Trs., 1886, 14 R. (H.L.) 18). "Maintenance" meant the upkeep of the fabric of the road only; and "management" must be read as ejusdem generis with maintenance.

Argued for Respondent: It was incompetent in a case of this kind to question the validity of a regulation which was ex facie valid (Crichton v. Forfar County Road Trustees, 1886, 13 R. J. 99; Institute of Patent Agents v. Lockwood, 1894, 21 R. (H.L.) 61). The Order had been laid before Parliament and was therefore unchallengeable, not having been objected to. Further, the objection was not that the Order was outwith the powers of the Secretary for Scotland, but that the people who set the Secretary in motion were the wrong people. No one was entitled to complain of this unless perhaps the people who were entitled to petition. If they did not, certainly no one else had any title to do so. The active consent of the burgh to the petition would have been sufficient. The want of any objection on their part when an enquiry was held, was at least equivalent to tacit consent on their part. But the County Council were the local authority under the Motor Car Act. It was the policy of that Act to treat all small burghs as parts of the county (sect. 9 (4) (b)). But the arrangement under the 1878 Act put all difficulty at an end. So long as that arrangement subsisted the burgh authority had nothing to do but pay. The whole control and management were in the hands of the County Council. The local authority quoad this road was the authority which managed and maintained it, viz. the County Council.

The Court refused the bill and sustained the conviction.

Lord M'Laren.—We have had a very full and interesting argument upon the questions raised in this case, and especially concerning the validity of the Regulation Order made by the Secretary for Scotland under the authority of the Motor Car Act 1903. By sect. 9 of that Act it is provided that "within any limit or place referred to in regulations made by the Local Government Board with a view to the safety of the public, on the application of the local authority of the area in which the limits or place are situate, a person shall not drive a motor car at a speed exceeding ten miles per hour." By sect. 18 it is provided that in the application of the Act to Scotland, "Secretary for Scotland" shall be substituted for "Local Government Board," and that "the road authority of any county, or of any royal, parliamentary or police burgh, shall be the local authority within the meaning of the provisions of this Act which relate to the rate of speed and the erection of danger boards." Now, sect. 9 is a provision relating to rate of speed, and accordingly when, under that section, power is given to make regulations, the only authority entitled to apply to the Secretary for Scotland for such regulation is the local authority, that is, the road authority in the county or burgh, as the case may be. But we are informed of a fact which does not appear in the bill of suspension but is disclosed in the answers, that, acting under the authority of the Roads and Bridges Act 1878, and particularly under sect. 47, the burgh of Dunbar has, in the words of the statute, "devolved" upon the County Council of Haddington the "management and maintenance" of the road in question "forming the boundary" of the burgh. I assume for the purposes of this case that all the requirements of procedure as to devolution were carried out. There is a general presumption that all public acts have been carried out in conformity with law, and I assume that it is so in this case. This devolution having taken place, can it be doubted that, so long as it continued, the whole administration of this road passed to the County Council of Haddington? It is quite certain that the burgh of Dunbar no longer possesses the power of administration, and cannot in any reasonable sense be considered the road authority. Unless the County Council is the road authority, we are shut up to this paradoxical result, that there is no road authority having control of the road in question. I think there can be no doubt that the effect of the devolution was to make the County Council the road authority, not only for the purposes of the Roads and Bridges Act, but also for the purposes of the Motor Car Act. I am confirmed in this opinion by the terms of the proviso to sect. 47 of the Roads and Bridges Act, which enacts that "any such resolution of the local authority of a burgh may be rescinded, with the consent of and on such terms as may be agreed upon with the county road trustees, and thereupon the original rights, powers, privileges and liabilities of the said local authority shall revive in full force and effect." It would be difficult in any view to say what would be left, after the "management and maintenance" had been devolved, except a naked right of property, but I read the proviso as putting a wide interpretation upon the terms "management and maintenance," and as making it clear that under these words are included all the "rights, powers, privileges and liabilities" originally possessed by the burgh.

If such be the construction of the two Acts with which we are concerned, then the Order made by the Secretary for Scotland is in conformity with the statute, and must be obeyed. But I reserve my opinion on the question whether an Order made by a Department of Government in the exercise of authority conferred by Parliament, can be challenged as being ultra vires in a summary proceeding for the recovery of penalties. It is not to be supposed that an order going beyond the powers conferred by Parliament has authority in an absolute sense, but it may well be that it is to be treated as a good order until it is disaffirmed by a Court having jurisdiction to determine its validity. I see great inconvenience in admitting that, whenever a defender is brought before a court of summary jurisdiction, he is entitled to raise the question of the validity of the Order which he is said to have transgressed. In this case the judge having jurisdiction is the Sheriff; but offences against orders such as the one in question are not infrequently tried in a court where the judge is not a trained lawyer, and I should not like to commit myself to the proposition that such a judge has authority to absolve the accused on the ground that the Order is ultra vires. For the present I only say that I am not satisfied that this Court of Appeal would have power to determine a legal question which could not be raised in the court of first instance.

Stewart v. Todrick.

Lord M'Laren.

I am of opinion that the bill of suspension should be refused and the conviction sustained.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree in desiring to express no view upon the question last mentioned by your Lordship, but I am clearly of opinion that the suspension should be refused.

On 31st October 1905 the Secretary for Scotland pronounced an Order, upon the application of the County Council of Haddington, forbidding any person to drive a motor car at a speed exceeding ten miles per hour within certain specified limits, and on 12th August 1907 the complainer was convicted of an infringement of this Order. It is admitted that the complainer has no right to challenge this conviction upon the merits, since there is no appeal upon the question of fact. But he objects to it upon the ground that the Order which he transgressed was ultra vires, because the statute allows the Secretary for Scotland to make such an Order on the application only of the local authority of the county or burgh where the road is situated. It appears that for a certain not very considerable distance the road to which the Order applies is situated upon the boundary between the county of Haddington and the burgh of Dunbar, the true boundary being the medium filum of the road, and it is said that the Secretary for Scotland had no power, on the application of the county of Haddington, to issue an order affecting the portion of the road lying within the boundaries of the burgh of Dunbar, seeing that the County Council had no authority over this portion of the road. I do not think it necessary to consider whether, even if they had no other authority than that which extended to the medium filum, that would not have been enough to support the application on a sound construction of the Act of 1903, and to enable them to consider the question of the speed at which motor cars could be driven on their own half of the road. I do not think that question arises. It is quite obvious that the management of such a road as this would be impossible if the two local authorities had not the good sense to provide by agreement for a uniform administration of the whole; and accordingly, in terms of the 47th section of the Roads and Bridges Act 1878, these two local authorities had come to an arrangement by which the burgh of Dunbar "devolved" upon the County Council of Haddington the "management and maintenance" of the road. It is argued that all that was handed over was the "management and maintenance," the burgh retaining certain other rights and privileges, comprehended under the term "control." I do not consider it necessary to decide what were the exact powers which were devolved upon the County Council, for I think it enough to say that when they took over the "management and maintenance," they became for certain purposes the road authority—and the only road authority—not only over their own half of the road, but also over the half which lies within the boundaries of the burgh, and by sect. 18 of the Act of 1903, the road authority is declared to be the local authority within the meaning of sect. 9. If the burgh of Dunbar had any right to maintain that the title to apply for an Order regulating the speed of motor cars was one of the rights retained by them—and I express no opinion as to that—I am clearly of opinion that no one else has the right to maintain it. The whole procedure had the assent of the burgh, at least they stated no objections to it; and I do not think that the accused has a title to raise such a technical objection as this, when all the persons who could claim to be the road authorities are agreed on what has been done.

I accordingly agree that the suspension should be dismissed.

Lord Pearson.—I am of the same opinion. I have nothing to add as to the circumstances in which and the pleas upon which a statutory Order such as this can be challenged. On the merits, we must bear in mind the peculiar circumstances found here, viz. a road forming the boundary between the burgh of Dunbar and the county, where the duty of management and control fell on each authority respectively up to the medium filum of the road. That was a case calling for some regulation by agreement between the two parties; and accordingly the burgh here has devolved the management of the road in question on the County Council. In consequence of this agreement the County Council became the road authority as regards the management of the road, and as such was the proper party to apply for the Order in question.—4th December 1907.

(Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Perthshire at Perth.)

On 7th May 1904 Robert D. Torbet, postmaster, Balbeggie, and David Cromb, farmer, Balbeggie, granted a guarantee in favour of Messrs Hay & Co., auctioneers, Perth, whereby they guaranteed "full and final payment of all purchases made, or that may be made, and of all sums advanced, or that may be advanced, by you to Alexander Cromb, dairyman, St Martins, Balbeggie, with interest at the rates, as may from time to time be charged by you, declaring that the said sums shall not exceed the total of seventy-five pounds sterling (£75)."

On 1st August 1904 the business of Messrs Hay & Co. was transferred to a limited company—Messrs Hay & Co., Ltd. No notice of this change was sent to the cautioners.

On 26th January 1905 Hay & Co. Ltd. rendered an account to the principal debtor, Alexander Cromb, bringing out a balance due by him to them as at 2nd January 1905 of £87, 10s. 10d. The account was in the following terms:—

On 26th July 1905 the cautioner, Torbet, wrote to Hay & Co. withdrawing his name from the guarantee.

On 25th August 1905 the principal debtor, Alexander Cromb, became bankrupt. The present action was then brought at the instance of Hay & Co. and Hay & Co. Ltd. against Torbet to recover, inter alia, the sum of £67, 4s. 6d. for which the pursuers alleged that the defender was liable under the said guarantee.

After sundry procedure proof was allowed and led. The import of the proof sufficiently appears from the judgments.

On 2nd July 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute (Sym) decerned against the defender for the sum of £67, 4s. 6d.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Johnston) who, on 15th October 1907, adhered.

The defender appealed and argued: If there was an account current between the parties, then, in the absence of express appropriation, the rule in Clayton's case (Devaynes v. Noble, cit. infra) applied, and items on the credit side fell to be set against items on the debit side in order of date (Devaynes v. Noble, 1816, 1 Merivale 530, 3 Ross L.C. (Commercial Law) subsequent payments into the account as to make Cromb, as far as possible, pay his way.

Lord Low concurred.

Lord Ardwall.—The principal facts in this case are not in dispute. On 7th May 1904 the defender granted to Hay & Co., a firm of auctioneers, the guarantee which is No. 4 of process, by which he guaranteed the debts that might be due to Hay & Co. by a dairyman called Alexander Cromb, to the amount of £75. After certain dealings had taken place between Hay & Co. and Alexander Cromb, the business of Hay & Co. was transferred, with its rights and obligations, to Hay & Co. Ltd., who were duly incorporated under the Companies Acts on 1st August 1904, and on that date took over the assets and liabilities of Hay & Co. At that date the sum of £67, 4s. 6d. was due to Hay & Co. by Alexander Cromb, and this action is brought for recovery of that sum with periodical and other interest.

The parties are agreed that the defender is not liable for any advances made or goods supplied by Hay & Co. Ltd. to Alexander Cromb after the incorporation of the limited company, but the defender further maintains that the guaranteed debt has been extinguished by payments made by Alexander Cromb to Hay & Co. Ltd. after 1st August 1904, and the only question which was discussed on the appeal was whether the defender was entitled to have such payments imputed to the extinction of the debt of £67, 4s. 6d. I am of opinion that he was not so entitled, and that accordingly the judgment of the Sheriff ought to be affirmed.

This case is of some interest as being, so far as the citation of authorities at the debate was concerned, the first case in which the question of appropriation of payments to account of particular debts has been raised in this Court since the authoritative judgment of the House of Lords in the English case of Cory Brothers & Co. v. Owners of "The Mecca" [1897], A.C. p. 286.

Two points were raised at the debate: First, whether the account No. 18 of process, which was the only account rendered by Hay & Co. Ltd. to the principal debtor, was so stated as to infer a presumption against the pursuers that the payments to account claimed by the defender had been appropriated by the pursuers to the items due by Mr Cromb to them in order of date, or, in other words, whether No. 18 of process was a proper account current between the parties similar to that between a banker and his customer; and, second, whether, on or after 1st August 1904, the payments made by Mr Cromb to Hay & Co. Ltd. were appropriated by them from time to time to particular transactions.

The general law regarding the appropriation of payments was laid down with great clearness by Lord Macnaghten in the case above quoted, p. 293. He says: "When a debtor is making a payment to his creditor he may appropriate the money as he pleases, and the creditor must apply it accordingly. If the debtor does not make any appropriation at the time when he makes the payment, the right of application devolves on the creditor. . . . The creditor has the right of election up to the very last moment, and he is not bound to declare his election in express terms. He may declare it by bringing an action, or any other way that makes his meaning and intention plain. Where the election is with the creditor, it is always his intention, express or implied or presumed, and not any rigid rule of law that governs the application of the money." The noble and learned Lord states this as the law of England; but in this matter the law of England and the law of Scotland are identical, and have been so since the leading case known as Clayton's case—better known in Scotland as Devaynes' case—was decided.

According to the above statement of the law, and it being admitted that no appropriation was made at the times of payment by the debtor, the question in the present case comes to be whether by rendering to the principal debtor the account No. 18 of process, the pursuers, Hay & Co. Ltd., appropriated the payments in question to the first items in their account against Mr Cromb? I am of opinion that they did not.

In considering this question it is obvious that a great deal must depend on the form of the account, because if the account is so stated as to entitle the debtor to assume that there has been appropriation by the creditor of certain payments to certain items of debt, the result will be that the creditor will be barred from going back upon that appropriation. Now, the account No. 18 of process is not stated as a proper account current at all. It first contains a record of all the goods sold or advances made to Mr Cromb by the pursuers, and next, below that, a record of all the payments made by Mr Cromb to the pursuers. Each of these columns is added up, the one deducted from the other, and a balance struck. Now, it appears to me that this is very far from being an account current. It was argued for the defender that an account stated in this way was in no view essentially different from an account stated with the debit and credit entries running side by side with each other, and that the fact of its not being so stated in the present case might simply be due to there not being room on the same sheet of paper so to state it. I do not think that this argument can be accepted seriously. If the debit and credit entries had been placed side by side that might have raised a presumption of more or less force to the effect that the entries were to be set against each other in order of date; in short, that the account was an account current. In the present case there are two summations, and the fact that the one is deducted from the other in order to shew the balance due certainly cannot turn what is merely a summation of items of debit separately from the items of credit into an account current. Assuming that the pursuers desired to render a statement to Alexander Cromb shewing the amount of his indebtedness to them, but without inducing him to believe that they were stating their account as an account current, it is difficult to see in what other form they could have stated their account. I therefore have no doubt whatever that the account No. 18 of process contains in itself nothing that the debtor was entitled to rely on as an appropriation of particular payments to particular items of debt, and nothing to shew that the creditor appropriated or intended to appropriate payments in that way.

The two leading cases regarding the appropriation of payments in order of date, to extinction of debit entries in order of date, namely, Devaynes' case, 1816, 1 Mer. 530, and the case of Bodenham v. Purchas, 2 B. and Al. 39, were both cases of bankers' accounts, and indeed bankers' accounts are the typical examples of accounts current. In Devaynes' case Sir William Grant, who was the Master of the Rolls, says that where an account current is kept between parties as a banking account "there is no room for any other appropriation than that which arises from the order in which the receipts and payments take place, and are carried into the account. Presumably it is the sum first paid in which is first drawn out. It is the first item on the debit side of the account that is discharged or reduced by the first payment on the credit side. The appropriation is made by the very act of setting the two items against each other."

This rule has been adopted both in England and in Scotland, but, as pointed out by the noble and learned Lords who decided the case of "The Mecca," the rule in Devaynes' case had come to be considered a rule probably of much more force and stringency than had ever been intended by the Master of the Rolls when he laid it down, although several cases prima facie falling within the doctrine in Devaynes' case have since the decision in that case been decided otherwise owing to their peculiar circumstances. The case of "The Mecca" was a case in which the account was stated very much in the same way as the one in the present case, and there it was held that there was no account current between the parties, and no other circumstances making it appear that the creditor intended to make any appropriation.

Among the Scotch cases which were cited at the debate the case of Lang, 1859, 22 D. 113, may be taken as typical of the ordinary current account. In that case it was an account between agent and client, but the agent had from time to time been accustomed to make advances to or on behalf of the client, and, on the other hand, the client from time to time made payments to the agent by cash or by bill or note, and the account current was kept in practically the same way as a banker's account, although the relation of the parties was that of agent and client. It was, accordingly, there held that the account was an account current to which the principle of Devaynes' case was applicable.

The case of Dougal v. Lornie, 1899, 1 F. 1187, was a typical case of a different kind of account. That was a case of a plumber's account divided into sections according to work done from time to time, and the amount sued for was the fifth of a series of accounts rendered in a similar way. For the work charged in these accounts various payments to account had been made, and it was there held that indefinite payments to account of a tradesman's account were not to be ascribed to the items or sectional amounts in order of date so as to preclude the debtor from subsequently challenging any item in the account. Lord Adam there pointed out that "the rule in Devaynes' case applies to cash accounts current, and has no application whatever to a tradesman's account. Payments to account of a tradesman's account go not against individual items in order of date, but against summation."

There may, however, be accounts current consisting of entries other than proper cash entries. The case of M'Kinlay v. Wilson, 1885, 13 R. 210, was a case of this kind. That was a case where two horse dealers had frequent dealings with each other, and in the account sued for by M'Kinlay, which was titled "Account current," horses and harness and cash were entered on the debtor side of the account, and horses, cash, and other things were entered on the other, the dates on both sides being consecutive. There prescription was pleaded, and it was against that plea that the pursuer pleaded that the account was an account current, and that prescription was excluded. Before deciding the question of prescription, a proof was led, and on that proof the Court was satisfied that it was the intention of parties that the transactions should be set against each other from time to time as they occurred, and that the account therefore was rightly stated as an account current, the one side of the account being set against the other, and that accordingly the plea of prescription should be repelled. (See opinion of Lord Adam, p. 217.)

The case of Batchelor, 1892, 19 R. 903, forms a useful contrast to M'Kinlay's case, for there it was held that a merchant's account with cross entries was not a proper account current. There was no proof in that case, and it was decided simply upon the account as it stood, Lord Trayner saying "This is simply a merchant's account."

From an examination of the various cases which were quoted at the debate it is evident that the important alteration in the statement of the law that was introduced by the decision in the case of "The Mecca" is this, that while in several of the former causes the law was stated to the effect that failing appropriation by the debtor or the creditor the law appropriated payments to items of debit in order of date, in the case of "The Mecca" the law was stated to the effect that failing appropriation of the money by the debtor, the appropriation of the money is governed by the intention of the creditor expressed, implied, or presumed, and that such intention may be presumed from the form and statement of the account rendered by the creditor to the debtor. Applying this law to the present case, my opinion is that it cannot be presumed from the account No. 18 of process that the creditor intended to appropriate payments to account made after 1st August 1904 to the items of debt in order of date, and that by making the claim and raising this action for £67, 4s. 6d. they have shewn that they do not so appropriate them.

But the pursuers maintain further that if any presumption arises from the statement of the account, that is displaced by the fact that at the times of the payments which the defender seeks to impute in order of date to the debt incurred by Cromb before 1st August 1904 they were appropriated by the parties to particular items; and to begin with, that the very first payment after 1st August, namely, £4 on 16th August, was paid for hay bought at Southtown sale, and in response to a letter dated 11th August 1904. This is established by the proof. The course of dealing with the new firm accordingly commences with a payment appropriated to a specific item. Again, it is proved that certain cows were paid for by instalments of £1 per week, and then again it appears that Hay & Co. Ltd. were frequently finding fault with Mr Cromb for not paying for particular purchases which he made from them, and for not sending in stock to be sold by them so as to pay for such purchases. In short, without going into further details, I am of opinion that it appears from the whole of the proof that when those who had the management of Hay & Co. Ltd.—who, of course, had a responsibility to the Company—commenced dealing with Mr Cromb on and after the incorporation of the Company, they dealt with each transaction between them and Cromb separately as it arose, and demanded and received payments to account of the particular transactions. This course of dealing is quite inconsistent with treating these transactions as parts and portions of an account current. But further, it proves the appropriation of particular payments to particular transactions, and therefore excludes the idea that the payments on 16th August and onwards were payments which the defender is entitled to have imputed towards the debt which had been incurred previous to that date.

On both the grounds above dealt with, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff should be affirmed, and the case remitted back in order that the question of interest may be dealt with.—17*th December* 1907.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Aberdeen, Kincardine and Banff at Aberdeen.

This was an action brought by Mrs Jeannie Peters or Burgoyne, 13 Skene Street, Aberdeen, widow of the deceased John Darling Burgoyne, as an individual, and also as tutor to her pupil son, against Andrew Walker, managing owner of the steam trawler "Star of Hope," Aberdeen, to recover damages in respect of the death of the said John Darling Burgoyne.

Proof was allowed and led.

The following findings in fact were made by the Sheriff-Substitute:

(1) That on 5th December 1905, about 1.30 a.m., the steam trawler "Star of Hope," belonging to the defender, stranded on the coast near Collieston, owing to the recklessness and negligence of the skipper of the vessel; (2) that, as a consequence, the pursuer's husband, John Darling Burgoyne, a servant of the Fishery Board of Scotland, perished from exposure about six hours later; and (3) that, at and before the time of stranding, the skipper and the said John Darling Burgoyne were engaged in trawling for fish, under an arrangement whereby the skipper remained the servant of the defender, and the said John Darling Burgoyne remained the servant of the Fishery Board of Scotland.

With respect to the arrangement between the defender and the Fishery Board, the pursuer made the following averments which were established at the proof:

Cond. 2. In pursuance of their scientific investigations, the officials of the Fishery Board for Scotland in charge of the Board's station at Nigg from time to time arrange with the owners of trawl-boats fishing from the port of Aberdeen to carry on board their boats an employee of the Fishery Board, who is allowed to collect from the catches, and retain for the use of the Board's officials, specimens of different kinds of fish. In return for this service, trawl-boats carrying a Fishery Board employee are allowed to fish within restricted waters, and are allowed to retain the catches got therein without rendering themselves liable to a charge of illegal trawling. . . . . Neither the Fishery Board nor its representatives on board such trawl-boats, nor anyone in its employment, has, as a consequence of the arrangement referred to, any concern with the navigation or management of any trawl-boats so engaged.

The nature of the control exercised by Burgoyne over the trawler sufficiently appears from the Sheriff-Substitute's Note.

On 11th January 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute (Henderson Begg) decerned against the defender for payment of (1) £300 to the pursuer as an individual, and (2) £150 to the pursuer as tutor of her pupil son.

He added the following note:—

[After considering the question of fault] The arrangement between the Fishery Board and the defender was a very peculiar one. I think that it is accurately set forth in Articles 2 and 4 of the pursuer's Condescendence, with this exception, that the vessel was not flying the flag of the Fishery Board. The chief question in the present case is whether that arrangement involved the doctrine of collaborateur as between Burgoyne and the skipper; and the answer to the question admittedly depends on whether the two men are to be held to have been in the service of a common master at the time of the accident (Johnson v. Lindsay & Co., L.R. [1891], A.C. 371). The defender maintains that while Burgoyne continued throughout to be in the service of the Fishery Board the skipper had become pro hac vice the servant of the Board; the vessel, with skipper and crew, having passed from the possession and control of the defender into the possession and control of the Board. Of course, from the time of leaving port, on the voyage in question, the vessel was outwith the personal possession and control of the defender, just as she would have been in any ordinary trawling cruise in the North Sea. But what the defender means is that, through Burgoyne being on board the vessel, the Fishery Board possessed the vessel, and controlled the master and crew. When one looks into the matter, however, the control exercised by Burgoyne turns out to have been of a very limited character. He was entitled to indicate the places in Aberdeen Bay where the trawling operations were to be conducted, and to prescribe the length of the drags, so as to get live fish. But I do not see that he had any further control of the skipper and crew; and, of course, he had no right to interfere with the navigation of the vessel. The skipper was on board, not merely to navigate the vessel, but also to look after the defender's interest in the fish caught, the defender's share of the fish being generally about ninety per cent. of the catch. Of course, the skipper and crew were engaged and paid by the defender, and Burgoyne could not have dismissed any of them. In these circumstances I do not think that any of the authorities to which I was referred in the course of the extremely able argument to which I had the pleasure of listening, would justify me in holding that the skipper was the servant of the Fishery Board pro hac vice. Adapting the words of Lord Watson, in the case above mentioned, to the present case, I hold that the circumstances are not such as to shew conclusively that the skipper submitted himself to the control of the Fishery Board, and either expressly or impliedly consented to accept the Board as his master for the purpose of the common employment—trawling for fish.

The other authorities to which I refer are Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., 1877, L.R. 2 C.P. Div. 205; Donovan v. Laing Construction Syndicate [1893], 1 Q.B. 629; Cairns v. Clyde Navigation Trs., 1898, 25 R. 1021; and Connelly v. Clyde Navigation Trs., 1902, 5 F. 8. . . .

The Defender appealed and argued: (1) On the evidence the master was not in fault. (2) In any event he was not the servant of the defender at the time. It was settled law that a person who was the general servant of A might become pro hac vice the servant of B (Johnson v. Lindsay & Co. [1891], A.C. 371, per Lords Watson and Herschell; Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co., 1877, L.R. 2 C.P.D. 205; Donovan v. Laing, Wharton & Down Construction Syndicate, Ltd. [1893], 1 Q.B. 629; Conelly v. Clyde Navgation Trs., 1902, 5 F. 8; M'Fall v. Adams & Co., 1907, S.C. 367; cf. Cairns v. Clyde Navigation Trs., 1898, 25 R. 1021). In each case it was for the Court to determine whether the servant had so submitted himself to the control of B as to become his servant. The important considerations were what was the nature of the work, and by whom was it being carried out. Here the work of the Fishery Board, not of the trawl owner, was being carried out by the Fishery Board with hired plant. The Fishery Board official had right to control the operations by pointing out the place where fishing should be carried on. The master was therefore the servant of the Fishery Board at the time of the accident. This view was supported by the fact that under the bye-laws framed by the Fishery Board in pursuance of the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. cap. 23), sect. 6 (1) and (2), fishing could be carried on only by persons employed by the Board, or by persons having permission in writing. There was no written permit in the present case, and unless the trawler was in the employment of the Fishery Board, the fishing was illegal.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called on.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this case we have had a very able argument from Mr Murray. Having carefully considered the case and the interlocutor and note of the Sheriff-Substitute, I have come entirely to concur in everything that the Sheriff-Substitute has said. In this particular case the vessel undertook to fish in certain waters in which the Fishery Board were entitled to prevent any one from fishing, although they were entitled to sanction fishing in these waters, on certain conditions, for the purposes of scientific research. These conditions were that the trawl owners were to take as their share the entire catch except a certain quantity of plaice, which were required for scientific purposes; and, in order that the fishing might be conducted in such a manner as the Fishery Board considered suitable, an official of the Board was to be on the vessel to see that the fishing took place at such spots as were proper for the scientific ends in view. The Fishery Board Officer had no other function whatever. He could not interfere with the navigation in any way, and if the master of the trawler thought that any particular spot pointed out for trawling by the Fishery Board officer was not safe for navigation, the master could refuse, and, in the interest of his owners, was bound to refuse, to take the vessel to the spot pointed out by the Fishery Board officer. Once the Fishery Board officer had pointed out where he wished the vessel to go, the manœuvres for taking her there were entirely in the hands of the master and crew. The master in doing his work was no doubt doing it in part to fulfil the objects of the Fishery Board, but he was also doing it for the profit of his owner, who would appropriate the balance of the catch. It was plainly a speculation for profit on the part of this trawl owner—a speculation for profit in exactly the same sense as in any ordinary case of trawling. He might bring up a large catch or a small catch or nothing at all. That is just what would happen in any ordinary trawling adventure. To say in these circumstances that the vessel had been so handed over to the Fishery Board, that the Board became the employers of the master and crew, appears to me to be out of the question. I am very well satisfied with the excellent note of the Sheriff-Substitute, and I move your Lordships to adhere.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion. There are two questions in the case: (1) Whether the stranding was due to the negligence of the skipper of the trawler? and (2) Whether the skipper was, for the purpose of the adventure in question, truly the servant of the Fishery Board? On the first question I entirely agree with the Sheriff-Substitute. [His Lordship then discussed the evidence relating to the question of negligence.] With regard to the second question I have really very little to add to what your Lordship has said. No doubt Mr Burgoyne as representing the Fishery Board had right to indicate in what part of Aberdeen Bay he desired trawling operations to be carried on. But the conduct of these operations and the navigation of the vessel were entirely under the control of the skipper, as the servant of the owner, and in the owner's interest. I am therefore of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute was right.

Lord Ardwall.—I also agree. The main contention put forward by Mr Murray was that the defender was not liable, because at the time of the wreck the master of the trawler "Star of Hope" was not his servant, but the servant of the Fishery Board, and that accordingly (1) the defender is not answerable for him; and (2) the deceased John D. Burgoyne, having lost his life through the fault of a fellow-servant, the pursuer's claim in respect of his death is excluded. Now I think that the facts of this case do not bring it up to any of the cases in which it was held that a servant hired out to another person was so entirely under the control of that other person that the person whose general servant the servant so hired out was, was not liable for any accident which might occur through the negligence of the servant so hired out. In such cases two test questions arise: (1) For whom was the work being done at the time when the accident happened? and (2) What was the nature of the control retained over the hired-out servant by the person whose servant he generally was?

Now in regard to the work, the work in the present case was the ordinary work of a trawler, neither more nor less. Neither the defender nor anyone else got pecuniary remuneration from the Fishery Board. The owner, master and crew of the trawler were paid just like those of any other trawler out of the proceeds of the adventure. The only difference was that on this particular fishing voyage the vessel had on board an official of the Fishery Board with tubs into which he put his live fish, and that the trawl owner, instead of keeping the whole catch, was bound to hand over to the Fishery Board a certain quantity of fish of a certain kind, and in return for this he received the benefit of being allowed to fish in waters where it was in the ordinary case illegal to fish, and where the chances of success would certainly be much increased. That was quite an intelligible arrangement, but it did not convert the trawler and its crew into a trawler and crew of the Fishery Board engaged solely or principally in their work. The leading object was trawling on behalf of the owner and others interested, and it was a mere incident of the particular voyage that the Fishery Board had a right to get a small portion of the fish.

If we compare the present case with the case of Rourke v. The White Moss Colliery Company, 1877, L.R. 2 C.P.D. 205, it is easy to see the broad distinction between the two cases. In Rourke the injured man was in the service of a pit sinker. While the pit sinking was going on no other work in the colliery was going on. The only work which was being carried on at the time and place when the accident happened was pit sinking and not working coal. The pit sinker was a contractor entirely independent of the colliery owners, and although they provided the plant and an engine and engineer, they gave over the whole control thereof to the pit-sinker, or in other words lent both engine and engineer to the pitsinker. It was accordingly held that the colliery owners were not liable for the injuries caused to the plaintiff by the fault of the engineer.

(2) With regard to the question as to whether at the time of the wreck the vessel was under the control of the Fishery Board or their servant the deceased John Burgoyne, the evidence is, I think, clear to the effect that the control exercised by the deceased or the Fishery Board was of a very limited description. It is proved that the deceased was entitled to direct and did direct the master as to the parts of Aberdeen Bay he should trawl over, but he had truly no control, in the real sense of that term, over the master. For instance, if the master had thought that from any cause there was risk to the vessel in going where the deceased wished him to go, he had an absolute right to refuse to go, and the whole navigation and control of the ship as to steering, speed, engines, and everything else was in the master's hands as representing the defender and responsible to him. I am therefore unable to hold that it can be said in this case, as was said in others, that the defender had parted with the control of the vessel and its master and crew to the Fishery Board or its official.

[His Lordship then dealt with the question of fault, coming to the same conclusion as the Sheriff.]—11*th December* 1907.

In this action Mrs Brownlee, the widow and executrix of Robert Brownlee, sen., sued Robert Brownlee, jun., for the sum of £2000 which she alleged the defender was due to the deceased's estate. Her material averments were to the effect that the defender had guaranteed payment of the said sum for his sister, Catherine Brownlee, the said Catherine Brownlee being under obligation to provide the said sum as part of a family transaction by which the claims for legitim of another daughter of the deceased were discharged. The sum of £2000 had been paid, but the pursuer alleged that the payment had been made, not out of the funds of the said Catherine Brownlee, but out of funds properly belonging to the deceased. The pursuer accordingly pled that no payment had been made by Catherine Brownlee, and that the defender was liable for payment of the sum sued for under his guarantee.

BROWNLEE v BROWNLEE.

The facts of the case are fully set forth in the judgment of the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen), infra. After proof, the Lord Ordinary decerned against the defender for the sum sued for, less £50 which he held had been provided by Miss Brownlee towards implement of the guarantee.

The Lord Ordinary's opinion was in these terms :—

Lord Salvesen.—The late Robert Brownlee, senr., was thrice married. By his first marriage he had one daughter, now Mrs Barr. By his second marriage he had two children, the defender and Catherine Brownlee. During the lifetime of his second wife he contracted an intimacy with Mrs Colquhoun, the pursuer in this action, who was then a widow. After the death of his second wife he continued this intimacy with Mrs Colquhoun until 1901, when he married her. The defender and his sister were much opposed to this marriage, and it was kept a secret from them, at all events from Catherine Brownlee. Although the deceased continued on affectionate relations with his wife and regularly visited her, they did not live together, but I see no reason to doubt the pursuer's statement that he would have married her much earlier but for his fear of the defender and Miss Brownlee.

The deceased was in business for many years as a timber merchant, and was so successful, that at one time he seems to have been possessed of a fortune of over £100,000. During his lifetime he distributed his means amongst his near relatives, so that at the time of his death he was absolutely without means ; and his funeral expenses have not yet been paid by any of those who benefited by his bounty. The pursuer is his executrix and universal legatory under a holograph settlement which he executed about a year before his death.

In 1891 the deceased made over to the defender a sum of £30,000, which is admitted by him to have been in large measure a gift. There is contemporaneous evidence that the deceased intended only to lend this sum to his son ; but he did not obtain any acknowledgment of the terms upon which the money was given, and the defender refused to give any such acknowledgment, maintaining that the money had been gifted to him. Some years later Catherine Brownlee received a sum of £17,000, in respect of which she granted a full discharge of her rights of legitim. She said in evidence that she told her father at the time that, notwithstanding this discharge, she would expect him to make her further payments ; and she admits having received at least £2100 worth of shares subsequently. The pursuer also from time to time obtained sums of money from the deceased ; but there is no evidence which enables me to fix the amount. The defender and his sister seem to have entertained feelings of intense animosity towards Mrs Colquhoun, so much so that Miss Brownlee admitted in the witness-box that Mrs Colquhoun was to her like a red rag to a bull, and that she could not control either her language or her actings in her presence.

In the beginning of 1904 Mrs Barr, having heard of her father's extensive alienations of his estate, thought that it was time that she too was putting in a claim for a share. She had reason to believe, from what her father had told her, that one-third of the sum of £30,000 transferred to the defender's account had been intended as a provision for her. Her father seems to have recognised the justice of her claim, and negotiations were opened between the agents of the parties, which resulted in the deceased undertaking to pay Mrs Barr a sum of £5000. A hitch occurred in the settlement, due to the fact that the deceased's only available means at that time seem to have consisted of a sum of £3000 due to him by the limited company which had taken over his business and mills. He accordingly endeavoured to withdraw from his obligation. The defender was aware that Mrs Barr claimed that a share of the money which had been transferred by his father to him had been so transferred for her behoof, and he was accordingly interested in having a settlement effected. Some negotiations followed, and finally a meeting took place on the 23rd of February 1904, at which Mrs Barr agreed, on payment to her of £5000, to discharge her right of legitim and all other claims which might be competent to her against the deceased, the defender, Miss Catherine Brownlee and Mrs Colquhoun, or any of them. In order to get this settlement carried through, the defender at the same time wrote and delivered the letter of guarantee which is printed on page 7 of the record. He says that before doing so he had the authority of his sister Catherine to pay over a sum of £1718, which was standing at her credit in his books, and that he took the risk of inducing her to contribute also the balance. At the time that this arrangement was made the defender's position was that he declined to contribute any funds towards a settlement with Mrs Barr out of his own pocket, although he strongly resisted a proposed arrangement between Mrs Barr and the deceased that she should accept £3000 from him, and have her claim against the defender reserved.

Mrs Barr and her agent naturally expected that the settlement would be carried out at once, but as there was some delay in doing so, Mrs Barr served an action on the deceased for payment of the £5000. Further procedure, however, was obviated by the deceased paying, on 14th March, the sum at his credit in the books of Brownlee & Co. Ltd., amounting, with interest, to £3018, 14s. 10d. About the same date the defender signed a cheque for £1718, 8s., as his sister's contribution to a settlement, but refused to make any further payment. The balance of £262 was thereupon advanced by the pursuer in order that the settlement might be carried through, and this was accordingly done. In return for the £5000 Mrs Barr delivered a discharge in terms of the letter of 23rd February 1904.

The sum of £1718, 8s. paid by the defender's cheque is said to have consisted of a sum of £1653, 8s. 6d., and interest from 24th December 1903, which at that date stood at the credit of the deceased in the books of the defender, and bore to have been paid in cash. In the same books the exact amount is credited to Miss Brownlee on the same date, and it is to this transaction that the bulk of the evidence relates.

The pursuer's case is a perfectly simple one. She sues upon the guarantee for £2000, which she found in the repositories of the deceased. She maintains that, according to its true construction, the defender guaranteed the payment by his sister Catherine out of her own funds of the sum of £2000 towards payment of the £5000 which the deceased had agreed to pay Mrs Barr, and she says that she has now discovered that no part of that sum has been contributed by Miss Brownlee. The deceased received no obligation from Miss Brownlee to pay any sum, and accordingly the pursuer now seeks to enforce the guarantee against the defender to its full amount.

On record the defender disputes his liability to make payment of any sum, his defence being that his father wrote to him to make up the balance of £262, 17s. 3d., and that, as the result of an interview between the parties, he waived all claim under the guarantee. It is not, however, now disputed that the defender cannot rely upon this alleged verbal waiver as a discharge of his obligation, and that in any event he is liable for a sum of £281, 12s., being the difference between the £2000 guaranteed and the £1718, 8s. On the other hand, the pursuer has not endeavoured to prove that the sum of £50, which was included in that remittance, was not paid out of the proper funds of Miss Brownlee, and accordingly the sole controversy between the parties now relates to the sum of £1653 already referred to. The defender's case on record is that this sum was gifted by his father to Miss Catherine Brownlee on 24th December 1903, and that accordingly, when he remitted it on 16th March thereafter, he to that extent implemented his guarantee.

On the motion of both parties, a proof was allowed habili modo, and parole evidence bearing on the transaction of 24th December was led without objection. The defender's counsel, however, now pleads that the documentary evidence is all that can competently be looked at, and that that evidence instructs that there was in effect an assignment by the deceased to his daughter of this sum of £1653; that either this assignment was by way of gift or was made in trust for behoof of the grantee; that in the latter case the trust can only be established by the writ or oath of the trustee; and that the pursuer's position in this process cannot be any better than if she had brought her action against Catherine Brownlee for payment of the £1653. He protested accordingly against the view that it lay upon the defender to instruct that a donation of £1653 was made to Miss Brownlee on the occasion in question. This ingenious argument, which I hope I have correctly apprehended, was supported by a reference to the case of Dunn, 1898, 25 R. 461.

In order to deal with this argument it is necessary to consider what are the documents founded on. They consist, in the first place, of an account current, No. 17 of process, between the deceased and the defender. It contains an entry opposite the date 24th December "to cash £1653, 8s. 6d," which squares the account, and contains a docquet signed by the deceased in these terms, "Settled this date." There is also a simple receipt, No. 18 of process, of the same date, for the same sum. These are the only documents under the hand of the deceased, and so far as they go they instruct that the account was settled by a payment in cash. It is admitted, however, that no cash passed. The defender, however, founds upon two other documents, the first a simple receipt, bearing date 24th December 1903, in favour of Miss Brownlee, for the sum of £1653, 8s. 6d., signed by himself, and a corresponding entry to her credit in his books. These four documents, taken together, he contends, are equivalent in law to a simple assignment under the hand of the deceased in favour of Miss Catherine Brownlee. If, accordingly, an action had been brought against Miss Brownlee, she would have been entitled to have pleaded the Act of 1696, and as no document has been produced qualifying the absolute character of the assignment, the pursuer's case must necessarily have failed, unless she had chosen to refer it to the oath of the trustee.

In my opinion, this argument fails on two grounds. In the first place, I do not think that the documents are to be treated as equivalent to a formal assignation by the deceased in favour of Miss Brownlee. If such a document had been subscribed, there would have been prima facie evidence of the authority to transfer. Here the documents unconnected by parole evidence instruct no authority. The case of Dunn v. Pratt is differentiated because the pursuer himself supplied the link that would otherwise have been required by averring that the title to the property had, by his authority, been taken in the name of the defender. In the second place, the Trust Act can, I think, only be pleaded by the alleged trustee, and not by a third party. The defender suggests that an action for the £1653, 8s. 6d. might properly have been directed against Miss Brownlee. I cannot conceive what claim the pursuer could have had against her. On the assumption that the £1653 belonged to the deceased, it has, so far as Miss Brownlee is concerned, been paid. The action against the defender is based on his own letter of guarantee that £2000 of her money should be made available for payment of the money due to Mrs Barr.

The question, however, remains whether the £1653 was, in March 1904, the property of Miss Brownlee or of the deceased. If it was Miss Brownlee's, it can only have become so by its having been gifted to her by the deceased on the 24th of December. The onus of proving donation is, of course, upon the defender; but I am far from saying that the evidence of the donee and of the defender, who is mainly interested in supporting the theory of donation, might not be sufficient, corroborated as it is by the receipt under the deceased's own hand, if that evidence had satisfied me that the deceased intended to make such a donation, and fully understood that he had done so. The value of the receipt as an adminicle of evidence is, however, completely destroyed by the letter No. 85 of process and the subsequent letter, the draft of which is No. 94 of process. The first of these letters is dated 19th January 1904, less than a month after the alleged gift, and followed upon an examination of the deceased's account by him in the books kept at the office of the Limited Company. It is in these terms: "Yesterday I understood you to say that my account with Mr Robert was squared, while according to your own statement of 24th December last there was at that date a balance of £1653, 8s. 6d. in my favour. Will you kindly explain by return what became of this balance, and oblige. Yours truly, Robert Brownlee." The reply to this letter, dated 20th January (No. 94), was admittedly instructed or dictated by the defender, and is a merely formal letter that the statement had been settled "as per enclosed copy receipt." To this a reply was sent asking particulars of the alleged settlement in a perfectly civil way. The defender does not think he received a letter in these terms; but I am satisfied from the evidence of Sinclair that he did, and that it made him very angry. The letter itself was destroyed and was never answered. These two letters are, to my mind, most instructive. They shew that the deceased Robert Brownlee did not know when he wrote them that he had made a gift of the money to his daughter, and what is even more important, the defender did not venture to suggest that at the time, although in evidence he puts forward a more or less circumstantial story. If he believed that his father's memory was failing him, nothing would have been easier than for him to have reminded his father of what had taken place, and of the £1653 having been transferred to his sister's name with his authority The letter of 20th January is, to my mind, most disingenuous, because it relies on a receipt for payment of a sum in cash which the defender well knew had never been made.

Brownlee v. Brownlee.

It does not avail the defender to say, as he now does, that the two letters I have referred to were written by young Colquhoun, and that his father could not have known the contents of what he was subscribing. If that were so, it would equally apply to the receipt and docquet on the account, and would destroy their value as adminicles of evidence in support of the alleged donation. But further, I am of opinion that if there was undue influence used, it was by the defender and his sister, and not by the Colquhouns; and an incident which arose later, and which depended mainly on the evidence led for the defence, illustrates this.

The defender says he received a third letter, now destroyed, from his father asking him for payment of the balance of £262, being the amount which had been supplied by Mrs Colquhoun in order to make up the £5000. The defender was admittedly due this, and even a larger sum under the guarantee; but the receipt of the letter seems to have put him into a violent temper. He at once went off to his father, and, according to Miss Brownlee, there were high words, I should imagine entirely on the defender's side, which resulted in the defender's father, an old man of 88 or 89, apologising for having made such a demand. This matter is founded upon by the defender in order to establish a verbal waiver by his father of what is now admitted to be a good claim of debt. It could obviously not be used for such a purpose with any effect, seeing that the obligation said to be verbally waived rests upon a writing preserved by the obligee; but it throws a strong light on the defender's methods of dealing with his father, and of the dominant influence which he possessed over him.

I am not overlooking the fact that at the same time as the deceased is alleged to have made the gift of money to his daughter he also executed gratuitous transfers in her favour of certain shares, and that these have not been challenged. There is no evidence, however, in this process, such as we have in the two letters before referred to, that the deceased did not know what he was doing; and the two transactions, therefore, stand upon an entirely different footing.

With regard to the parole evidence of gift, it consists almost entirely of the evidence of the defender, but slightly corroborated by his sister, for at the interview, when the gift is said to have been made, nothing seems to have been said by the deceased; but he simply signed the documents, which were already made out for his signature, without observation. The conclusion which I draw from the evidence is that the deceased knew that the money was being transferred into his daughter's name for his behoof, but that he never intended to make her a present of it; and what Miss Brownlee is reported to have said to Mrs Barr is strong confirmation of this theory. It may have been in the defender's mind that he would be able to appropriate this sum standing in his sister's name in his books towards implement of the guarantee, and that he had previously obtained her consent to his doing so; but if, as I hold, it was really the deceased's money, this will not avail the defender. Besides, I do not believe that Miss Brownlee was the kind of person who would readily have consented to give up to the Barrs so large a sum as £1653 if she really thought it belonged to herself. On the other hand, the defender was most anxious to have a settlement with the Barrs carried through, so that he might be protected against claims at their instance with regard to the £30,000—a matter in which Miss Brownlee was not concerned.

As regards the interval of time which elapsed without any challenge by the deceased, I attach very little importance to it. At his age and in the state of health in which he was, it was very unlikely that he should wish to expose himself to further altercations with his son.

On the whole matter, the conclusion which I reach is, that the defender has failed to prove the alleged donation of £1653, 8s. 6d., and that decree falls to be pronounced against him for the sum sued for, less £50 provided by Miss Brownlee towards implement of the guarantee.

The Defender reclaimed and argued: The effect of the documentary evidence was to shew a complete transference of the sum of £1653 from the deceased to Miss Brownlee: they shewed an absolute assignation to Miss Brownlee which could only be reduced on the ground of fraud, and there was no averment of fraud. It was only when the transference was incomplete that the onus of proving donation emerged (M'Farlane's Trs. v. Miller, 1898, 25 R. 1201). In any case the documentary evidence here shewed a title in Miss Brownlee sufficient to displace the presumption against donation, and the onus lay upon the respondents to disprove donation. This onus had not been discharged. The cases cited by the respondents dealing with the effect of possession of an endorsed deposit receipt had no application. The Court did not allow to the endorsation of deposit receipts the effect of transferring the property of the sums of money they represent, though such was the effect of the endorsation of documents of title such as bills of exchange. This was owing to exceptional circumstances arising out of the widespread custom in Scotland of banking by deposit receipt. Assuming that the onus of proving donation lay upon the reclaimers, this onus had been discharged.

Argued for the Respondent: The documentary evidence shewed no absolute transfer. Where property was transferred by the passing of document only and not by physical transference there was always room for enquiry (Sharp v. Paton, 1883, 10 R. 1000). No presumption of donation was to be drawn from mere possession of documents such as deposit receipts (Jamieson v. M'Leod, 1880, 7 R. 1131; Crosbie's Trs. v. Wright, 1880, 7 R. 823; Dawson v. M'Kenzie, 1891, 19 R. 261, p. Lord M'Laren at p. 277). To complete the evidence of transference of the property in the £1650 to Miss Brownlee, it was necessary to prove that Mr Brownlee senior had authorised this payment and that he knew that it had been made. This had not been established.

The Court adhered.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the facts out of which this case arose are so clearly and fully stated by the Lord Ordinary that it would be useless for me to repeat them. The story of the gradual absorption of old Mr Brownlee's fortune by his nearest relatives is pathetic enough, and were it adequately described would seem more like the closing scenes of the life of Père Goriot, than the history of a middle-class family in Glasgow. Sympathy, however, is an ill basis for a judgment. And even were it not so I do not think there is room for any in this case. As was naïvely said in the proof by the defender, "The old man had been ground between two millstones," and what your Lordships have to decide is to which of the two millstones this, the very last piece of grist, shall stick.

The case of the pursuer is simple enough, being based on an undisputed guarantee by the defender; and the defence is simply that the sum guaranteed, with the exception of a small sum, has been already paid by Miss Brownlee. All turns on whether the sum of £1653 really belonged to old Mr Brownlee or to Miss Brownlee. That sum of £1653 admittedly first appears as a sum of money due by the defender to his father, old Mr Brownlee. Appearing in the defender's books as a credit entry in an account between the deceased and him, it is squared by a debit entry to cash of the same amount. Admittedly no cash passed. But at the same time a receipt was granted by old Mr Brownlee, and in the defender's books in an account with his sister a credit entry of the same amount is made to her; and eventually it is this sum which is paid away for the payment secured by the guarantee. In these circumstances the Lord Ordinary, treating the case as one of donation, has held that the onus on Miss Brownlee to prove donation has not been discharged; and that accordingly the £1653 being the property of old Mr Brownlee, no payment was made by Miss Brownlee of that sum, and the obligation in the guarantee becomes prestible.

Before your Lordships, however, the Dean of Faculty strenuously urged that there was here no necessity to prove donation because the transaction between old Mr Brownlee and Miss Brownlee was a completed one; and that the onus of proving donation only arose when there was no completed transference, but where the titulus transferendi was a document of ambiguous import, such as, for instance, an endorsed deposit-receipt; indeed, he went so far as to urge that the law on deposit-receipts formed a kind of special chapter, which could not be applied to other subjects. In my opinion, this position is unsound. I do not think there is any difference in principle between the cases of donation where the subject of the donation is money exigible as against the bank with which it is deposited in virtue of a deposit-receipt, and cases where the subject is something else. The only peculiarities of deposit-receipts consist in the consideration of how far endorsation of the deposit-receipt is equivalent to delivery of the money alleged to be donated.

The rule seems to me this. When a person is asked to give up something, be it land, corporeal moveables, or money, which he has reduced into possession, he can assume the defensive, and put the claimant to shew his title. But if in answer to the claimant he is willing or forced to admit that the something only came into his possession by donation from a person whom the claimant, whether by special or universal title, represents, then the onus is put upon him to prove the animus donandi, as well as the delivery of the thing. No doubt the fact of delivery may be evidence of the animus donandi:—its strength as evidence will vary with the circumstances. But none the less the animus donandi is a separate question, and must be proved as well as the delivery. I think this proposition is amply borne out by many cases. In particular, I would refer to the remarks of Lord Young, in Milne v. Grant's Exrs., 1884, 11 R. 889, at p. 890. His Lordship there expresses himself thus: "Gift inter vivos—I quite agree that a gift of any amount of money or of any article of property may be completely made and well established by parole evidence. But it must be made. The expression of an intention to give anything—a piece of plate, or a horse—is nothing of itself; it will impose no legal obligation. But if the donation is once made, if the donee gets the money, if the donor hands the money or gift out of his own possession into that of the donee, then that he has so handed it over with the intention of bestowing it in gift is always capable of being proved by parole. But it must be handed over. The party giving must dispossess himself, put it entirely beyond his own control and his own use—and put it in possession of the party to whom he gives it. There has been a marvellous amount of difficulty manifested in the opinion of some of the decisions upon this, to me, very obvious matter. I ventured to suggest in the course of the argument that the typical case of a gift was of bread or meat or money given to a beggar—the amount is of no consequence to the legal principle. Upon considering the evidence whether it was a donation or not the beggar would easily be able to prove that a shilling was given to him; another kind of beggar would be able to prove a gift of £5. He would probably have difficulty in proving by parole alone a gift of a piece of plate, because people would not believe him that a piece of gold plate had been given to him. But the gift of a piece of gold plate is quite capable of being proved by parole. Indeed, many people who have received presents of gold plate would have no other way of proving the gift. They do not take a written deed from the donor in order that they may keep the gift."

Now in all these instances, Lord Young, assuming that delivery is perfected, still seeks for the proving of the gift, and says it may be proved by parole. But if the other argument was correct, the gift would be perfected by delivery, and it would be for the opposing party to cut it down. And accordingly we find many cases in which that enquiry is prosecuted, even when the delivery was quite complete, and with varying results according as the animus donandi was held proved or not. In the negative may be taken the case of Sharp v. Paton, 1883, 10 R. p. 1000. I refer in that case to what was said by my brother Lord M'Laren, who was the Lord Ordinary in the case, and also by Lord President Inglis. The Lord Ordinary says (p. 1004): "The property of the deposited money may be separated from the title in two ways, by the owner taking a receipt for the deposit in the name of another person, or where the receipt is in the owner's name, by the owner giving the receipt endorsed in blank to such other person, and thereby enabling him to uplift the money or get it transferred to an account in his own name. In the former case there is an actual transfer of the money into the possession of the person named in the receipt." In Sharp's case there had been actual transference of the money. His Lordship goes on:—"It is money at his credit in the books of the bank in a deposit account standing in his name, and the possession of the bank is his possession. In such a case evidence of intention is all that is necessary to complete the proof of donation, because the form of a transfer has been accomplished by the act of the depositor, and the agreement of the bank to accept payment into an account opened in the name of the donee." And in the same way the Lord President says (p. 1006): "The question is whether we here have such a case"—that is, where strong and unimpeachable evidence has been brought forward—"and in reference to that the Lord Ordinary makes an important distinction between the two ways in which a deposit-receipt may be transferred; in the one case by the owner taking a receipt for the deposit in the name of another person, and certainly that would be a fact going a long way to overcome the presumption against donation, and would leave nothing to be proved but the intention to make the gift." I need scarcely point out that both of these learned Lords do not think that mere transference is enough.

The Lord President.

In the affirmative there is the case of Thomson's Exr. v. Thomson, 1882, 9 R. 911, where again the transference was complete, and where, notwithstanding, it was found necessary to go into the question of whether the intention had been made out. To the same effect is the dictum of Lord President Robertson in the case of Dawson v. Mackenzie, 1891, 19 R. 261 at p. 272; where he says this: "In all previous cases of this kind there has been at least some act of the deceased donor which is admitted or proved by real evidence to have taken place, and which goes so far towards donation. The money is invested in name of the donee, or the deposit-receipt is endorsed in his favour under the hand of the donor," pointing out clearly again that even transference at the instance of the donor himself is not sufficient without other proof. The defenders relied on the dictum of Lord Adam in Macfarlane's Trs. v. Miller, 1898, 25 R. 1201. That was a case where there was a question both upon donation inter vivos and donation mortis causa. The donation inter vivos had been perfected by the endorsation of a deposit-receipt which was followed up by transference of the money to the account of the donee; and the dictum of Lord Adam on which the defenders relied on was this. His Lordship, speaking of these deposit-receipts, says, p. 1208: "This case differs from the preceding in respect that it is not a donatio mortis causa, but a present donation inter vivos. Mrs Miller's title to these deposit-receipts appears to me to be complete." Upon that dictum of Lord Adam the defenders argued that it was complete simply because transference was completely made. But if the case is more narrowly looked at, I think it will be found that his Lordship does not mean that, but means that it is complete, taking the evidence as it stands as a whole. On looking back to the Lord Ordinary's judgment, which was being reviewed, the Lord Ordinary treats the matter just in the way in which I have urged that it should be treated, and says this, p. 1203: "In the case of the defender Mrs Miller, the alleged donations were not mortis causa, but inter vivos—they consisted of deposit-receipts of the National Bank which were handed to Mrs Miller, and re-deposited in her own name"—that is to say, the money was re-deposited in her own name—"accordingly the transfer of title was completed absolutely in the lifetime of Mrs Macfarlane. As to the animus donandi I see no reason to doubt the evidence of Mrs Miller herself, though I did not hear her examined." I think when Lord Adam says that it is made out it is quite evident he means that it is made out upon the evidence as a whole, and that in that case there was what their Lordships thought was satisfactory evidence of the animus donandi.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary was right in treating the case as one in which donation had to be proved. As to the onus there is the well-known dictum of Lord President Inglis in Sharp v. Paton, 1883, 10 R. 1000 at p. 1006, approved by Lord President Robertson in Dawson v. Mackenzie, 1891, 19 R. 261 at p. 271, that "There is a strong presumption against donation, and it requires very strong and unimpeachable evidence to overcome it." On the facts, tested by that criterion, I agree with the Lord Ordinary, and have nothing to add to what he has said.

Lords M'Laren and Kinnear concurred.

Lord Pearson.—The letter of guarantee on which this action is founded was granted by the defender to his father, with reference to a claim by his half-sister Mrs Barr for a sum of £5000 in discharge of her claim for legitim. It appears that the deceased was unwilling to contribute more than £3000; and it was arranged that Mrs Barr's half-sister Catherine should furnish the balance of £2000, and that a letter should be granted by the defender guaranteeing payment to his father by Catherine of that balance. The guarantee was duly signed and delivered by the defender, and was found in the father's repositories at his death. The sum of £5000 was paid over to Mrs Barr, who granted a discharge on 23rd February 1904.

It clearly appears from the evidence that this balance of £2000, though ostensibly paid out of a credit standing in name of Catherine, was, to the extent of £1653 and interest, paid out of monies which originally belonged to the father, and which in the December previous had existed in the form of a debt due by the defender to his father on account. Admittedly this was a liquid debt, presently due, and bearing interest in favour of the father; and by a series of book entries, no one of which represented the passing of cash or of securities, the defender so arranged matters that the credit, which was originally in favour of his father, found its way into another account in favour of Catherine. Thus the payment by Catherine towards the £5000 which was required for the settlement with Mrs Barr, was really made out of money or credit which had belonged to the father; and if that be the true view, the guarantee by the defender which was found in the repositories of the deceased remains unfulfilled, and the pursuer is entitled to insist for implement of it.

It is said that the documents themselves are conclusive in favour of the defender. I cannot assent to that view. There are here no documents of title properly so called; and it appears to me that the documents which do exist urgently demand explanation. The real defence here is donation; or, as it is put in Answer 4 for the defender, "that on 24th December 1903 Robert Brownlee, senior, made a gift to his daughter Catherine of a sum of £1653, 8s. 6d., which was lying in the hands of the defender at interest." It is said that this money, originally the father's, was gifted by him to his daughter in order to enable her to make the contribution towards the settlement of Mrs Barr's claim; and that the defender's letter of guarantee was thereby rendered unnecessary, and was practically discharged. In such a case I have no doubt of the competency of a proof of the facts and circumstances, in order to determine the question of donation. But it lies upon the defender to make good his position, and I think he has entirely failed to do so. On the question of the intention to make a gift the statements of the alleged donor and the alleged donee would in general be the best evidence. In this case we have only secondary evidence as to the intention of Mr Brownlee, the alleged donor, and so far as it goes it is adverse to the argument on intention. As to Catherine Brownlee, the alleged donee, her evidence conveys the impression that she knew nothing about it, except what she was told by her brother. Then as to the documents on which the defender relies, these are, to my mind, highly unsatisfactory. They include an exchange of receipts, which gives an appearance of formality to the transaction. But the exchange of receipts in such circumstances, where no monies or securities pass, may import any one of several things. There is not enough, in my opinion, to instruct the donation alleged; and whether the documents are regarded in themselves, or in the light of the parole evidence, I think the defender's case fails.

245. Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Company Limited v. Gill

Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), sect. 7 (2)—Member of Crew of Fishing Vessel Remunerated by Share of Profits—Mate of Trawler Remunerated by Share of Artificial Balance Struck by Deducting Certain Expenses from Whole Proceeds of Catch but Without Deducting Wages of Crew, etc.—Circumstances Where Held Mate of Trawler Remunerated by a Share of Profits or Gross Earnings and Not Entitled to Compensation.

Stated Case under Workmen's Compensation Act.

This was an appeal by way of Stated Case from a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute (Young) in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen in an action under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 58), at the instance of William Henry Gill, trawl fisherman, Aberdeen, against the Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co. Ltd.

The Sheriff-Substitute awarded compensation, and at the request of the Company stated a case.

2ND DIV.

Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co. Ltd. v. Gill.

The case stated, inter alia:—

The respondent is a trawl fisherman in Aberdeen, and has served as such in the employment of the appellants, intermittently, for some years. The appellants are trawl owners in Aberdeen, and are owners of the steam trawler "Strathmartin," A 899, belonging to the port of Aberdeen, in which the respondent has served as mate or first fisherman from 7th August 1907 to the date of the accident after mentioned. . . .

In the end of the year 1905 a dispute arose between the trawl owners in Aberdeen and the crews of the fishing vessels as to the rate of remuneration of the latter, and the matters in dispute were referred to the Aberdeen Conciliation Board by the Aberdeen Steam Fishing Vessels Owners Association, Limited, representing the owners, and the Port of Hull Fishermen's Protective Society and other bodies, representing the men. On 7th December 1905 the Board issued an award fixing and determining the remuneration to be paid to crews for two years, from and after 25th October 1905, to be as per the schedule annexed to the said award. The terms of the award are as follows:—

"The Aberdeen Conciliation Board hereby fix and determine that the rates and remuneration to be paid by owners to crews (including all hands) of steam trawl fishing boats, sailing from the Port of Aberdeen, for two years next ensuing after the 25th day of October 1905, are to be according to the schedule and bonus table hereto subjoined.

SCHEDULE.

"All fish (excluding livers and roes, which shall be a perquisite of the crews) shall be sold. From the gross price realised there shall be deducted: salesmen's commission at the rate of five per cent.; discount to the fish buyers at the rate of 2d. per £ on said gross price; one penny for every box used for the fish landed; the cost of all labour handling the fish till they are taken over by the buyers; all ice and coals required for the trip on which the fish were caught; all harbour, market, and water dues, the cost of watching, dan outfit, baskets, and stores. The net balance shall be divided into 14 shares, whereof:—

"The master shall be paid one and three-eighths of such shares.

"The first fisherman shall be paid one and one-eighth of such shares. . . .

"The deck hands shall be paid 5s. per day, and in addition be paid a bonus in terms of the annexed Table." . . .

Immediately after the issuing of this award, there was printed and circulated a notice giving effect to the findings of the award.

The notice also provided:

WAGES IN PORT.

When any vessel is in port cleaning boilers or under repair, and the attendance of the crew, or any of them, is required, the scale of wages shall be as follows:—

Master	6s. per day.
Engineer	6s. " "
First fisherman . . .	5s. " "
. . . . .

The settling sheets of the "Strathmartin," from 9th August to 11th September 1907, were based on the award of the Conciliation Board, and correctly set forth the sums paid to the respondent and to the other members of the crew during the said period. The sums so paid to the respondent in respect of that period were as follows:—

For two days' harbour wages, 7th to 9th Aug.	£0	10	0
For ten days' trip ending 19th August	1	18	9
For seven days' trip ending 26th August.	2	4	3
For eight days' trip ending 3rd September	3	8	10
For eight days' trip ending 11th September	2	7	4

These sums are respectively the one and one-eighth, payable to the mate or first fisherman, of the 14 shares into which the net balance of the proceeds of the fish sold was divided, after making the deductions provided for in the said award.

On the foregoing facts I held that the respondent while in the appellants' employment as mate or first fisherman on board their trawler "Strathmartin," sustained, on 9th September 1907, personal injuries by accident arising out of, and in connection with, his employment; that in consequence of the personal injuries so sustained he was incapacitated for work, and unable to earn wages from 9th September 1907; that the amount of compensation payable under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 had not been ascertained by agreement between parties; that under his contract of service the respondent was not remunerated by a share or shares in the profits or the gross earnings of the working of the said trawler, but received harbour wages at five shillings a day, and for time at sea wages on a scale of which the said net balance formed the standard; that his weekly earnings during the period when he was mate or first fisherman in the appellants' employment exceeded £2 per week; that the respondent was a workman in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906, and entitled to compensation under the Act, and that the appellants are liable to pay him compensation at the rate of £1 weekly as from 9th September 1907, and I awarded him that weekly allowance accordingly, with expenses against the appellants.

The Question of Law for the opinion of the Court was:—

Whether on a sound construction of the agreement between the appellants and the respondent, as above set forth, the respondent was at the time of the accident a member of the crew of a fishing vessel, and remunerated by a share or shares in the profits or the gross earnings of the working of such vessel, and is thereby excluded by sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 from claiming compensation under said Act?

The Workmen's Compensation Act 1906, sect. 7 (2) provides:

This Act shall not apply to such members of the crew of a fishing vessel as are remunerated by shares in the profits or the gross earnings of the working of such vessel.

Argued for the Appellants: Sect. 7 (2) drew a distinction between fishermen who were paid a fixed wage and fishermen who received a share of profits. The claimant belonged to the latter class, and was therefore excluded from the benefits of the Act.

Argued for the Respondent: The balance struck was struck for the sole purpose of fixing wages. It was not "profits," because the wages of the crew were not deducted. It was not gross earnings, because the deductions specified in the case were made. Sect. 7 (2) therefore did not apply. The case to which it truly applied was the case of a joint adventurer or partner (Ellis v. Joseph Ellis & Co. [1905], 1 K.B. 324). Here the claimant was a workman under a contract of service (Merchant Shipping Act 1894, 57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60, sect. 383).

The Court answered the question of law in the affirmative.

Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am clearly of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute's decision is wrong The respondent was a first fisherman or mate on board a fishing vessel. The mode in which his remuneration was fixed was as follows. From the gross price of the fish sold after any trip the owners were entitled to deduct commission, discount, one penny for every box used for the fish, cost of ice and coals, harbour, market, and water dues, and cost of watching, dan outfit, baskets and stores, but not the wages of any of the crew. As regards the master and first fisherman, they are to receive a share of the earnings of the trip after making the deductions mentioned, the master 1⅜ths and the mate 1⅛th. The result of that is plainly this, that these two men might get nothing for a trip although they did the work. That does not look like receiving wages for their work. It was really a speculation on their part, under which they were each to get a share of a fund out of which their shares were to come if there was any such fund. It is plain that the gross earnings of the trip might not be sufficient to pay the charges which the owners are entitled to deduct before calculating the shares. In that case the master and mate would get nothing. On the other hand, if it was a splendid season and the profits earned were large, they might get a very large sum indeed. How could that be said to be wages? When stated in that simple way the case is clear. The statute provides that it "shall not apply to such members of the crew of a fishing vessel as are remunerated by shares in the profits or gross earnings of the working of such vessel." How could the master and mate here be said not to be "remunerated by shares in the profits or the gross earnings"? It is said that under the award the wages of the crew are not deducted before calculating the amount payable to the master and mate. The only effect of that is that if the gross earnings are not more than sufficient to pay the deductions, the owners have to pay the crew out of their own pockets, and are not entitled to set the amount so paid against any future voyage.

On the whole matter I am of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute was wrong in holding that the respondent was not remunerated by a share in the profits or the gross earnings of the trawler, and that the question should be answered in the affirmative.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion. The fact that the respondent got harbour wages of 5s. a day for two days has no bearing upon the question. When the accident happened the respondent was a first fisherman on board a trawler actually engaged in trawling. At that time his remuneration was determined by the award of the Aberdeen Conciliation Board. On the other hand, at the time when he was being paid harbour wages he was not engaged in trawling, and the award of the Conciliation Board did not apply. The trawler had just undergone her Board of Trade survey, and the survey having been completed, the crew were engaged preparing the fishing gear for going to sea, and it was during that time that the respondent was paid harbour wages. But after that the trawler went to sea and then the respondent's remuneration was regulated by the award of the Conciliation Board, and according to that award all that he could get was a certain share of the net balance of the gross price of the fish caught during the trip, after making certain deductions. If that is not remuneration by a share "in the profits or the gross earnings of the working" of the vessel, I do not know what is. I therefore think the Sheriff-Substitute's decision was wrong, and that the question should be answered in the affirmative.

Lord Ardwall.—I am of opinion that the question ought to be answered in the affirmative. The respondent, except when in harbour, with which time we have nothing to do in this case, was not remunerated by wages in the proper sense of the word; he was paid neither by time nor by work. His remuneration was arrived at in this way. From the gross earnings of the vessel on which he was employed, certain deductions specified in the first paragraph of the schedule quoted in the stated case were made. The gross earnings were then divided into fourteen shares, and the respondent was paid one and one-eighth of such shares, or about a twelfth share of the total gross earnings. In this state of the facts I think it clear that the respondent was remunerated by shares in the gross earnings of the working of the steam trawler "Strathmartin," on board which he was employed at the date of the accident. I cannot accept the argument that because a certain small deduction for current expenses was made from the gross earnings before dividing them into shares, these shares were not shares of the gross earnings within the meaning of the Act. It might possibly be maintained that the shares paid to the respondent were shares of the profits before deducting certain fixed charges, such as interest on capital, depreciation, and wages of the crew. But I think it is more appropriate to regard the respondent's remuneration as shares of the gross earnings.

On the general construction of sect. 7 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 I may say that in my opinion it was intended to cover by the two categories of payments there set forth all cases where the person employed was to a greater or less extent a co-adventurer or partner in the business in which he was employed.

In the present case I have no doubt that the respondent must be treated as coming under the exception enacted by sect. 7 (2) of the said Act.—14*th December* 1907.

Appeal against an Interlocutor of the First Division (The Lord President, Lords M'Laren, Kinnear and Pearson).

The facts of this case and the terms of the contract in question are fully set forth in the previous report.

The Respondents appealed against the interlocutor which recalled the arrestments simpliciter. No question was raised before the House as to the competency of the petition for recal, and the argument was directed to the question of whether the property in the ships had passed.

The Petitioners (respondents in the House) were not called upon.

The House dismissed the appeal with costs.

The Lord Chancellor.—It is not necessary to trouble the learned counsel for the respondents in this case, because the question is whether the property passed, and whether the parties intended by the contract that it should pass. I must say I do not know that any conclusive use can be made of a comparison with other contracts and the language that is used in regard to those other contracts in judgments. Speaking for myself I always have some misgiving when presumptions of fact—that is to say, presumptions in regard to the interpretation that is to be put upon particular words in a contract apart from their natural significance—are put forward. It may be a very useful guide to a certain degree, but after all the question is what the contract shews the parties intended to contract for. The facts referred to by Mr Clyde and Mr Smith, namely, that the ship was to be paid for by instalments, and that there was power of inspection on the part of the purchasers, may be marks or badges pointing to the property passing, but it is not conclusive, and the question still remains as to what they meant.

I think the contract was one for a completed ship, and the risk lay upon the builders until delivery, and there was no intention to make delivery or to part with the property until the vessel was completed. Under these circumstances I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Earl of Halsbury.—I am of the same opinion. There is no doubt that a contract might be so framed as to give the purchaser power to claim the property in those parts which, when they are put together, make the complete ship, but in each case the question must be whether or not the contract has been such, and I think this has not been so made.

I confess I follow the judgment of the learned judge in Scotland with one little exception. I think the phrase that he has used about the presumption being in favour of the builders perhaps was not sufficiently considered by him—perhaps he did not think it necessary; but if he had used a different phrase—if as a matter of proof the wood, the iron, the nails and so forth, which constituted the ship ultimately, are once the builder's and are proved to be the builder's, it does become necessary to shew that there is some contract transferring that property under the circumstances to the purchaser; and if, instead of saying there was a presumption that it belonged to the builder, and, proceeding upon the presumption, he had said that the proof was that it was the builder's property, and it became necessary to shew that the builder had divested himself of the property, and to shew that by the words of the contract it had become the property of somebody else—if he had said that, I should have entirely agreed. From the reasoning of the rest of the judgment I really do think that is what the learned judge meant. It was not a considered judgment, I understand, and the phrase that there was a presumption that it belonged to the builder was one used in the course of the argument, and in the sense in which I have explained it I should concur with it; otherwise I should differ that there was any presumption one way or the other. The question is, What is the contract, and by that contract to whom does the property belong?

Lord Macnaghten.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord James of Hereford.—I concur.

Lord Robertson.—The question in the present appeal seems to me to be governed by the Sale of Goods Act, and by that statute to be determinable by the intention of the instrument under which the ship is built. In aid and supplement of construction the statute supplies certain rules, but these may or may not come into operation according as the contract requires it. In the present case I find the contract to require no aid or supplement from the statutory rules, for it seems to me to provide from beginning for completion of this ship by the shipbuilders with their materials, and transfers it to the purchasers only as a finished ship and at a stage not in fact yet reached. This is a simple view of the matter, but in my judgment it is the sound one. It treats the Sale of Goods Act as superseding the previous law, and if in some instance it may be found necessary to revive and reconstruct the old common law for purposes of illustration, I can only say that that occasion has not yet come.

I therefore concur in the conclusion of the Court of Session, which rests on the contract. It seems right, however, to say that this does not imply my concurrence in all that is said by way of statement of doctrine in the judgments of the learned Lords. Some of them seem open to exception, or at least criticism, but the judgments of the learned judges do not seem to have been at least minutely considered. Among matters of omission I think the fifth head of the 18th section of the Act is so directly applicable that it required perhaps more attention than it has received. But I do not require to enter on those disputable matters, as the ground of judgment which your Lordships adopt is common to us and to their Lordships of the First Division.

247. Craig (Gorman's Factor) and Others v. The Accountant of Court.

Judicial Factor—Recal—Accounting—Factor Loco Absentis—Return of Absent Ward a Fortnight after Extract of Appointment as Factor Loco Absentis Ad Interim — Execution of Trust Deed in Favour of Factor — Administration of Estate under Trust Deed — Liability of Factor to Lodge Accounts Before Discharge.

This was a petition by James Craig, C.A., Edinburgh, Messrs A. & A. Crawford, merchants, Leith, and Mrs Agnes M'Lelland Frew or Gorman, for recal of a factory and warrant for delivery of the factor's bond of caution under the following circumstances:—

On 20th June 1906 the said James Craig was, on the petition of certain creditors and the wife of Angus Gorman, formerly licensed grocer, Edinburgh—the concurring petitioners in the present petition—appointed factor loco absentis ad interim to the said Angus Gorman; and found caution and extracted said appointment.

On 3rd July 1906 James Craig was appointed factor loco absentis to the said Angus Gorman, but this appointment was not extracted. On 5th July 1906 Angus Gorman returned home, and on the same day executed a trust deed in favour of the said James Craig. It was averred in the petition for recal that the estate of the said Angus Gorman was thereafter dealt with under the trust deed, and that the said James Craig had had no intromissions as factor foresaid with said estate.

The Accountant of Court opposed the granting of the prayer of the petition on the ground that the petitioner refused to submit his account of his intromissions with the factory estate.

The Lord Ordinary ordained the petitioner to lodge with the Accountant of Court an account of his intromissions as factor loco absentis ad interim.

Lord Guthrie.—On 20th June 1906 the petitioner was appointed factor loco absentis ad interim to Angus Gorman (who had carried on business previously as a licensed grocer in Edinburgh) on the petition of Gorman's wife and of certain of his creditors. The petitioner found caution, and obtained extract of his ad interim appointment. On 3rd July 1906 the petitioner was appointed factor loco absentis, but, not having found caution, this appointment did not take effect, and the petitioner's appointment as interim factor remained.

On 5th July the petitioner alleges—and it is not disputed either by the original petitioners or by the petitioners' cautioner to be the fact—that Gorman returned home, and on the same date executed a trust deed in favour of the petitioner under which Gorman and the petitioner understood that Gorman's estate has since been dealt with. Expressly as factor loco absentis, the petitioner has had no intromissions.

On 27th October 1907 the petitioner presented the petition for recal, and in usual form his accounts were remitted to the Accountant to report. Although the factory has remained unrecalled from its commencement on 20th June 1906 until now, 10th November 1907, and although there have been intromissions by the petitioner with the estate embraced in the factory, he declines to submit his account of these intromissions to the Accountant, on the ground that they were had by him, not under the interim factory, but under the trust deed of 5th July 1906. The Accountant maintains that the petitioner having had intromissions with estate committed to his charge as an officer of Court during the subsistence of his office, must, as in a question with him and the Court, account for these intromissions in the usual way. I think the Accountant is right. The petitioner was satisfied that the person appearing on 5th July and alleging himself to be Augus Gorman was the person for whom he had been appointed factor loco absentis. But before he was entitled to act on this belief, and either to hand over the estate to the alleged Angus Gorman or to accept and act under a factory by him, it was necessary in a petition for recal to give the original petitioners and his own cautioner and all others interested an opportunity of stating another view. This could have been done, and recal obtained within a few days. Instead of doing so, the petitioner, naturally enough, but acting under a mistaken view of his legal position, assumed that he was entitled, at his own hand, to act as if the factory had been recalled, and to hand over the estate which he held as factor ad interim loco absentis, to himself as factor under the trust deed. It seems to me the case is the same as if on 5th July Gorman had called on the petitioner to hand over the estate to some other man of business whom he had appointed his factor. In such circumstances I do not doubt that the petitioner's reply would have been—and I think rightly—that he could not do so until the interim factory loco absentis had been recalled.

While this seems to me to have been the legal position of the petitioner, I see nothing in the circumstances to induce the Court not to insist in this case on the ordinary rule being followed. On the one hand, there is no suggestion against the perfect regularity and accuracy of the petitioner's intromissions throughout; on the other hand, no reason is given why the petition for recal should not have been presented at once, and it is not said that the petitioner will have any difficulty in lodging the accounts asked for by the Accountant. I hold that he is bound to lodge these accounts even although it be the fact that he understood and intended the intromissions therein contained to be intromissions under the trust deed, and not under the interim factory. Any other decision would encourage a looseness of practice which ought not to be allowed. The cases of Edwards, 1853, 15 D. 521, quoted for the petitioner, and of Johnston v. Dobie, 3rd November 1906, Session Cases 1907, p. 31, quoted for the Accountant, do not seem to me to have raised the precise question now under consideration.—12th December 1907.

CAP. 44), SECT. 6.

(See previous report of this case in Vol. XIV. p. 925.)

This was an action of count, reckoning, payment, and denuding at the instance of W. P. Scott and another, the trustees on the marriage contract trust of Mr and Mrs A. T. Cathcart, against J. I. Cathcart, a brother of A. T. Cathcart, who was formerly a trustee on this trust.

Mr and Mrs A. T. Cathcart were married on 25th April 1893 in Ceylon, and the marriage-contract was executed on 21st April 1893. The purposes of the trust in the marriage contract, as to the wife's funds, were that the trustees should pay the income to Mrs Cathcart for her sole and separate use, and so that she should not have power to dispose thereof by way of anticipation, and on her death should pay the income to Mr Cathcart; and on the death of both spouses, in trust for the children of the marriage; and failing children, in trust for Mrs Cathcart, her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns. The husband's funds were settled on the same trusts, save that if there was no issue the funds were to revert to the husband. It was also declared "that all monies liable to be invested under these presents may be invested with the consent, in writing, of" the spouses. There were no children of the marriage.

The defender and a Mr Galton were the original trustees under the contract. Mr Galton was resident in Ceylon, and on 26th November 1903 the defender resigned and the pursuers were appointed trustees by the spouses in virtue of a power reserved in the marriage contract.

The pursuers then raised the present action against the defender, and on 20th March 1907 the Lord Ordinary found that the defenders were liable to make good to the trust estate the sum of £2000 which had been lost in an investment in shares of the Kandapolla Tea Co. Ltd. (see the previous report).

Thereafter the defender lodged a Minute in which he craved the Lord Ordinary to pronounce (1) an order under sect. 6 of the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act 1891, ordaining the pursuers to pay the income of the trust during the life of the spouses to the defender until he was indemnified against the sum of £600 [the loss on the Kandapolla shares], and thereafter, in the event of there being no issue of the marriage, to apply the capital of the trust funds so far as necessary; and (2) an order ordaining the pursuers to pay the income of £1392, 3s. [the sum obtained on the sale of the said shares] and the said £600 to the defender until he was indemnified; and if there were no issue, to apply the capital of these sums, if necessary, to the same purpose.

The Lord Ordinary ordered that the motion should be intimated to Mr and Mrs Cathcart in order that they might sist themselves as parties to the action, if so advised. A Minute was lodged on their behalf stating that they did not propose to appear in the action.

The letter (dated 27th July 1897), in which Mr and Mrs Cathcart requested that the said investment should be made, was in the following terms:—

"Gentlemen,—We will thank you, so soon as you have received the £2000 . . . . now about to be repaid, to reinvest the same in the purchase in your names of £1000 Debenture Stock of the Kandapolla Tea Co. Ltd., and of £1000 Preference Shares of the same Company.

"Alan T. Cathcart, Isabella G. Cathcart."

The Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:—

"Finds that, as brought out in the State No. 483 of process, the net amount realised by the sale ordered by the interlocutor of 11th June 1907 is £1392, 3s., which has been deposited in the head office of the Royal Bank of Scotland, Edinburgh, conform to deposit receipt No. 479 of process: Grants warrant to and authorises the Accountant of Court and the said bank to pay to the pursuers the amount contained in said deposit-receipt, with interest at deposit rates from the date thereof, and that upon a certified copy of this interlocutor: Finds that the loss arising in consequence of the investment of funds belonging to the marriage-contract trust of Mr and Mrs Alan Taylor Cathcart in debenture bonds and preference shares of the Kandapolla Tea Co. Ltd. amounts, as brought out in said State No. 483 of process, to the sum of £607, 17s. of capital and £166, 13s. 6d. of income, amounting together to £774, 10s. 6d.: Decerns and ordains the defender to make payment to the pursuers of said sum of £774, 10s. 6d., with interest at five per centum per annum from 3rd July 1907: Finds and declares that in the event of the said Alan Taylor Cathcart surviving his wife and so becoming entitled to the income of the funds falling under the marriage contract, then the trustees acting under the said marriage contract shall be bound and obliged to pay, during the lifetime of the said Alan Taylor Cathcart, the income accruing upon the sum of £607, 17s. of capital to the defender, his heirs, executors and representatives whomsoever, until the defender James Taylor Cathcart shall be completely indemnified in respect of the payment by him of the said sum of £774, 10s. 6d., with interest thereon at five per cent. per annum: Quoad ultra, assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action: Finds no expenses due to or by either party, and decerns."

Lord Mackenzie. — The defender was found personally liable, by the interlocutor of 20th March 1907, to make good to the marriage-contract trust any loss arising in consequence of the investment of marriage-contract funds in debenture bonds and preference shares of the Kandapolla Tea Co. Ltd. The bonds and shares have now been realised, and the net loss of capital and income is brought out in the state No. 483 of process at £774, 10s. 6d. as at 3rd July 1907.

The defender maintains that he is only bound to repay to the trust so much of the £774, 10s. 6d. as is capital. It was stated that £166, 13s. 6d. represents outstanding interest and dividends. If this be deducted from £774, 10s. 6d. it leaves the sum of £607, 17s. representing capital. The defender maintains that he cannot be held liable to make good to the spouses any part of the annual income accrued or to accrue on the capital which he is to replace, because they are personally barred from claiming this. He founds upon the letter of 27th July 1897 printed in Cond. 10, written by the spouses to the marriage-contract trustees asking the trustees to make the investment in the Kandapolla Tea Company. It was maintained that this letter contained a definite request, and not merely the consent of the spouses, which is by the terms of the marriage contract required to the investment of trust funds.

Outer House. Lord Mackenzie.

The defender founded upon the case of The City of Glasgow Bank v. Parkhurst, 1880, 7 R. 749, and on the passage in the Lord President's opinion at p. 754, in which it is explained that if a beneficiary knowingly and willingly assents to the commission of a breach of trust, he may be barred from making any claim against the peccant trustee. He also founded upon the case of Raes v. Meek, 1889, 16 R. (H.L.) 31, for a practical application of this doctrine. The effect of this contention of the defender would be not only to entitle him to retain so much of the £774, 10s. 6d. as represents outstanding interest and dividends, but also to have paid to him during the joint lives of the spouses the income upon the capital which he is bound to replace.

The defender, however, further maintained that this was a case where the trustee had committed a breach of trust at the instigation and request, and with the consent in writing, of a beneficiary, and that accordingly sect. 6 of the Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act 1891 applies. If this is so, then the Court may, notwithstanding that the beneficiary is a married woman entitled for her separate use, whether she has or has not powers of disposal or alienation, make such order as shall seem just for applying all or any part of the interest of the beneficiary by way of indemnity to the trustee.

Taking first the claim under the statute, I think this could not competently be made in the present process, to which the spouses are not parties. It would involve dealing with funds which are not in Court in the present action at all. Assuming, however, that the question was raised in a competent process, I do not think this is a case in which the Court could make any order under the statute. So far as I am aware, the proper construction to be put upon sect. 6 has not been the subject of consideration in any case in Scotland. In two English cases, however, the clause in the English Act, which is in similar terms, has been construed. These are the cases of Somerset v. Earl Poulett [1894], 1 Ch. 231, and Mara v. Browne [1895], 2 Ch. 69. The view there taken was that consent to investment is one thing, consent to breach of trust is another, and that the Act was not to be construed as if the word "investment" had been used instead of "breach of trust." Therefore, in order to bring a case within the Act there must be instigation or request or consent in writing by the beneficiary to some act of omission which is itself a breach of trust, and does not merely become so by reason of want of care on the part of the trustee. This construction appears to me to be sound. Applying it to the present case, I think the facts do not entitle the defender to plead the section. The investment was of a class permitted by the marriage contract. The reason why it was a breach of trust was by reason of want of care on the part of the defender. I can find no evidence that the spouses were aware of facts which rendered what they requested by their letter of 27th July 1897 a breach of trust. The defender had the duty of determining whether the investment was a proper one or not. For these reasons I am of opinion that no order could be made under the statute.

I may further point out that under the marriage contract the income of the trust funds in question, which were contributed by the wife, is to be paid to her during her life for her sole and separate use without power of anticipation. It has always been held that in such a case it is the duty of the trustee not only to protect the married woman against others, but also against herself. The Act no doubt says that the order may be made notwithstanding that the beneficiary is a married woman entitled for her separate use, whether she has or has not powers of disposal or alienation. It must, however, be shewn that the married woman has acted for herself, and has been fully informed of the circumstances (Sawyer v. Sawyer, 28 Ch. D. 595; Bolton v. Curre [1895], 1 Ch. 544). There is nothing in Mrs A. T. Cathcart's evidence to shew that this was so in her case.

As regards the contention that the spouses should not take any benefit personally from the money which the defender has to replace, and that they are not therefore entitled to any income, whether past or future, from it, I have come to the conclusion that this is well founded as regards Mr A. T. Cathcart, but not as regards his wife. The reason why I think the wife is not barred from claiming the income (to which she is entitled during her life) is the one above stated, that the defender was there for her protection, and that it has not been shewn she acted for herself and was fully informed of the circumstances. I do not think the same consideration applies in the case of Mr A. T. Cathcart. The case which aids the defender here is not so much the one founded on of Raes v. Meek, as the English case of Somerset v. Earl Poulett (supra, cit.). The reason why Raes v. Meek does not seem to me so applicable is because there the spouses were trustees, here they are not. The principle upon which it was held there that they could not obtain relief was because, if there had been a violation of duty, they were as much parties to it as the defender. The importance of Somerset's case as regards this matter was pointed out in Fletcher v. Collis [1905], 2 Ch. 24, by Stirling, L.J., at p. 37. The result of the observations there made is to shew that where in England a tenant for life asks a trustee to invest in a particular security, but leaves it to the trustee to make the proper enquiries, then, though an application to impound under the Act may fail, yet the tenant for life is barred by his concurrence in drawing the interest on the fund replaced by the trustee. This principle, which is just that of personal bar, should, in my opinion, be here applied in the case of Alan Taylor Cathcart. His right to draw the income does not emerge unless he survives his wife. If that event happens, then during his lifetime the income upon the capital sum replaced by the defender, £607, 17s., will be paid to him or his heirs.

I have considered the arguments submitted on the question of expenses. Although the pursuers have succeeded to a certain extent against the defender, they have caused so much unnecessary expense, by raising questions on which they were unsuccessful, that I think there should be no expenses found due to or by either party.—23rd November 1907.

This was a note presented by the liquidator for authority to pay a first and final dividend, and for discharge. The facts now commented and adjudged upon, which sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note, were brought to the notice of the Court in the report by Mr J. Scott Tait, C.A., to whom the liquidator's accounts were remitted for audit.

Outer House. Lord Johnston. Liquidator of R. D. Simpson Ltd.

The Lord Ordinary held that it was the duty of the liquidator to have brought to the notice of the Court the facts attending a claim for £2000 admitted by him, when said £2000 was a mere random sum claimed by certain directors in respect that they had settled claims against the Company and themselves for £1000 in cash. He further reduced said claim to £1000, and directed that £15, 15s. should be deducted from the liquidator's fee on account of his conduct.

Lord Johnston.—In the liquidation of R. D. Simpson Ltd. a serious question has been raised by Mr J. Scott Tait, to whom I remitted the liquidator's accounts for audit.

In the note to his report, No. 23 of process, in dealing with the deliverances pronounced by the liquidator on the claims lodged in the liquidation, Mr Tait brought specially under the notice of the Court the claim No. 82 in the liquidator's schedule of deliverances No. 12 of process.

I must say at once that Mr Tait has not gone beyond his sphere in bringing this matter to my notice, but, on the contrary, had he not done so, he would have fallen short of his duty, and would not have justified the trust which the Court places in those professional gentlemen to whom it remits liquidator's accounts for audit. The Court relies upon them for the most confidential assistance in performing the judicial duty of supervising liquidation in the interest of all concerned. On the other hand, I am compelled to characterise the conduct of the liquidator as wanting in that openness which the Court looks for from the gentlemen who occupy this important position, and as conclusively proving the necessity of the Court's supervision.

The claim and deliverance is as follows:—

"82. Professor Beare, R. B. Mathie, and Andrew Scott, Edinburgh.

"Claim lodged, £2000. Claim admitted, £2000.

"The liquidator admits this claim."

This is the whole reference which the liquidator makes to this claim. He treats it as if it were a tradesman's account for goods supplied, and gives no suggestion of the nature of the claim, or of the circumstances under which he admits it to a ranking, though he does so in every other case which is not merely a claim for a trade debt.

Having so delivered himself upon this and the other claims, the liquidator on 11th September 1907 submitted a note in the liquidation for approval of his deliverances on claims, audit of his accounts, and authority to pay dividends. For ought that appeared, or that unaided I could have known, I should have found nothing to do but approve as in ordinary course deliverances on claims unobjected to, and it is difficult to see how any creditor should have objected to the deliverance in question, for although intimation was ordered to the creditors, they received from the liquidator no further information, and could have had no further grounds to suspect his deliverance, than had the Court. Further, when called upon to reply to the notes issued by Mr Tait with his interim report, the liquidator stated that after careful consideration he had decided that it "was in the interest of the general body of creditors" to compromise a certain large claim at the instance of Professor Beare and Messrs Mathie and Scott at £2000, "subject to the approval of the Court to be taken in the note since lodged on 11th September 1907." I take leave to say that, having regard to the terms of the Note referred to, and with which I am now dealing, this is a most misleading statement, and I can only regard the liquidator's conduct in not openly applying to the Court for approval of the compromise, which he was making in connection with this claim, and in presenting it to the Court as a mere question of approving a deliverance, as a deliberate attempt to smuggle this matter through, without the Court being made aware of the circumstances. And I should not be doing my duty in supervision of this liquidation if I passed over the matter, without taking notice of the liquidator's conduct.

The circumstances under which the claim in question arose, appear to be these: I am not exactly informed as to what the proper business of R. D. Simpson Ltd. was, but one of their lines of business was apparantly the sale of certain labour-saving machines. Amongst other machines they were selling in 1905–6 a machine for slicing sausages and the like meat goods. This proved to be a breach of the patent of Mr Van Berkel of Rotterdam, and accordingly the respondents in 1905 were subjected to an interdict at the instance of Van Berkel and the Dutch Company which were working his patent. The suspension and interdict was resisted by R. D. Simpson Ltd., and a trial took place in this Court, in which the Van Berkel patent was upheld both by Lord Dundas in the Outer House and by the First Division on Reclaiming Note, and interdict was granted. The report of the case will be found under date November 20th, 1906 (1907 S.C. 165). The case was a difficult one to try, and the trial must have been a costly one. I can readily believe that the account of judicial expenses of the successful complainers must have been a substantial one, and that of their extra-judicial expenses made even larger. On the issue of the suspension and interdict there arose a claim of damages for infringement in addition to the claim for costs under the suspension. The former would have had to be made the subject of a new action; the latter, though not entirely liquid, was capable of being immediately made so by the complainers, by having their account of expenses audited and taking decree for the taxed amount. But instead of doing either, the successful complainers entered into negotiation with R. D. Simpson Ltd.; and their claim of damages and for expenses of the suspension process was adjusted at £1000, and steps were being taken for reducing the settlement of the claim, which had been agreed on in writing, and arranging a guarantee for payment satisfactory to the complainers. This was in December 1906 and January-February 1907. But before final adjustment of the guarantee to be given, the Company found itself obliged in March 1907 to go into voluntary liquidation, when Mr C. J. Munro, C.A., was appointed liquidator. On 19th March the liquidation was placed under supervision. Van Berkel & Co. at once intimated to Professor Beare and Messrs Mathie, Scott and Simpson, the directors of R. D. Simpson Ltd., that they held them personally liable for the damage they had sustained and the costs, judicial and extra-judicial, which they had incurred in litigating with R. D. Simpson Ltd., and on 17th April 1907 they raised an action against these gentlemen, concluding for £4250, made up of £1250 of damages for infringement of patent, and £3000 of costs alleged to have been incurred in the previous suit. The record in this action was closed, but it did not proceed further, as the defenders, or at least Professor Beare and Messrs Mathie and Scott, took up the negotiation, which had become abortive on the bankruptcy of the Company, and paid the £1000 which had been originally agreed upon to Van Berkel & Co. This payment was made in full settlement of all claim of damage competent to Van Berkel and his associates in respect of the infringement of patent, and of the expenses in the action of suspension and interdict. But on making the payment the directors took from the payees an assignation in their favour as individuals of all claims of damages and rights of action of whatever kind competent to the payees against the Company. This settlement was effected on 30th June 1907, and the directors at once proceeded to formulate a claim in the liquidation. My information is largely obtained from Mr Tait's report, as no other information has been vouchsafed me, except a copy of the open record in the action at the instance of Van Berkel & Co. against the directors. I have no certain assurance, but I think there is enough to justify the assumption, that the liquidator was approached before the claim was lodged, and that the directors ascertained what amount he was prepared to pass before lodging their claim. For their claim lodged on 23rd August 1907 is for the exact amount which the liquidator a few days afterwards admitted to a ranking.

In the circumstances which I have thus shortly narrated, and which will be found much more fully set out in Mr Tait's report and in sundry papers in the liquidation, it must, I think, be apparent that questions of some delicacy and difficulty arise, and I should have expected any liquidator to have relieved himself of responsibility by applying to the Court on a full statement for directions as to what he should do. I should have expected him to take such an attitude that, though he might have adjusted a provisional figure with the creditors claiming, he would have come to the Court for sanction, and have given the Court all the assistance in his power in the interest of the general liquidation, while leaving the creditors claiming to fight their own battle. This, however, has not been the course taken by the liquidator, and I thought it proper to require the appearance of the directors who are the creditors claiming for their interest, and having received no assistance from the liquidator, I am now obliged to consider the merits of the claim on an entirely ex parte argument.

In the first place, were the directors under liability to Van Berkel & Co.? This is a question which has not been tried, but the liability has been accepted. I think that there is much doubt as to the liability. Directors are agents of their company as well as trustees. Now, if by his negligence, or even his wanton act in the line of his employment, injury is done by an agent or servant to a third party, the employer is responsible for his servant's wrong, and the servant is liable for his own wrong. They may either be sued separately, or both may be sued jointly and severally. But it is not a case of joint wrongdoers, as in the case of Palmer v. Wick and Pulteneytown Steam Shipping Co. (1893), 20 R. 275, and 21 R. (H.L.) 39. The employer is responsible derivatively or vicariously only, and would certainly have relief, not merely pro rata, but entirely, against his agent or servant, and the agent or servant no relief against his employer. But where injury has been done to a third party, by the bona fide error of judgment of the servant, while the employer is no doubt liable for the act of his agent or servant in his business, I think that there is a grave doubt whether the servant is liable to the third party at all. The present is an extreme example. I am not saying too much when I say that the question whether Van Berkel's patent was valid, and the Company therefore liable in breach, was a question which the Court found to be one of intricacy and difficulty, and worthy of a solemn judgment. The result of that judgment is that it must now be accepted that the directors committed an error in judgment, though a most venial one, in not treating it if they knew of it, and they must be, I think, presumed to have known of it, as valid. But would the wrong thus committed have given Van Berkel & Co. a direct action against the directors personally? I think that this is very doubtful. But assume it to be the law that they were personally liable, I am satisfied that, there being bona fides and no negligence, they would have been entitled to relief, not pro rata merely, but entirely, from the Company. For in undertaking the office of director, I think a man only undertakes to act honestly, carefully, and to the best of his judgment, and does not warrant the Company against the results of his bona fide error of judgment.

The directors have elected to assume their liability, and have made terms with Van Berkel & Co. But having done so, while I agree that they are entitled to relief, I am at a loss to see how they can claim from the Company in liquidation more than they could have claimed from the Company as a going concern—that is, exactly what they have paid to Van Berkel & Co. The only measure we have of the latter's claim is the sum they were willing to accept. No doubt that sum was arrived at as a compromise, first with the Company, and afterwards with the directors, but I can see no reason to assume that it was not a just estimate of the claim; and even if I thought that Van Berkel & Co. could, by pressing their claim to the bitter end, have made more of it, in the first place I have, and the liquidator had, no other measure by which to gauge it. I have no more reason for taking it at £2000 than at £3000, or at the full sum of £4250. And in the second place, whatever it was adjusted at, whether by litigation or by compromise, that sum alone could be claimed from the Company.

Suppose that the Company had remained solvent and the directors had intervened and settled with Van Berkel & Co., could they have, in the highest view of their right of relief, claimed more from the Company than they had paid? I think not, because the fiduciary capacity of the directors would have precluded them recovering more than the sum which they were out of pocket. They could not have bought up the claim as a compromise and then have enforced it to the extreme point against their Company. I do not find that liquidation makes any difference. Liquidation does not sever the tie between directors and the Company. Their functions are only suspended, while their office is, so to speak, put in commission. If the liquidation proves unnecessary and is recalled, they resume their duties ipso facto, without reappointment. Pending liquidation, I do not think that they are free to buy up debts against the Company so as to state them against the Company at a higher figure, any more than they were when the Company was a joint concern under their management.

For both these reasons, then, first that the sum paid by them is the only measure of the value of the claim that the Court and the liquidator can look at, and second, that the directors are barred from putting a higher value upon it as against the Company, I think that the directors must be, in their own interest, content to treat their claim as one for £1000 only. For that sum they have, I think, made the Company in liquidation their debtors, and for that sum, like other creditors, they can only get a ranking.

And I see no hardship in the result. They have accepted personal liability, and this they have made the law of the situation. I am prepared to give them the benefit of holding that they were not, correi debendi, jointly and severally liable, but only joint obligants with a right of relief, or exactly in the position of cautioners. But unfortunately for them, they are joint obligants with a right of relief along with an insolvent principal, and they must therefore face a loss. They have, I assume, wisely minimised that loss, but there is no ground for enabling them to escape that loss, either in whole or in part, by allowing them to rank for some vaguely estimated sum, different from and higher than the sum they have actually paid. I confess I have even some doubt whether I am entitled, without further enquiry, to assume that the claim against the Company was properly estimated at £1000. I know from the papers that the extra-judicial expenses in the action of suspension and interdict bulked very largely in Van Berkel and his Company's claim, and I think that there is authority for doubting whether such extra-judicial expenses are a relevant item in a claim of damages. Here, as at other points, I should have had the liquidator's assistance. On the information I have, I think, even discounting their extra-judicial expenses, there is good ground for assuming that £1000 was a fair settlement, and I shall accept it as such.

I shall therefore reduce the claimants Professor Beare and Messrs Mathie and Scott's ranking to £1000, and I feel it my duty to direct that a deduction be made from the fee to be allowed to the liquidator, which I shall modify to fifteen guineas, to mark my estimation of his conduct and cover the expense to the liquidation which his method of dealing with this question has caused. —4th December 1907.

II. SUCCESSION — LEGACY — FALSA DEMONSTRATIO—HELD THAT A LEGACY TO "THE MISSION TO THE WYNDS, GLASGOW," WAS INTENDED FOR A MISSION KNOWN AS THE "WYND CHURCH," WHICH AT ONE TIME WAS CARRIED ON IN THE WYNDS, BUT BEFORE THE TESTATOR'S DEATH HAD BEEN TRANSFERRED TO ANOTHER DISTRICT OF GLASGOW.

III. SUCCESSION—RESIDUE—CONSTRUCTION OF CLAUSE PROVIDING FOR THE ABATEMENT OF, OR ADDITION FROM ANY SURPLUS TO, PECUNIARY LEGACIES.

This was a multiplepoinding brought with reference to the estate of Miss Jane M'Grouther.

Miss M'Grouther died on 26th November 1903, leaving a trust disposition and deed of settlement and deed of appointment, dated 5th June 1890, and two codicils, dated respectively 18th June 1894 and 30th November 1898.

The bequests which fell to be construed in this action are given in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

Besides these bequests the said trust disposition and settlement contained the following clause (being the clause dealing with residue referred to in the Lord Ordinary's opinion):—

"But declaring with reference to the whole of the foregoing pecuniary legacies and those which may hereafter be left or bequeathed by me, that in case the residue of my said estate and the estate over which I have power of appointment should not realise a clear sum sufficient to meet the same and the said duties thereon in full, then the said legacies, including those which may be hereafter left by me, shall all suffer a proportional deduction in proportion to the amount of the deficiency: And declaring that in case the residue of my said estate and the estate over which I have power of appointment should realise a sum exceeding in amount the sum sufficient to meet in full the said pecuniary legacies, and those which may be hereafter left by me, and duties thereon foresaid, then, and in that event, the said legacies, including those which may hereafter be left by me, shall all be increased in proportion to the amount by which the said residue shall exceed the amount of the said legacies and duties."

In point of fact, the deceased's estate realised more than was required for payment of the whole legacies bequeathed by her.

Lord Mackenzie.—This is an action of multiplepoinding in reference to two bequests under the trust disposition and settlement of the late Miss Jane M'Grouther, dated 5th June 1890, with two codicils, dated respectively 18th June 1894 and 30th November 1898. She died on 26th November 1903 at the age of ninety-four.

By her settlement Miss M'Grouther conveyed to trustees her whole estate, heritable and moveable, including the funds over which she had power of appointment under the will of her deceased brother, for the purposes therein set forth, viz.: (1) for payment of her debts, etc.; and (2) for payment of a series of legacies.

Among the legacies thus bequeathed by the deceased, there occurs the following:—"To the Mission to the Wynds, Glasgow, the sum of three hundred pounds sterling." The deceased further directed her trustees, inter alia, "to hold and apply the sum of one thousand pounds and the interest thereof for religious or charitable purposes in connection with Rio Janeiro as to my said trustees may seem best." As regards this latter bequest, it is clear, I think, upon the authorities, that it must be held void from uncertainty. The case of MacIntyre v. Grimond's Trs., 1904, 6 F. 285, 7 F. (H.L.) 90, is conclusive upon this point. It was argued that there was here the adjection of a local limit, and that this distinguished the present from Grimond's case (see Shaw's Trs., 1905, 8 F. 52). I think it is impossible, however, to construe the bequest here as confined to existing organisations within a defined area, and therefore the criticisms in Lord Moncreiff's opinion in Grimond's case apply here.

As regards the bequest to the Mission to the Wynds, Glasgow, the parties interested agree in admitting the correctness of the statement made in the claim for the members of the Deacons' Court of, and as representing, the congregation of the Wynd Church, in connection with the United Free Church of Scotland, Glasgow. It is stated as against these claimants that there is no mission in Glasgow known as "The Mission to the Wynds." It is therefore contended that the bequest has lapsed. The facts which are admitted are that between 1854 and 1877 there was in a district of Glasgow known as the Wynds a church known as the Wynd Mission. The deceased and her father took an active interest in this. Between 1875 and 1880 there was a migration of a large part of the population of the Wynd district, owing to the demolition of property. The Free Church Presbytery of Glasgow thereupon transferred, in the year 1877, the Wynd Church, with its minister, kirk-session, deacons' court, congregation and missionary agencies to its present site in Crown Street in the south side of Glasgow. It is stated that a large number of people displaced from the Wynds migrated to this district, which was very similar in character. The new church then erected was called the Wynd Church, and the deceased continued to take an active interest in its work, which embraced missionary work in the original locality. A letter is produced, No. 12 of process, dated 9th January 1889, which is of great importance. It was written by the deceased, and is addressed to the Rev. John Riddell, the minister of the Wynd Church, enclosing the sum of £10, with kindest and best wishes for "The Wynd Mission." This letter, it will be observed, was dated the year before her trust disposition and settlement. In a letter dated 6th September 1889, No. 13 of process, also addressed to Mr Riddell, the deceased along with her late sister sent a further sum of £5 as a contribution to the opening collection of the New Wynd Church. In the early part of 1890 the deceased called on Mr Riddell and made personal inquiries with regard to the working and success of the new Wynd Church. On 20th July 1895 she enclosed to him the sum of £2 towards a new manse.

Outer House. Lord Mackenzie.

M'Grouther's Trustees v. Lord Advocate and Others.

These facts are quite sufficient to satisfy me of the identity of the claimants. There are now no competing claimants who say they represent the original Mission to the Wynds. I am therefore of opinion that their claim should be sustained.

The question next arises, What is to become of the lapsed legacy of £1000 above referred to? It is contended, on the one hand, that its amount must go in terms of the will to increase the amount of the specific pecuniary legacies. It is contended, on the other hand, that it falls into intestacy, and it is claimed by the Crown as ultimus hæres. The answer to this question depends upon the construction put upon the clause which is printed in Condescendence 6. If this is to be read as a proper residue clause, then I think the amount of any specific pecuniary bequest which failed from whatever cause would fall under its operation. I am of opinion that it should be construed as a proper residue clause. The matter may be tested with reference to a pecuniary bequest to an individual. I see there is a bequest by the deceased to her coachman of £200. Suppose the coachman had predeceased the testatrix, is it to be supposed that she, in that event, contemplated that the legacy would fall into intestacy? Yet that would be one of "the said pecuniary legacies" referred to in the clause in question. In the case of this specific bequest failing owing to predecease the amount would, I think, just be residue which would go to increase the amount of the other legacies. In the same way I am of opinion the Rio Janeiro legacy of £1000 which has lapsed because it is void from uncertainty, falls in the same way to be dealt with as part of the residue of the estate and distributed in the same manner. What has lapsed is not a share of residue but a specific bequest.

I am accordingly of opinion: (1) That those representing the Wynd Church should be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim; (2) that it should be found that the bequest of £1000 for chatitable or religious purposes connected with Rio Janeiro is void from uncertainty and should be divided among those entitled to the pecuniary legacies in proportion to the amounts of their respective legacies.—12*th December* 1907.

Workmen's Compensation — Workman's Option—Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1, subsect. 2 (B) — Parties Dealing on Equal Terms — Acceptance of Payments Practically Equal in Amount to what Act Would Have Allowed — Circumstances in which Held That Workman Had Elected to Take Rights Under Act.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

The Pursuer reclaimed and argued: The Lord Ordinary was wrong in holding that the pursuer was now barred from suing for his remedy at common law. What had to be proved against him to establish bar was that he had finally and irrevocably exercised his option in choosing compensation under the Act. This had not been proved. There was no proof of any agreement between the parties, and the receipts founded on only constituted prima facie evidence of election (Little, 1900, 2 F. 387; Fowler, 1903, 5 F. 394; Valenti, 1907, S.C. 695), and this evidence might be rebutted by other facts and circumstances of the case. Such facts and circumstances were brought out in the proof. The number of payments and of receipts were immaterial when the agreement was in dispute.

Argued for Respondent: It must be held that the workman had elected to receive compensation under the Act. The essential feature was the payment and acceptance of money (sect. 1) upon one or other footing—this was the strongest evidence of election. Evidence of the making of a claim was of minor importance. Granted that the making or unsuccessful prosecution of a claim was not a bar to an action at common law (M'Donald v. Dunlop & Co., 1900, 7 F. 533; Rouse v. Dickson [1904], 2 K.B. 628), things had been carried further here by the making and acceptance of a series of payments. It had been held in England that such a course of payments may excuse the workman from making a claim within six months (Wright v. Bagnall [1900], 2 Q.B. 240). A claim for compensation need not be formally made (Powell v. Main Colliery Co. [1900], Ap. Cas. 366). All that it was necessary for the reclaimer to prove was that the payments had been made and accepted on the footing that they were under the Act. It was not necessary to prove in the respondent knowledge of the exclusion of another possible remedy, or of the nature of that remedy in law, or the extent of its value in money. The latter proposition resulted from the principle of ignorantia juris. The case of Little was precisely in point. In the case of Fowler only one receipt had been granted, but the opinion was expressed that a series of receipts would raise an inference other to that drawn in that case (per Lord Young, at p. 399). The case of Valenti was peculiar, and in the judgment in that case care was taken to exclude a case such as the present from the scope of its authority (per Lord Low, at p. 700).

The Court adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against.

The Lord President.—My Lords, this is an action at the instance of a workman against his employers for damages at common law in respect of an injury which he received while working in their employment.

The preliminary answer is made that the workman has accepted compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that under the provisions of sect. 1, subsect. 2 (b), he cannot now claim at common law. The Lord Ordinary has given effect to that contention, and dismissed the action.

The facts on which this plea is based are that for a long period a sum of 18s. a week was admittedly paid to the pursuer and accepted. Parties, however, are not at one as to the footing on which these payments were made and received. The case so far differs from those of Valenti, 1907, S.C. 695; Fowler, 1903, 5 F. 394; and Little, 1900, 2 F. 387, which were cited to us, in that there is here no written receipt, and indeed no writing at all to which appeal can be made. I am of opinion, however, that the fact of there being no written receipt is by no means conclusive. After all, a receipt is no more than a piece of evidence, and though a receipt bearing to be in respect of sums paid under the Workmen's Compensation Act would be very difficult to get over, it is of value as an item of evidence and nothing else.

But I think the question before us is a question of fact, and fact alone. The Lord Ordinary, who saw the witnesses and considered the whole circumstances, has found that the pursuer accepted the payments as compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, and I am not prepared to disagree with his determination. I do not propose to say more, because I look on this case as raising solely a question of fact. I am content to say that I agree with the Lord Ordinary's view that the payments in question were made and accepted as compensation under the Act.

Lord M'Laren.—I have come to the same conclusion. I think it must be taken as matter of common knowledge among persons in the class of life of the pursuer that a claim of damages founded on fault is a claim for a single payment. It follows, I think, that when a person having such a claim has accepted weekly payments for many weeks—unless he has taken them as charity, and there is no suggestion of that here—he may be presumed to have accepted these as payments under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the only law which creates an obligation to make compensation by means of weekly payments. Very clear evidence would be required to displace that presumption, and I fail to see anything in the evidence here antagonistic to the plain inference that follows the acceptance of weekly payments.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair.

Lord Pearson.—I also agree.—21*st November* 1907.

COMPANY — LIQUIDATION — PETITION BY CREDITOR FOR COMPULSORY WINDING UP BY COURT—COMPETING PETITION BY COMPANY FOR VOLUNTARY WINDING UP UNDER SUPERVISION —CLAIM OF PETITIONING CREDITOR SETTLED AND PETITION DEPARTED FROM—APPLICATION BY ANOTHER CREDITOR TO BE SISTED AS PETITIONER TO INSIST ON PETITION FOR COMPULSORY WINDING UP GRANTED.

Note in the Liquidation of Scott Stirling & Co. Ltd.

A petition under the Companies Acts for the winding up by the Court of Scott Stirling & Co. Ltd. was presented by Hudson & Cairns Ltd., creditors of the Company. The Company subsequently passed a resolution for voluntary liquidation, and applied to the Court for a supervision order.

This Note was presented by the Tudor Accumulator Co. Ltd., also creditors of the Company, in which they set forth that an arrangement had been come to between the Company and Hudson & Cairns Ltd. under which the latter had discharged the debts due to them by the Company, and that Hudson & Cairns Ltd. did not intend to proceed in their petition. The Tudor Accumlator Co. accordingly prayed to be sisted as petitioners along with or in place of the said Hudson & Cairns Ltd., to insist in the said petition for compulsory winding up. Answers were lodged for the Company, in which they submitted, inter alia, that the note was not competent.

Counsel for the Tudor Co. argued that the sist craved in the note was competent, and referred to the analogy of proceedings under the Bankruptcy Acts, and to the Rule of Court in England, General Rules March 1893, which provided for such a proceeding (Buckley, p. 972).

The Company did not oppose the application, which the Court granted.—19*th December* 1907.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Perthshire.

Archibald Clark, a grazier and hogg merchant, being in embarrassed circumstances, granted a trust deed for behoof of his creditors in favour of Thomas Logan, the pursuer, and of a certain Mr Davidson, both being solicitors in Perth. The terms of the trust deed, so far as involving the present decision, are summarised in the Sheriff-Substitute's note infra. Mr Davidson died, and the pursuer, the sole surviving trustee, with the consent and concurrence of Clark, raised this action for the recovery of certain sums alleged to be due by the defender to Clark, under a contract for the wintering of some hoggs.

The defender pleaded, inter alia: "No title to sue."

The Sheriff-Substitute (Sym) sustained this plea. The note to his interlocutor is in these terms:—

Archibald Clark, a grazier, whose affairs had become embarrassed, granted a trust deed on behoof of creditors to and in favour of Thomas Logan and W. S. Davidson. The deed, which is a printed form, intended for the appointment of a single trustee, has been in part, but only in part, altered, so as to suit the case of two trustees, and after the nomination of the two trustees it bears and "to his assignees." It is unnecessary to go over the clauses, which are in the usual form, but it may be mentioned that by a marginal addition power is given to the trustees to apply for sequestration on the grantor's estate.

1st Div.

Logan v. M'Rostie.

Now Mr Davidson died before the institution of this action, which has been brought by Mr Logan as trustee on the trust estate with the consent and concurrence of Clark, the debtor, against a Mr M'Rostie, as being indebted to Clark for the cost of wintering certain hoggs. The plea in law under consideration raises the question whether there is survivorship under such a conveyance. It is the common practice in trusts for creditors to appoint a single trustee. Where more than one is to be appointed, the Juridical Styles suggest that the disposition is to be "to B and C, and the survivor of them, whom failing to such person or persons as shall be appointed in manner after mentioned," etc. (See also Wood's Lectures, p. 381.) But of course this is a prudent style only, and does not settle the question whether the conveyance is joint in the strict sense or whether survivorship is implied. In the case of Dawson v. Stirton, 1863, 2 M. 196, the conveyance was to and in favour of Andrew Stirton and Alexander Duncan as trustees for creditors, and one of them having died, Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis remarked with regard to the other, that "the character of surviving trustee for behoof of creditors is not created by that deed at all. The trust created is a joint trust to Duncan and Stirton, and the moment that one of them dies the trust is absolutely at an end." This opinion has been criticised, and doubt has been thrown upon it on the ground that the authorities on the subject had not been quoted to the Court, and it has been suggested that if they had been so quoted, the Lord Justice-Clerk would not have held the appointment to be strictly joint, and therefore to have fallen by the death of one. The Sheriff-Substitute has examined the authorities, referring to some which are not quoted on either side, and is of opinion that that great lawyer did not fall into any misapprehension, and that, had the authorities been quoted, he would have said that there is a distinction between the case of a trust deed inter vivos and the case of a trust deed of a testamentary kind in this matter. Some such differences are, of course, easily pointed out, and do not at first sight strike the mind as being important. But if the institutional writers and authorities from the time of Lord Stair, and including Erskine and Bell, as well as sundry decisions, be studied, it will be found that in a testamentary trust it has always been held that a nomination will not be regarded as simply joint unless that be expressed. That is for the reason which Lord Stair explains in the passage I. 12, 13. And on the other hand, where that reason does not exist, words which import a joint nomination are so read without it being thought necessary to import an implication of survivorship. The principle of the decisions which have held that survivorship is to be implied in testamentary trusts is well seen in the short report of the case of Findlay, 1855, 17 D. 1014.

The Sheriff-Substitute is therefore prepared to follow the dictum in the case of Dawson v. Stirton. It gives the natural legal meaning to the language employed, which imports that the trust is confided to the two persons nominated, and not to one of them alone. The theory, of course, is that the truster would not have put his affairs under the control of one of them only, but intended those acts only to be valid which were done by both. It is unnecessary, and may even be inexpedient, to seek to exhaust the reasons for this, but in illustration it may be said that it may very well be that the truster, or the creditors or some of the creditors, may have had strong reasons for stipulating that the management of the insolvent estate should rest with two persons and have the force of their decision.

It is suggested that, even if the trust have fallen by the death of one trustee, the difficulty is cured because Clark, the debtor and truster, has still the radical right in his estate, and this action is brought with his concurrence. It is thought that this does not get over the difficulty. It was shrewdly remarked by Mr Campbell that on this theory Clark ought to be the pursuer, and that he might have taken Mr Logan with him as consenter for what his consent is worth, but that it will not do to make Mr Logan as trustee for creditors the pursuer of the action (Hislop, 1881 8 R. (H.L.) 95).

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff.

The argument to the Sheriff and also that to the Inner House appears sufficiently from the judgments which follow.

The following provisions of the Trusts Acts were referred to in argument:—

Trusts (Scotland) Act 1861, sect. 1.—All trusts constituted by virtue of any deed or local Act of Parliament under which gratuitous trustees are nominated shall be held to include the following provisions, unless the contrary be expressed; that is to say, power to any trustee so nominated to resign office of trustee; power to such trustee if there be only one, or to the trustees so nominated, or a quorum of them, to assume new trustees; . . . .

Trusts (Scotland) Act 1867, sect. 12.—When trustees cannot be assumed under any trust deed, or when any person who is the sole trustee acting under any such trust deed has become insane, or incapable of acting by reason of physical or mental disability, the Court may, upon the application of any party having interest in the trust estate . . . . appoint a trustee or trustees under such trust deed . . . .

Trusts (Scotland) Amendment Act 1884, sect. 2.—"Trust" shall mean and include any trust constituted by any deed or other writing, or by private or local Act of Parliament, or by resolution of any corporation or public or ecclesiastical body, and the appointment of any tutor, curator or judicial factor by deed, decree or otherwise.

The Sheriff (Johnston) affirmed the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor.

Note.—I reach with reluctance the same conclusion as the Sheriff-Substitute upon the case at common law. The dicta in the case of Dawson v. Stirton, 1863, 2 M. 196, have been quoted for forty years as establishing the proposition that a nomination of trustees in a trust deed for creditors is joint, and that the appointment falls when one of the trustees fails, and I think that these dicta are binding in the Sheriff Court. There is force in the pursuer's contention that if the powers to assume new trustees and act by a quorum contained in sect. 1 of the Trusts Act of 1861 be read into this trust deed, this displaces the rule, because the rule being based upon presumed intention, the conferring of such powers may reasonably be held to shift the presumption as being indicative that it was not regarded as vital that the trust should be administered by both the two trustees named and by nobody else. I doubt, however, whether it is warrantable in the Sheriff Court to treat a well-established rule of law as displaced by such an implication. Further, it is doubtful whether sect. 1 of the Act of 1861 applies to such a trust as the present. The matter has been treated as an open one by more than one commentator. It seems to stand thus—the Act of 1867 deals with trusts generally, without specifying that its application is limited to trusts where the trustees act gratuitously. In the case of Mackenzie, 1872, 10 M. 749, it was held (apparently with some difficulty) that the Act is so limited owing to its relationship to the Act of 1861. The Act of 1884 defines trusts for the purposes of the Trusts Acts generally, and it makes the word "trustee" to include certain officers who do not act gratuitously. It provides, further, that the Trusts Acts 1861 to 1884 are to be read as one Act. Now in the case of the Royal Bank, 1893, 20 R. 741, it was held that this is sufficient to get rid of the inferential limitation to gratuitous trusts in the Act of 1867 when that Act speaks of trustees and trusts without qualification. But sect. 1 of the Act of 1861 deals specifically with "trusts under which gratuitous trustees are nominated." It is not clear that reading into the Act of 1861 the definition of a trust in the Act of 1887, it becomes necessary to read the words "under which gratuitous trustees are nominated" out of the Act of 1861. The question is a narrow one which might be decided either way without obvious error.

The present case stands thus. There is a judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute, the affirmance of which enables the pursuer to take the case to the Court of Session without the expense of further procedure, and does not deprive the interest which he represents of another remedy if he does not think fit to take that course. On the other hand, a reversal of the Sheriff-Substitute's judgment infers (1) the disturbance of a hitherto recognised rule of law upon the strength of inferential deductions from statutory provisions not framed with any direct reference to that rule; (2) the decision in pursuer's favour of what has hitherto been regarded as a narrow question of statutory construction as to the intended application of the Act of 1861; (3) the probability of further procedure and a proof in the Sheriff Court which may be rendered nugatory by a decision of the Court of Session that the pursuer has no title to sue.

In these circumstances I conceive it to be my duty to affirm the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor, not being clearly satisfied that the result at which he has arrived is erroneous in law.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session.

The Court sustained the appeal and remitted the cause to the Sheriff Court for further procedure.

The Lord President.—I think that this case is exceedingly clear on the statute, although there is a difficult point that might arise at common law which, however, we are not called upon to decide. The facts are that a certain gentleman granted a trust deed for behoof of his creditors in which he appointed two trustees, but there was no survivorship clause in the trust deed. One of these trustees has died, and the other trustee, with the consent of the truster, now sues for a debt due to the truster. The plea taken by the defender is the plea of no title to sue, and that plea has been upheld by the Sheriff-Substitute, and affirmed, though with obvious hesitation and dislike, by the Sheriff, on the ground that where a trust for behoof of creditors is created in favour of joint trustees and one of them dies, the trust thereupon falls. At common law that situation presents a very difficult question, but I think upon the statutes it is clear. By the Act of 1861 undoubtedly a title was given to a trustee in this position, but that Act was limited by the expression in the first section to those classes of trust deeds under which gratuitous trustees were appointed. Then came the Act of 1867, and the Act of 1867 probably, in the eyes of its authors, was really meant to extend the scope of the beneficial legislation of 1861 to trusts of a wider class, but unfortunately there was a very slovenly definition clause which one cannot help thinking had not the effect which its authors wished. Among the clauses of the Act of 1867 was a certain clause 12, which provided that when any trustees cannot be assumed under any trust deed application should be made to the Court. Now, shortly after that a case was brought in this Court—the case of Mackenzie, 1872, 10 Macph. 749—where application was made under that section in the case of a trust where the trustees were not gratuitous. The Court there held that although the word trust in sect. 12 was unqualified in that section, yet it was qualified when you took the two statutes of 1861 and 1867 together, and that consequently the application could not be granted. The plain meaning of that was that upon the true construction of sect. 12 of the Act of 1867 you really had to read "trust" as if it repeated the qualification of "trust" given in the Act of 1861—namely, not all trusts, but only trusts such as are constituted by virtue of any deed or local Act of Parliament under which gratuitous trustees are nominated. Then came the Act of 1884, and in the Act of 1884 there was a definition of "trust" in a much wider sense. There was a provision that all Trust Acts should be read together, and there was not repeated the bungle that had been committed in the Act of 1867. Accordingly, shortly after the Act of 1884, there came the case of the Royal Bank, 1893, 20 R. 741. The Royal Bank case exactly repeated the application which had been made in the Mackenzie case, but with an entirely opposite result, because the Court in that case held that the Act of 1884 succeeded in enacting what the Act of 1867 did not; in other words, the Act of 1884 by means of its general definition read back the word "trust" in the general sense, and took away the qualification of the Act of 1861. That seems to me to settle the matter, because if that qualification is read out, then we have the permissive provision of sect. 1 of the Act of 1861 applied, not to trusts qualified as they were qualified in that section by the words which I have read, but to trusts amplified by the larger definition of the Act of 1884. Accordingly I think that that ends the matter. I am therefore for allowing the appeal and remitting the case to proceed upon the merits.

1ST DIV. Logan v. M'Rostie. The Lord President.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree. I think the case of the Royal Bank is directly in point.

CAP. 71), SECT. 14 (1)—ISSUES APPROVED BY LORD ORDINARY—DISCRETION OF LORD ORDINARY—PROOF BEFORE ANSWER ALLOWED.

Reclaiming Note against Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

This was an action brought by Mrs Edith Worton or Govan, Normanhurst, Helensburgh, against J. & W. M'Killop, restaurateurs, Grosvenor Restaurant, Glasgow, for damages for the death of her husband, which the pursuer averred resulted from ptomaine poisoning, caused by his partaking of soup supplied to him in the defenders' restaurant. The averments of the pursuer and the statutory enactments referred to sufficiently appear from the previous report.

On 14th November 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen) approved of two issues for the trial of the cause. The terms of the issues are given in the previous report. For the purposes of the present report it is sufficient to state that the first issue was laid on breach of a contract for the supply of food between the pursuer's husband and the defenders, and the second was laid on the fault of the defenders.

The Defender reclaimed and argued: The contract averred was a contract between the pursuer's husband and the defenders. The only damage averred had been sustained, not by the pursuer but by her husband. The pursuer, therefore, was not entitled to sue for damages for breach of a contract to which she was not a party (Greenhorn v. Addie, 1855, 17 D. 860; Eisten v. North British Railway Co., 1870, 8 M. 980). Further, the contract was not a contract of sale (Sale of Goods Act 1893, 56 & 57 Vict. cap. 71, sect. 1), and sect. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act did not apply. The contract was truly a contract of board, where there was no implied warranty. Accordingly, the first issue, being laid solely on contract, should be disallowed. Alternatively, if the question of breach of contract were to be left open, the case was not suitable for jury trial, and a proof before answer should be allowed (Stocks v. Holstein, 1907, 15 S.L.T. 339).

Argued for Pursuer: The contract averred was a sale. There was an order for specific goods and a fixed price. There was therefore an implied warranty under sect. 14 (1) of the Sale of Goods Act (Wallis v. Russell [1902], 2 I.R. 585; Frost v. Aylesbury Dairy Co. Ltd. [1905], 1. K.B. 608). Alternatively, there was a contract for the supply of soup, and an implied warranty that the soup should be fit for consumption. The pursuer was entitled to found on the contract. The case ought to be sent to a jury. The second issue plainly raised a case appropriated to jury trial, and cases of breach of contract were suitable for jury trial where the breach resulted in personal injury or where the damage was of indefinite amount (Willison v. Petherbridge, 1893, 20 R. 976; Johnston v. Hughan, 1894, 21 R. 777). The Lord Ordinary's discretion should not be interfered with (Edinburgh Railway Access and Property Co. v. John Ritchie & Co., 1903, 5 F. 299).

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, and (diss. Lord Ardwall) allowed a proof before answer, and found the expenses of the appeal to be expenses in the cause.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case is a very peculiar one, in respect that the pursuer, being the widow of a gentleman who is said to have died of ptomaine poisoning, sues on two grounds: first, breach of contract, in respect that the defenders being public caterers, supplied the deceased under a contract for supply of food with an article not fit for human food and thus not fulfilling the contract, and thereby caused his death by poisoning. Upon this ground, based solely on contract, she has asked and obtained from the Lord Ordinary an issue. Further, she maintains that the defenders were guilty of culpable negligence in supplying poisonous food, and she has obtained a second issue in ordinary form on the ground of fault.

A very powerful argument was addressed to the Court against the allowance of the first issue, and I confess it impressed me strongly; and if it were necessary at this stage absolutely to decide upon that part of the case by refusing or allowing an issue, I should find the obstacles to allowing such an issue to be very formidable.

But the case being very exceptional, it is a question whether it is not a case as to which the Court should exercise their discretion by allowing a proof before answer upon the whole case, and the defenders saying that they assent to that course, I am in favour of taking it. I keep quite in view the generally accepted rule that the discretion of the Lord Ordinary as to the mode of proof shall not be interfered with. But that rule is a general rule only, and is not to be pressed in the direction of absolute exclusion of the discretion of the Inner House. This seems to me to be a case where our discretion should be exercised, and I move your Lordships to recal the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor to allow a proof before answer, and to remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

Lords Stormonth-Darling and Low concurred.

Lord Ardwall.—I have the misfortune to differ from your Lordships as to the procedure which ought to be adopted in this case.

This is an action brought by Mrs Edith Worton or Govan, widow of Alexander Govan, for damages in respect of his death, which she alleges was caused by his partaking of poisonous lobster soup supplied to him by the defenders at the Grosvenor Restaurant in Glasgow. It is not brought by her as executrix of her husband, but simply in her personal capacity as widow of the deceased.

The action is laid upon two grounds: first, contract; and second, fault or negligence, and the Lord Ordinary has allowed two issues, the first being truly an issue laid upon breach of contract and the other an issue laid upon fault.

The pursuer alleges that the supplying of soup to the deceased in return for a price was a contract for sale of a corporeal moveable within the meaning of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, and that under sect. 14 (1) of that Act the defenders must be held to have warranted the supply of soup to be fit for consumption as food, and that it not having been so they were in breach of the warranty implied by that section. Alternatively the pursuer submitted in argument, though there seems to be no foundation for it on record, that assuming the contract between the pursuer's husband and the defenders not having been one of sale, it was one of which it was an implied condition that the food supplied by the defenders should be good and wholesome food.

If it were necessary to enter on the question whether the contract alleged was a sale of goods within the meaning of the said Act or was a contract of some other description, I am of opinion that it would be necessary to have a proof on the whole facts relating to the alleged contract to enable the Court to determine whether it was or was not truly a contract for the sale of goods, and that such proof would require to be a proof before answer before a judge.

But it was pleaded for the defenders in support of their first plea in law that there are no averments on record relevant to support the action upon contract at the pursuer's instance, because it is not alleged that the pursuer is the person who entered into the contract with the defenders for the purchase of the plate of soup in question, or that she had any jus quæsitum in such contract, and that accordingly there is no relevant ground stated to entitle her to an issue for breach of the alleged contract.

I am of opinion that this objection to the action is well founded. It is trite law that no person is entitled to sue on a contract but one who is either a party to it or has some jus quæsitum under it, or has acquired right to it validly by assignation. There are two cases in which this point was recently considered by the Court—the cases of Cameron v. Young, 1907, S.C. p. 475, and Kennedy v. Bruce, 1907, S.C. 845. I may refer also to the case of Cavalier v. Pope [1906], A.C. 428, in which a wife unsuccessfully attempted to sue upon a contract entered into by her husband.

I am accordingly of opinion that so far as the action is laid upon contract the defender's first plea in law should be sustained and that the first issue granted by the Lord Ordinary should be disallowed.

I am of opinion, however, that there is a relevant averment to the effect that the death of the pursuer's husband was caused through the fault of the defenders, and that the case should be sent to trial by a jury upon that issue. I think, however, that if the case were to be sent to a jury the second issue would require amendment. It is unnecessary for me, however, to enter on this in view of the course your Lordships propose should be followed. I think this is an action well suited for the determination of a jury, and that there is no good reason for not now getting rid of a part of the case which is plainly irrelevant.—20th December 1907.

Lietke's Trustees v. Graham.

SECOND DIVISION.

255. Lietke's Trustees v. Graham.

SUCCESSION—WILL—TRUST—ADMINISTRATION—APPOINTMENT OF TRUSTEES AS TUTORS AND CURATORS TO MINOR BENEFICIARIES—DIRECTION TO HOLD, APPLY, PAY AND CONVEY TO AND FOR BEHOOF OF CHILDREN OF TESTATRIX, AND FAILING CHILDREN, FOR CONDITIONAL INSTITUTES—VESTED FEE IN CONDITIONAL INSTITUTES—CONDITIONAL INSTITUTES IN PUPILLARITY—HELD TRUSTEES NOT ENTITLED TO HOLD TRUST ESTATE DURING MINORITY OF BENEFICIARIES, AND TRUST ESTATE PAID OVER TO FATHERS OF BENEFICIARIES AS THEIR TUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS-IN-LAW.

Special Case.

The late Mrs Margaret Bell Graham or Lietke, 34 Cranworth Street, Hillhead, Glasgow, died on 23rd July 1906, leaving a trust disposition and settlement whereby she conveyed her whole estate to trustees.

The said trustees were the first parties to the special case. The second parties were Robert Graham, lithographer in Paisley, and David Patrick Donald, engineer in Johnstone, as tutors and administrators-in-law for their respective pupil children.

The trust disposition and settlement provided:

I appoint my trustees, and the survivors and acceptors and survivor and acceptor of them (with quorum as aforesaid), to be my sole executors and executor, and also to be tutors and curators and tutor and curator to such of the beneficiaries under these presents, or any codicil thereto, as may be in pupillarity or minority at and after my decease: But these presents are granted in trust always for the ends, uses, and purposes following, viz. . . . . (Fourth), In the event of my husband predeceasing me, I direct my trustees to hold, apply, pay and convey the said share of my father's estate destined to me as aforesaid, and the residue of my estate, to and for behoof of and equally among the children of our marriage, and failing issue of our marriage, to and for behoof of and equally between the children of my said brother Robert Graham and the children of my said sister Ann Andrews Graham or Donald, the division being per stirpes: Declaring that the shares of my children shall become vested interests in their persons respectively at and only upon their attaining majority, and that if any of them shall predecease said period of vesting leaving issue, such issue shall succeed equally among them, if more than one, to the share their parent would have taken on survivance: And I direct my trustees to apply the annual income and produce of the shares of my estate falling, or prospectively falling, to my children who may be in minority, towards their upbringing, maintenance, or education respectively, or otherwise for their behoof or advantage.

The case stated:

3. The testatrix was survived by two of said trustees, viz. Robert Graham and John Abercrombie, who by minute of 3rd August 1906 appended to said settlement accepted the offices of trustee and executor conferred upon them by said settlement. They did not expressly accept the office of tutor and curator conferred upon them by said settlement, nor have they acted as such.

4. The testatrix was predeceased by her husband, and died without issue. In terms of her said settlement, the whole estate of the testatrix, including that over which she had power of disposal, falls to be divided into two shares, one share thereof going to the child of her brother the said Robert Graham, and the other share going to the children of her sister Ann Andrews Graham or Donald, wife of the said David Patrick Donald. The said Robert Graham has one child, the said Margaret Alexander Graham, aged eleven years. The said Ann Andrews Graham or Donald has two children, the said Graham Donald, aged ten years, and Andrew Patrick Donald, aged seven years.

The first parties maintained that they were bound to hold the estate until the fiars respectively attained majority. The second parties maintained that they were entitled to immediate payment of the trust estate as tutors and administrators-in-law to their respective children.

The Questions of Law were as follows:—

1. Are the first parties, having accepted the office of trustees and executors foresaid, bound to act as tutors and curators under the said trust disposition and settlement, or to administer the estate until the beneficiaries respectively attain majority?
2. In the event of the first question being answered in the negative, are the second parties entitled, as tutors and administrators-in-law for their respective children, to immediate payment of (a) the capital of the shares falling to their children, or (b) of only the income of said shares?

Argued for the First Parties: No doubt the nomination of tutors and curators was competent only if there was a continuing trust (Fraser, Parent and Child, 3rd edition, p. 240). But here the trustees were directed to hold the fund. They were therefore bound to hold until the beneficiaries attained majority (Johnston v. Johnston's Trs., 1892, 20 R. 46, per Lord Young). The doctrine of Miller's Trs. v. Miller (1890, 18 R. 301) did not apply where the beneficiaries were in minority. It was immaterial that the trustees had not accepted office as tutors or curators (Hill v. City of Glasgow Bank, 1879, 7 R. 68, per L. P. Inglis at p. 76). Counsel also cited Dumbreck v. Stevenson, 1861, 4 Macq. 86.

Argued for the Second Parties: There was no continuing trust. The direction to hold applied only to the children of the testatrix, not to the present beneficiaries. The appointment of tutors and curators was therefore inept (Bell's Prin., sect. 2071). It followed that the second parties were entitled to immediate payment.

The Court answered the first question in the negative and the second question (branch a) in the affirmative.

Lord Low.—The deceased Mrs Lietke by her trust disposition and settlement conveyed her whole means and estate to trustees, and further appointed them to be tutors and curators to such of the beneficiaries as might be in pupillarity or minority after her decease. The question in this case is whether any, and if so what, effect falls to be given to that appointment in the circumstances which have occurred?

In order to answer that question it is necessary to see what precisely were the provisions of the settlement.

After the usual clause for payment of debts the testatrix directed her trustees, in the second place, in the event of her husband surviving her, to hold, apply, pay and convey a certain part of her estate for behoof of her husband in liferent and for the children of the marriage, equally among them in fee; and she declared that the shares of the children were to vest only upon their attaining majority, and that if any of them should predecease the period of vesting leaving issue, such issue should succeed equally among them, if more than one, to the share their parent would have taken on survivance. Then, in the third place, she directed her trustees to pay and convey to her husband, in the event of his surviving her, the residue of her estate in absolute property.

The fourth purpose deals with the event, which happened, of the testatrix being predeceased by her husband. In that event she directed her trustees to "hold, apply, pay and convey" her whole estate to and for behoof of and equally among the children of the marriage; and she repeated, in the same terms as those which I have quoted, the declaration in regard to the vesting of the shares in her children and the right of the issue of children predeceasing the period of vesting. Further, she empowered her trustees to apply so much of the capital of the shares prospectively falling to her children who might be in minority as they might, in their sole discretion, consider necessary for their upbringing, maintenance or education, or otherwise for their behoof or advantage.

Now if the testatrix had been survived by children, there would have been ample room for the operation of the nomination of the trustees as tutors and curators, because in that case there would have been a continuing trust with large discretionary powers to be exercised for the benefit of the children. In the case therefore of there being children of the testatrix the appointment of the trustees as tutors and curators would have been quite appropriate. As it happened, however, there were no children of the marriage, and to provide for that event, and in the event (which also happened) of her husband predeceasing her, the testatrix directed her trustees "to hold, apply, pay and convey" her whole estate "to and for behoof of and equally among the children of a brother and a sister, the division being per stirpes." That is the sole direction in the settlement applicable to the events which have happened, nothing being said in regard to the period of vesting or payment, and no discretionary powers being conferred upon the trustees.

It is plain, and is not disputed, that according to the natural meaning of the language used the trust estate (after payment of debts) vested in the children of the brother and sister a morte testatoris, and that the term of payment was not postponed. These children, however, are all in pupillarity, and the question is whether the trustees can be required to pay the estate to the fathers of the children as their administrators in law, or are bound, by virtue of their appointment as tutors and curators to such beneficiaries as may be in pupillarity or minority, to hold and administer the estate until the children attain majority?

I am of opinion that the trustees are not entitled to hold the estate. It seems to me that there is no room, in the events which have happened, for the exercise of tutorial or curatorial powers by the trustees. It was argued that the appointment of the trustees to be tutors and curators implied that they should hold the estate during the minority of beneficiaries, or, in other words, that the constitution of a continuing trust should be spelt out of the appointment. I do not think that that is a sound view. In the first place, the settlement shows that when the testatrix intended that there should be a continuing trust she said so in explicit terms; and in the second place, I think that the appointment of the trustees to be tutors and curators is sufficiently satisfied by regarding it as being intended to apply only in the event of the testatrix being survived by children of the marriage.

I am therefore of opinion that the first question should be answered in the negative, and branch (a) of the second question in the affirmative. If that be done the remaining questions seem to be superseded.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I agree. There is a broad distinction between the provisions of this will in the event of the testatrix having children of her own and in the event (which happened) of her being survived only by nephews and nieces. In the latter case there is no continuing trust as there is in the case of children of her own; and the nomination of the trustees to be tutors and curators, which in terms applies to all the beneficiaries, has no significance as regards nephews and nieces, and does not invest the words "hold, apply, pay and convey" with an importance which, apart from such nomination, they would not otherwise have. It is only on that direction to "hold" that the first parties suggest they may have a duty to act as tutors and curators to the minor beneficiaries. They have not accepted office as tutors and curators, but they say they are willing to exercise the office of tutors and curators, if it is thought by the Court that under the will they are bound to do so. I do not think that they are under any such obligation, because they will sufficiently discharge their duty by "paying and conveying" to the natural guardians of the beneficiaries.

Lord Ardwall.—I am of the same opinion. Our decision does not affect the general law laid down in Bell's Principles, sect. 2071. This is a case of trustees who have either declined to accept or failed to act as tutors and curators to certain pupil beneficiaries. A question remains whether they are not bound to act as tutors and curators quoad this particular fund? If this had been a continuing trust, laying on the trustees duties stretching over a period of years, until these children attained majority, then I should have been disposed to hold that the duties of the offices of tutor and curator attached to the trustees as regards these particular funds. But there is no case of that kind here. There is no continuing trust. The funds are vested in and payable to the beneficiaries now. I am therefore of opinion that the natural guardians of the pupil beneficiaries—in this case their fathers—are entitled to payment now of the funds which are vested in these beneficiaries, and that the trustees are in safety to make such payment.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Dundas.

The pursuer reclaimed.

The facts of this case and the arguments of parties are fully set forth in the previous report.

The Court adhered.

The Lord President.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has given a very careful judgment, with which I entirely agree. I have very little to add except this, that it is quite clear that the provisions of the Personal Diligence Act have nothing to do with the Small Debt Acts. The Small Debt Acts form a code by themselves. When you come to consider what took place in this case it is clear that the pursuer was not left in any doubt as to the diligence to be used against him or put to any hardship, and accordingly, for the reasons which the Lord Ordinary has given, I think it is out of the question that he should be allowed to proceed in an action of damages.

Lord M'Laren.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the words "all lawful execution" in a case of this kind do include imprisonment, for it has been laid down by an eminent judge in expounding the Debtors Act that unless imprisonment were retained to enforce a decree ad factum præstandum there would be no other method of enforcing such a decree. I am therefore of opinion that the present proceedings have been quite in accordance with the Small Debt Act and the amending statutes.

Process—Instance—Action by Separate Pursuers on Separate Claims of Debt—Action by Curators for Recovery of Sums Overpaid to Ward During Minority and by Law Agent for Sums Advanced Subsequent to Majority—Action Held Incompetent—Case Continued to Allow Pursuers' Counsel to Tender Minute of Amendment.

In this action the curators and the law agent of the defender, Miss Brown, sought to recover from her certain sums which they averred had been advanced to her in excess of those due by them in their respective capacities. The curators' claim was in respect of sums advanced to her during her minority in excess of the income of the trust funds which they administered on her behalf, the law agent's was in respect of sums advanced to her after her majority in excess of her income. The defender resisted these claims and pleaded, inter alia, that the action was incompetent, in respect that it was laid at the instance of separate and unconnected pursuers upon separate and independent claims of debt. The facts of the case are fully reported in the Lord Ordinary's note infra.

The Lord Ordinary (Johnston) repelled the above plea.

Lord Johnston.—The late James Brown of Tweedhill, in Berwickshire, left a settlement of a somewhat peculiar character. His estate apparently was so entirely confined to heritage, that, though he appointed certain gentlemen his executors, the only testamentary provision which he made was by creating a burden upon his heritage. His settlement is, in fact, as nearly as circumstances admitted, a proper testament. He had apparently two children—a son, James Brown, junior, and a daughter, Isabella Annie Brown, the latter at any rate, and probably both, being in pupillarity at the date of his death, which occurred on 9th November 1893. He made no testamentary provision for his son James, but left him to succeed to his heritable estate by force of law. The object of his settlement or testament was entirely to provide for his daughter Isabella, and he did so in this manner: He bequeathed to her directly the sum of £2500, payable at majority, when, he declared, "the said provision in her favour shall vest, and which sum I further hereby declare shall form a real lien and burden upon All and Whole the lands and estate of Tweedhill foresaid. . . . And I further declare that said sum shall bear interest at the rate of four per centum per annum from the date of my death during the not payment thereof." While he thus declared the bequest to be payable only on majority and to vest at that date, he also declared that the sum so to be imposed on his heritable estate should bear interest at four per centum from the date of his death. There might therefore be some question whether, notwithstanding the express declaration as to vesting, the bequest in Miss Brown's favour did not vest a morte. But without expressing any opinion on that point, which it is not necessary to decide, I think that the executors were soundly advised in assuming that the testator impliedly intended that the income of the bequest, with regard to which he gave no specific directions, was to be applied during her minority for Miss Brown's behoof. And it has been so applied. The only other matter which Mr Brown's settlement or testament contained is the appointment of Dr John Paxton of Norham-on-Tweed and William Crawford, sheriff clerk of Berwickshire, to be tutors and curators to the testator's son and daughter, "with power to the said tutors and curators to appoint factors for managing the whole means and estate belonging to my said children, with suitable salaries, for whom they shall not be further liable than that they are reputed responsible at the time, and generally to do every act and deed in the management of the affairs of my said children competent to tutors and curators by the law of Scotland, with this provision and declaration always—that the said tutors and curators shall be accountable for their actual intromissions only, and not jointly with one another, and that they shall not be liable for omissions nor be bound to do diligence further than they shall judge necessary," and he appointed the same gentlemen to be his sole executors. As regards the testator's son James, I am doubtful how far the testator was entitled to confer on the tutors and curators-nominate the power to appoint factors, and to limit their liability in the way he did. But as regards his daughter Isabella, as the provision which he was making was entirely gratuitous, he could competently adject to it any conditions which he pleased, and quoad the particular provision in her favour of £2500, she must accept the tutors and curators named, subject to the conditions of their appointment.

Dr Paxton and Mr Crawford accepted office, and appointed James Herriot, solicitor, Duns, their factor.

The history of the administration of the provision for Miss Brown is to be found in a series of accounts of charge and discharge, Nos. 9 to 17 of process, at first between the curators of Miss Brown and Mr Herriot, their factor, and afterwards between Miss Brown herself and Mr Herriot as her law agent, Nos. 9 to 15 of process being between Miss Brown's curators and Mr Herriot, and Nos. 16 and 17 between Miss Brown and Mr Herriot. But though there is this distinction made in the heading of the accounts, owing to the young lady having attained majority at 19th May 1904, the accounts are really consecutive, and carry on the balance due by Miss Brown on the curatorial account into the personal account. There were over-advances made to or on behalf of Miss Brown, both during the later period of the curatory and afterwards. These advances were out of the pocket of Mr Herriot during both periods. The curators and Mr Herriot want now to recover these advances from Miss Brown, and as their accounts and actings are disputed, it has become necessary to clear up matters in court. Had the alleged balance been the other way, the young lady would have sued her curators and Mr Herriot for accounting and payment of the balance due to her; but in the circumstances as they stand, the curators and Mr Herriot can only sue for the amount of the advances they allege, and the accounting arises on Miss Brown's counter-claim. But the action is none the less in substance, though not in form, an action of accounting. I lay stress upon this, because it appears to me materially to affect the question with which I have at present to deal.

The curators and Mr Herriot sue as joint pursuers in the same action. The instance is as follows:—Dr Paxton and Mr Crawford, as tutors and curators nominated by the settlement of the late Mr James Brown of Tweedhill to his daughter, Isabella Annie Brown, "with consent and concurrence of James Herriot, solicitor, Duns, for any interest he may have, and the said James Herriot as an individual,"—Pursuers; against the said Isabella Annie Brown,—Defender. The conclusions, however, are separate: First, to make payment to the pursuers Dr Paxton and Mr Crawford of the sum of £245, 15s., being the alleged balance in their favour on their curatorial intromissions with Miss Brown's income from her father's death in 1893 to her majority in 1904; and second, to make payment to the pursuer Mr Herriot of the sum of £204, 4s. 7d., being the alleged balance on his intromissions as law agent with the young lady's income from the Whitsunday when she attained 1st Div. majority to Whitsunday 1906, when I understand her affairs were taken out of Mr Herriot's hands.

Exton and Others v. Brown.

The defender pleads: "(1) The action is incompetent in respect that it is laid at the instance of separate and unconnected pursuers, upon separate and independent claims of debt."

I asked the defender's counsel whether the defender had any interest to press a plea which, if sustained, and assuming liability to be established, could only be the occasion of increased expense to their client? They candidly admitted, as I think must be apparent, that there was no inconvenience in taking the accounting in this form, but they indicated that the defender had a tactical reason for stating the plea, and they pressed for a judgment. This the defender is entitled to, whatever may be her reasons for stating the plea. The defender's counsel in particular referred me to the recent cases of Killin v. Weir, 1905, 7 F. 526, and Brims & Mackay v. M'Neill & Sime, 1907, 15 S.L.T. 198, and they maintained that these authorities determined that it was only competent to conjoin two or more unconnected persons as pursuers of an action where they have a joint interest in the matter libelled, or have been injured by the same act (Orkney Feuars v. Stewart of Burray, 1741, M. 11,986). The precise terms used by the Court in that case as descriptive of the two classes of cases were "had connection with one another in the matter pursued for," and "being aggrieved by the same act," and the Lord President, in disposing of the case of Killin v. Weir supra, expresses his opinion that all the cases quoted to the Court fall quite distinctly under one or other of these two categories. This may be so as a generalisation, and it was quite sufficient and appropriate for the disposal of the two cases in question, which clearly came under the above descriptions of the two classes of cases. But there are other cases to which it is not so easy to apply the above rule in its generality. In Killin v. Weir supra, four pursuers sued in one action for separate sums of damages, on the allegation that they had each been induced to purchase shares in a mining syndicate by false and fraudulent statements, made to each of them separately, at different times and places, though admittedly of a similar nature. They had neither a joint interest in the matter libelled, nor had they been aggrieved by the same act. But I think that the reason of the decision is not so much any technical rule as practical convenience. It would clearly be extremely inconvenient, as was very fully shewn by the Lord Chancellor in Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan, 4 R. (H.L.) 14, at p. 16, to try four different cases of damages arising out of different circumstances, however much these might be related, in one action. But had the misrepresentations alleged been confined to the contents of a prospectus on which all four pursuers had relied, the inconvenience would have disappeared, and the action would, I think, have been sustained on the analogy of cases of slander, where though two persons cannot conclude jointly and severally for the same sum as damages for the same slander (Fleshers of Dumfries, 10th December 1816, F.C.), they may competently do so for separate sums (Harkes v. Mowat, 24 D. 701).

In Brims & Mackay's case, again, the pursuers, being the parties in right of a dissolved firm, and the new firm which carried on the business in succession, sued an individual and the firm which he afterwards joined for one sum, conjunctly and severally, or otherwise severally. On the media concludendi, into which I need not go, it was apparent that the whole sum could neither be due to both sets of pursuers nor by both sets of defenders. It is therefore at once apparent that decree could not on such a summons be competently pronounced either in favour of the pursuers or against the defenders, nor could it be competently enforced.

A consideration of these two cases leads me to the conclusion that the rule above stated in general terms is based upon two considerations: first, on the consideration of convenience; and second, on the consideration of whether the conclusion can be competently deduced from the media concludendi, and the decree ensuing be competently enforced. In truth, the term incompetency, strictly speaking, is hardly descriptive of all the cases in which the objection to combining pursuers or defenders may be taken. It is truly a question of convenience in some cases, and of competency only in others. If it were not so, I do not think that the case of the Duke of Buccleuch, etc. v. Cowan, etc., above referred to, could have resulted in the decision which was then pronounced. The Lord Chancellor (Cairns) and the other Lords who took part in the decision rest particularly upon the question of convenience, and the Lord Chancellor even goes so far as to say that it is in part a question of the Court's discretion, and he makes a very pertinent reference to the provision for remits ob contingentiam. The general rule above expressed must, I think, when it comes to be applied, be read and applied in the light of the reason or principle upon which it is based.

Now here it is perfectly clear, and is indeed admitted, that it would be eminently convenient to make this consecutive accounting the subject of the same action, and that had two actions been raised, a remit ob contingentiam, and even a conjunction for the purpose of enquiry, would have been appropriate. In these circumstances I should hesitate to throw out the action because it had been commenced in conjunction, unless I felt myself compelled, merely on a theoretical objection. Had Miss Brown been pursuer she could competently and conveniently have called upon her curators and her law agent to account for their several consecutive intromissions in the same action, provided she had a several conclusion against them, and I do not see why it should be less convenient and less competent for them to bring about the same accounting by such an action as the present, in which they each reduce their demand to a several conclusion. The convenience and economy is manifest, and the conclusions follow competently on the media concludendi, and the ensuing decree can, I think, be competently pronounced and enforced.

There is an incidental point which gave me at first some trouble, though from one point of view it supports the conclusion to which I have come. In this matter Mr Herriot is the real creditor, and had I been drawing the summons, I think that I should have sued in his name against (first) Miss Brown and her curators for the period of her minority; and (second) against Miss Brown herself for the period of her majority, in which case there could have been, I think, no doubt about the convenience and competency of the action. But Mr Herriot has gone on the footing that he was the factor of the curators during Miss Brown's minority, and that he is entitled to be kept indemnis by them for advances which were made on their responsibility and on their account, and that they are therefore the proper parties to sue Miss Brown with a view to the adjustment of the curatorial accounts between them and her. Though I do not think that the mode of proceeding is so direct and simple as the one which

I would have adopted, it is, I think, equally consistent with the legal situation; and as the curators sue with consent and concurrence of Mr Herriot for his interest, no question can arise. The case bears to be distinguished from Hislop v. MacRitchie, 1881, 8 R. (H.L.) 95. Mr Herriot's interest throughout the whole period creates indeed such a bond between the two ostensible sets of pursuers that they cannot truly be said to be unconnected. I think that I am entitled to look at the substance of the action, and in so doing I find it one to obtain an accounting with Miss Brown for a consecutive series of intromissions which are consecutive in fact and only broken in theory by her coming of age, and the ultimate interest in which is in Mr Herriot on the one side and Miss Brown on the other. There is every convenience in trying that question of accounting in one action, and having regard to the conclusions, there is no incompetency in entertaining them, and no difficulty in giving effect to the decree which would ensue, whatever the result of the accounting may be.

I shall therefore repel the first plea in law for the defender and appoint her to lodge objections to the accounts Nos. 9 to 17 of process, which the pursuers produce and found upon.

The Defender reclaimed and argued: The rule of law was well established that separate and independent persons could not sue separate and independent claims of debt except where there was some connection between them in the matter sued for, or where they were aggrieved by the same act (Erskine, IV. 1–65; Shand's Practice, pp. 203–204; Orkney Feuars v. Stewart of Burray, 1741, M. 11,986; Killin v. Weir, 1905, 7 F. 526; Brims & Mackay v. M'Neill & Sime, 1907, 15 S.L.T. 198. The respective pursuers here were separate and unconnected, each being sole creditor in the obligation sought to be enforced. The claims of debt were also separate and unconnected both in fact and in law: that of the law agent only began at the date when that of the curators ceased; that of the law agent was founded on contract, that of the curators on their curatorial relation to their ward.

Neither did the case fall within the exception quoted. Had the actions been brought separately the defender could successfully have resisted a remit ob contingentiam (Duke of Atholl v. Robertson, 1869, 8 M. 304; Cowan v. Duke of Buccleuch, 1876, 4 R. (H.L.) 14).

Argued for the Respondents: The matter must be considered from the point of view of public convenience, and not from that of technical rule. There was no suggestion of inconvenience or prejudice to the defender. The case fell within the rule laid down in Duke of Buccleuch, sup. cit., per Lord Blackburn at p. 27; the test of contingentia comes to be that of convenience of procedure. The pursuers here had the necessary connection to fall within the exception to the rule quoted for the defender.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

The Lord President.—In this case the defender, Miss Brown, was, under the settlement of her father, given certain tutors and curators for the period of pupillarity and minority which ensued owing to the death of her father taking place while she was still a pupil. Her fortune consisted of heritable property only, and it became the duty of the tutors and curators to administer that property, to draw the profits therefrom, and to provide for Miss Brown's maintenance. The tutors and curators, who are the first pursuers in this action, appointed a Mr Herriot, a solicitor, to act as their factor, and they fulfilled the office of tutors and curators during the pupillarity and minority of Miss Brown, and in particular they paid over certain monies for her maintenance, and also paid certain sums to her herself. After she became major the practical management of the property remained, as it had been all along, in the hands of Mr Herriot, and from time to time he too made payments to Miss Brown.

Paxton and Others v. Brown.

The Lord President.

Now the present action is brought by the tutors and curators and also by Mr Herriot, and it concludes for separate sums as due to these different pursuers. The ground of action on which the tutors and curators base their claim is that an accounting for the period from their assumption of office until the majority of Miss Brown would shew that Miss Brown is indebted to them in a certain sum, representing payments made to her during that period in excess of the income drawn from the property. The ground of Mr Herriot's claim is that during the period after she came of age he made certain payments to her in excess of the income from the property.

The defences to the two claims are also different. There is, of course, the general defence, which may be described as putting the pursuers to a strict accounting as regards the due vouching of all the payments stated. But there are also defences which are quite different. With regard to the claim of the tutors and curators she says: "You as tutors and curators had no right to advance to me more than the bare income amounted to. If you did so it was your own fault, and you cannot recover such advances as a debt due by me." As to the factor's claim that defence is not available, and the defence there put forward is that he ought to have informed her that he was making payments to her in excess of her income, and that having failed to do so he is not entitled to recover them. I do not express any opinion as to the relative cogency of these two defences; I merely point out that they are different.

A preliminary objection has been taken by the defender, and it is that, according to a well settled rule of law, two separate pursuers cannot conjoin in the same action in respect of separate and independent grounds of debt. The Lord Ordinary has repelled that plea; but I must confess that I am unable to follow the reasons which he states for that decision. He first cites the old case of the Feuars of Orkney (Gray and

Paxton and Others v. Brown.

The Lord President.

Others), M. 11,986, which laid down the law long ago that "different parties could not accumulate their actions in one libel unless they had connection with one another in the matter pursued for or had been aggrieved by the same act." Now that is a very old authority, and not only so, but it has been carried down through the books to the present day. Erskine was quoted to us as an independent authority in support of it, but I take it he was simply following as his authority the decision in the Feuars of Orkney, his work being written some sixty years after that decision. That rule has been carried down since then through all the authorities. Ivory and Shand give it in exactly the same words, and your Lordships had an opportunity to reiterate it quite recently in the case of Killin v. Weir, 7 F. 526. I should have thought that, if anything was settled, that was settled; but yet, says the Lord Ordinary, after referring to Killin v. Weir, and Brims & Mackay, 1907, S.C. 1106, "there are other cases to which it is not so easy to apply the above rule in its generality." He does not, however, quote any other cases, and the learned counsel here, who I am sure have made a careful search, have been unable to quote any to us. So, in fact, it comes to this, that there are no other cases. Therefore when the Lord Ordinary goes on to say that "the reason of the decision is not so much any technical rule as practical convenience," he takes upon himself a function that does not belong to him. Convenience is convenience, but a rule remains a rule. I think, then, that the Lord Ordinary's argument is not in accordance with the long line of authority. I only add that The Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan, 4 R. (H.L.) 14, leaves, to my mind, the old authority untouched. There is, it is true, much talk of "convenience" in the opinions of the learned Lords in that case, but it must be borne in mind that they were English lawyers, and they begin their opinions by stating that the conjoining of pursuers in these circumstances is unknown in English practice though it does obtain in Scotland, and they then go on to examine the Scots authorities. They held in that case that it was possible for the pursuers to conjoin, for of course that case fell within the exceptions as expressed in the Feuars of Orkney, and where they come to use the word "convenience" is when they go forward to consider whether there was any reason arising ab inconvenienti to prevent the exceptions applying there, and they found that there was not. But I need hardly say that that case does not trench on the old authorities in any way.

We then come to the question put by Mr Morison—Does this case fall within the exceptions, either (first) that the pursuers are connected with one another in the matter pursued for, or (second) that they are aggrieved by the same act? Clearly they are not aggrieved by the same act—the tutors and curators' advance was one thing and Mr Herriot's was another. But are they "connected in the matter pursued for"? These are general words, and though they are not the same thing as joint interest in its legal sense, yet the idea of joint interest does throw some light on them. I think that the pursuers here are not connected at all; the only suggestion of connection is that, historically, they succeeded one another. In the course of the argument I put the example of a person being sued by his butcher and his baker. The goods in question there would, of course, be supplied for the same household, and possibly the principal witness would be the same in each case, namely, the housekeeper or house steward who had ordered the goods. But they would clearly be unconnected accounts, and I think that that example is completely analogous to the present case. I am well aware that the whole tendency of modern times is not to turn an action out of Court on a technical plea, and my whole sympathy, if I could have any sympathy, would be against turning this action out. But where there is a rule of law which has been adhered to for so long as this one has, we must be shewn some very weighty reason for not giving effect to it, and no such reason has been advanced here. It appears to me that this is nothing but a case of the parties to two separate actions seeking to enforce their claims in one summons, and therefore I am of opinion that the defender's plea must be sustained.

But the question remains, What is to be done next? I think that here the modern practice of not multiplying actions and not putting parties to unnecessary expense comes to our help. But I think the pursuers must put their pen through the name of one set of pursuers and also through one set of averments, and if that is done I think it will remain quite a good action at the instance of the remaining pursuer. The defender will not be prejudiced in any way, and the expenses of preparing and serving new actions and paying the fee fund dues will be avoided. I think, then, that Mr Morison should be given time to consider which of the pursuers he is prepared to strike out, for I think that he has that option.

Lord M'Laren.—The rule as to combining different claims in the same action is tersely and epigrammatically stated in the case of the Orkney Feuars v. Stewart of Burray, 1741, M. 11,986. The general rule there laid down is, that parties cannot accumulate their actions in one libel, and the two exceptions stated are (1) where there is some connection between the parties in the matter pursued for—which I take to mean some title or interest in common; and (2) where the parties suing are aggrieved by the same act. Here there are two unconnected pursuers, each suing for his own separate debt, and as the law agent's advances only commenced when those of the curators ended, it cannot be said that these were concurrent accounts. Besides, if the grounds of the action are examined the questions at issue will be found to be different; for in the first case the question is whether the curators acted within the scope of their duties in making these advances, while the second seems to raise a simple question of debt—viz. a claim by a law agent for advances to his client.

I agree with your Lordship that two such claims cannot be combined in the same action, and that the opinion which the Lord Ordinary has adopted would tend to relax, and indeed to render inoperative, the rule by which we have hitherto been guided. The rule is not merely formal and arbitrary, but has this substance in it, that if an action is brought by a single pursuer, a defender may more easily come to a settlement and have the case taken out of court; while if there are several persons suing on different claims, any one of them by holding out (it may be for a just claim) may not only subject the defender to needless expense, but may prevent any settlement being come to at all.

In any view, I should be very averse to relaxing a rule which has worked well in practice, and in which, as I have indicated, there is a good deal of substance. I agree, however, that our modern practice affords a practical remedy, and that by striking out one of the two claims the action thus restricted may be made competent.

Lords Kinnear and Pearson concurred.

At the close of advising—

The Lord President.—I ought to have added, with regard to the old case of the Feuars of Orkney, M. 11,986, that if, as the Lord Ordinary says, the doctrine of convenience is to be taken as the test, you could not have had a case where convenience pointed more directly to a conjoining of the pursuers, for the subject of proof there was really one continuous course of somewhat nimious doings on the part of Stewart and his men.—18*th December* 1907.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Stirling at Stirling.

This was an action to recover sums of money amounting to £57, brought by David Greig, 26 Windsor Street, Glasgow, against Alexander Christie, farmer, Bankend, near Stirling, as executor-dative of the deceased James Christie, farmer, Bankend, or otherwise as vitious intromitter with the estate of the said James Christie.

The sums sued for were sums which had been lent by the pursuer to James Christie. James Christie was an uncle of the defender, and had lived with him at the farm of Bankend. He had assisted in the management of the farm, but, in the view taken by the Court, he was not a joint tenant and had no proprietary interest in the farm or the farm stock. The defender was, along with his sisters, appointed executor-dative to James Christie, but had never taken out confirmation. A cheque for the sum of £46, 5s. 7d., drawn by Messrs Speedie Brothers, auctioneers, in favour of James Christie, was found in James Christie's cash-box. The defender took the cheque to Messrs Speedie, and obtained in place of it another cheque in his own name. It appeared that the cheque was the price of certain shorthorn bulls. The pursuer maintained that these bulls belonged to James Christie, or alternatively that James Christie was entitled to retain the cheque against debts due to him by the farm, and that the defender's action in changing the cheque was an act of vitious intromission. The defender traversed all these propositions. Quoad ultra, in the view taken by the Court, James Christie left no estate of any substantial value.

On 9th October 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Mitchell) assoilzied the defender.

The pursuer appealed to the Sheriff (Lees), who on 3rd December 1906 adhered.

The pursuer appealed.

Greig v. Christie.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The history of the connection of the late James Christie with the farm seems to have been as follows:—Up to the year 1879 he and his brother had been yearly tenants, their only writing being their entry as tenants in the estate books. James then became a tenant of another farm, Bandeath, at some distance off, and took there all that he was entitled to as his share of what was on Bankend. From this time his name disappeared from the estate books, and for some years he had no connection of any kind with Bankend. It appears that in 1885 he became bankrupt and that his brother Alexander received him again at Bankend, providing him with board and lodging, and that he attended to the finance of the farm, buying and selling and keeping the accounts. He also did some separate business on his own account in buying and selling cows, he taking the use of the Bankend grazing for short periods when he had bought cows, until he got them resold to others.

There is no evidence that when he came back he brought any stock or farm implements, and indeed being a bankrupt it is not conceivable how he could have done so; and there is not, so far as I can see, anything to shew that he at any time out of his own funds provided anything for the stocking or working of the farm of Bankend. The evidence, as I think, is quite inconsistent with his having had any right of his own in the farm or the stocking, although he again appears as joint tenant in the estate books in 1890 and as sole tenant for the last three years of his life, which it is shrewdly suggested was for voting purposes. To me it seems clear that he had nothing of his own on the farm and had no practical right in it.

In these circumstances the question arises whether the defender in this case has fallen within the character of a vitious intromitter by his having taken a cheque, drawn in favour of the deceased, and got another cheque in his own favour in lieu of it from the granter and so got from the bank the amount in the cheque. I am satisfied that the cheque, which was from stock auctioneers, was for the price of three young bulls which did not belong to the deceased, being bulls reared on the farm and not the deceased's property in any sense. The cheque was granted to him as managing the business of the farm.

In these circumstances the question which arises is one of some difficulty, and it is only after repeated consideration that I have come to be of opinion that the pursuer's plea in favour of vitious intromission must be repelled. I do not go further into the matter, as I have considered and concur in the opinions prepared by Lords Low and Ardwall. The deceased had, as I think, no right or title to the money represented by the cheque, and the burden of proof being on the party maintaining vitious intromission, I hold that the pursuer has failed to discharge the onus.

Lord Low.—I am of opinion, in the first place, that it is established that no part of the stock, crop, or implements upon the farm of Bankend belonged to the deceased James Christie. It was impossible to obtain exact and precise evidence upon the question, because no farm books or accounts of any description appear to have been kept, and accordingly the evidence, if taken in detail, is somewhat vague and indefinite. When read as a whole, however, it leaves no doubt in my mind that after he returned to Bankend in 1885 James Christie was merely in the position of a lodger with his brother, who assisted in the management of the farm in return for board and lodgings, and who carried on business as a cow dealer on his own account.

There is, indeed, one fact which, prima facie, suggests that James Christie must have had an interest in the farm, and that is that in 1890 his name was entered in the estate books as joint tenant with his brother Alexander. There is nothing, however, in the estate office to shew how or why the entry came to be made. Mr M'Laren, the present factor, only came into office in 1896, and his only source of information is the entry in the rental book. He says, however, that he always regarded Alexander as being truly the tenant, while the defender says that he understood that James's name was put in as joint tenant "to give him a vote for the laird." In these circumstances I cannot regard the entry in the rental as counterbalancing the great weight of evidence to the effect that James's position in regard to the farm was what I have stated.

The pursuer, therefore, has no claim against the defender in respect of the intromissions which the latter had with the stock and crop upon the farm.

So far the case appears to me to present no difficulty, but a delicate question arises as to whether the defender, by his intromissions with the cheque for £46, 5s. 7d., granted by Speedie Brothers in favour of the deceased, has not incurred liability for the debts of the latter, as a vitious intromitter, at all events to the amount of the cheque.

The answer to that question depends upon whether the money represented by the cheque was the property of the deceased, because if it was not his property the defender cannot have incurred a passive title, however irregular and unwarranted his intromission with the cheque may have been. Mr Erskine, in his Institutes (III. ix. 51), states the law thus: "Intromission cannot be vitious, nor consequently infer a passive title, when the subject intermeddled with was truly not in bonis defuncti, no part of the estate of the deceased, or ceased to be such before the intromission."

Now a cheque is not a document of title, nor, in the general case, does it give any indication of the purpose for which, or the capacity in which, it is granted to the payee. Still, when a cheque is found in a dead man's repositories, drawn in his favour in ordinary form, I think that there is a certain presumption that the money represented by the cheque belonged to him. It seems to me, therefore, that the onus, in the first instance, lay upon the defender to shew that the money did not belong to the deceased. That onus he has, in my opinion, discharged, because it is proved that the cheque represented the price of certain cattle which formed part of the stock of Bankend, which were sold by Speedie Brothers, upon James Christie's instructions, the sale of stock being a matter which was entrusted to him. If, therefore, I am right in thinking that it is established that no part of the stock of the farm belonged to James Christie, he held the cheque not in his own right but for the defender and his mother and sisters, to whom the stock upon the farm belonged. That being so, then unless circumstances existed which would have entitled James Christie to retain the money although it was the price of cattle which did not belong to him, the defender has not, by his intromission with the cheque, incurred liability for his uncle's debts.

It was argued, however, that upon the assumption that James Christie had no interest in the farm, he was entitled to retain the cheque, in a question with the defender and his mother and sisters, because he had borrowed the sums now sued for from the pursuer for the purpose of paying the rent of the farm. I think that it may be taken to be proved that James Christie did, in fact, borrow the sums sued for, for the ostensible purpose of paying the rent and taxes, but it does not follow that that gave him right to retain the amount in the cheque. Whether he would have been entitled to do so or not would have depended upon the result of an accounting for his intromissions with the produce of the farm. He appears to have conducted all the sales, both of crops (such as hay, beans, and barley) and of cattle; and out of the proceeds he paid the rent and other necessary expenses. The farm seems always to have paid its way, and also to have afforded a livelihood for Alexander Christie and his family, and no reason is disclosed why James Christie should have required to borrow money to pay the rent. Perhaps the fact that he engaged in cattle-dealing, apparently with little success, may have had something to do with it; but however that may be, it is certainly not proved, nor do I think that it can be inferred from the evidence, that James was a creditor of the farm. It is possible that he may have been so, but as no books or accounts were kept it cannot now be ascertained how matters truly stood. That is unfortunate for the pursuer, but upon this branch of the case the onus of proof is on him.

I am therefore of opinion (1) that it is proved that James Christie had no right to or interest in the stock, crop or implements upon the farm; (2) that it is proved that the cheque represented the price of certain cattle to or in which James Christie had no right or interest; and (3) that it is not proved that there was any balance due to James Christie by the farm against which he would have been entitled to retain the proceeds of the cheque.

The result is that, in my judgment, the appeal should be dismissed, and the interlocutor of the Sheriff affirmed.

I should like, however, to add that even if I took a different view of the result of the evidence I should still think that the defender could not be held to have incurred liability as a vitious intromitter. The most favourable view of the evidence which could be taken for the pursuer would be that it shewed that James Christie had some interest in the farm, and some right to the stock thereon. It is plain, however, that even if so much be established by the evidence, no data are supplied by which any estimate whatever can be made of the extent of James Christie's right or interest. I suppose that if he had any right at all it must have been a pro indiviso right along with his brother in the stock, a right which may have been to the extent of one-half, but which may have been to some lesser extent. Assuming that to have been the position of matters I am unable to see how by carrying on the farm and thereby necessarily intromitting with the stock the defender could be regarded as a vitious intromitter. He was dealing with stock which ex hypothese belonged to a greater or less extent to him or those for whom he acted, and which it was necessary for some one to intromit with if the farm was to be carried on in ordinary course.

I think that very much the same view applies to the cheque. Even assuming that the cattle for the price of which the cheque was given belonged to some unknown extent to James Christie, they also belonged to the defender and his mother and sisters, whom he represented. No doubt the course which the defender adopted was irregular, but I do not think that it can be described by a more serious epithet. To whomsoever the cattle belonged they were part of the stock of the farm, and the proceeds of their sale naturally fell to be applied to farm expenses, and I can very well understand that it would have been very inconvenient, perhaps embarrassing, for the conduct of the farm if the money had been tied up indefinitely. I am indeed inclined to think that the defender had a probable title of intromission with the cheque which the institutional writers regard as sufficient to exclude the consequences of vitious intromission.

Accordingly, even upon the most favourable view for the pursuer, I think that he has mistaken his remedy. It seems to me that the appropriate course would have been for him to confirm as executor creditor and bring an action of accounting.

I need hardly say that the fact that the contrary view is held by my brother Lord Stormonth-Darling, whose opinion I had an opportunity of reading, has led me to consider the case with much anxiety; but after repeated consideration of the evidence and the authorities I have been unable to come to any other conclusion than that which I have stated.

Lord Ardwall.—The pursuer in this case seeks to recover from the defender sums of £20, £12, and £25, which he alleges were lent by him to the deceased James Christie, an uncle of the defender. The loans are proved by valid writs produced in process, and the receipt for £25 bears that that sum was received to enable the deceased James Christie to pay "rent and taxes."

The action is brought, in the first place, against the defender as executor-dative of the deceased James Christie, but although he was decerned executor he never took out confirmation, for the reason, he says, that there was no estate to confirm to; but in the second place, he is sued as a vitious intromitter with the moveable estate of the deceased James Christie. The moveable estate with which it is said vitious intromission took place was in the first place the half of the stock on the farm of Bankend; and second, in any view, a cheque drawn by Speedie & Co., auctioneers, Stirling, in favour of the said James Christie. . . .

With regard to the stock on Bankend, I think it is proved that no portion of it belonged to James Christie. [His Lordship then considered the evidence relating to the ownership of the farm stock.]

There remains, however, the question as to the cheque for £46, 5s. 7d.

It is proved that from 1902 till 1905 James Christie, who was not occupied with any regular work in the farm, and who had occasion to be frequently in the town of Stirling and up and down the country in pursuance of his cow dealing business, was entrusted with the few financial transactions which were necessary in connection with the farm of Bankend. The rent receipts for the years 1903, 1904, and the first part of 1905 are in his favour, and it is otherwise proved that he always paid these rents. On the other hand, he collected the moneys due to the farm for hay, barley, and other crops sold off the farm, and also for cattle sold, and out of these he paid the rent, wages, seed bill and other things. This was quite a natural arrangement, as he had been experienced all his life in buying and selling farm stock and crop. He and his nephew Alexander were on perfectly good terms, and it was only fair that he should render what services he could in return for his board and lodging. The two last transactions of which we know anything were the payment of the half-year's rent, amounting to £55, by James Christie on 6th February 1905, and the sale by him on 17th February 1905 of three bulls, for which Messrs Speedie Brothers sent him the cheque for £46, 5s. 7d. The deceased among other things had this cheque in his possession at the time of his death, and the pursuer in this action put the cheque with two five-pound notes and a gold watch into a cash-box and took away the key. The defender Alexander Christie opened the box with a key which lay in the house, paid the funeral expenses out of the money so far as it went, and took the cheque to Speedie & Co., and obtained from them another in his own favour; and the question comes to be, Was this treatment of the cheque vitious intromission on the part of the lefender with his deceased uncle's estate?

The onus is on the pursuer to shew that this cheque, or, as it may be taken to be, the money contained therein, formed part of the deceased James Christie's estate. I do not think any importance can be attached to the fact that the cheque was taken in the name of the deceased. It has been held that payment by a cheque is really payment in cash, and it perhaps simplifies matters to regard the cheque as in the same position as if instead of the cheque the deceased had received the money in bank notes and coin, and had left it lying in a parcel in his repositories. It is proved by the Sale Note 6/5 of process and the evidence of Andrew M'Dermont, cashier for Speedie Brothers, the granters of the cheque, that the sum of £46, 5s. 7d. was paid for three shorthorn bulls which it is clearly proved belonged, not to the deceased at all, but to the defender and his mother and sisters, who seem to have been interested with him in the farm stock at Bankend; and I may observe that M'Dermont's evidence also shews that the deceased's transactions in cow dealing on his own account were kept perfectly separate from the sale of bulls bred upon Bankend.

This being so, it seems necessarily to follow that the cheque or the sum of money which it represented was not part of the deceased's estate at all, inasmuch as it was the price of and a surrogatum for bulls belonging to the defender, which the deceased was bound to hand over to the defender. Accordingly we may apply to the defender's intromission with the cheque what Mr Erskine says III. ix. 51: "Intromission cannot be vitious nor consequently infer a passive title where the subject intermeddled with was not truly in bonis defuncti, no part of the estate of the deceased, or ceased to be such before the intromission."

It is quite true that if Messrs Speedie had not been willing to cancel the old cheque and grant a new one, it might have been necessary for the defender to take out confirmation to the cheque as to money held in trust by the deceased as agent or trustee for those to whom the bulls belonged and then to have paid the proceeds to himself, which he had quite a right to do. Indeed, even supposing that the defender had not been decerned executor to the deceased, but that the pursuer had taken out confirmation as executor creditor, I cannot doubt that the defender could have successfully vindicated the sum in question, which was never immixed with James Christie's own funds, as being money truly belonging to him, and representing part of the farm stock in which the deceased had no pecuniary interest; and the same result would have followed had sequestration been taken out of James Christie's estate, the sum being distinguishable from the rest of his estate (see M'Adam v. Martin's Tr., 1872, 11 M. 33).

So far, then, I think it cannot be doubted that although the cheque was treated in a somewhat shorthand way by the defender, he thereby did nothing more than vindicate practically what was truly his own property as he would have been entitled to do in a more roundabout fashion in ordinary form of law. The only answer of any consequence suggested to the defender's claim upon this money is that the deceased, being entrusted with many of the financial transactions connected with the farm, might have been entitled to retain the money in question against advances which he might have made on behalf of the defender and those interested in the farm. I am of opinion that this would be a sufficient answer if the pursuer had proved—and the onus is upon him to do so—that at the time of James Christie's death the defender, or those interested in the farm, were due money to him on a just accounting. But so far from anything of the kind being proved, I think the evidence goes to shew that, whereas the farm easily paid its way during the lifetime of Alexander Christie, senior, James Christie had frequently difficulty in meeting debts due by the farm out of the proceeds of sales, and after his death it was found that several farm accounts were unpaid which ought to have been paid out of what he had received from the sales of crop and stock. I think this appears very clearly from the evidence of Mrs Margaret Christie; and the impression which the whole evidence leaves on my mind is that James Christie was not successful in his business of cow dealing, and that so far as can be conjectured the balance was against him and not in his favour with reference to the financial business which from time to time he performed for the defender and those interested in the Bankend farm; in other words, that moneys derived from Bankend farm frequently went to cover James Christie's losses as a dealer in cows. But it is enough for the disposal of this part of the case, first, that it is proved beyond the possibility of a doubt that the money in the cheque was the property of the defender and those interested with him in Bankend stock; and second, that the pursuer has failed to prove that at the time of his death James Christie had any claim of retention or otherwise over the said money in respect of sums due to him by the defender.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the pursuer has failed to prove that there has been any vitious intromission on the part of the defender with his deceased uncle's estate, and it follows that the interlocutor of the Sheriff should be affirmed and the defender found entitled to the expenses of the appeal.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—The only relevant facts of this case seem to me to lie in small compass, though the proof ranged over the whole business relations for forty years of two brothers, Alexander and James Christie, who are both now dead, Alexander having died on 12th December 1902 and James on 7th March 1905. Alexander was married and had a family, one of whom is the defender. James never married. The two brothers were for some time joint tenants of a small farm of eighty acres, on the Polmaise estate near Stirling, at a rent of £110 a year, where their father had been tenant before them. In 1879 James became tenant of a much larger farm on the same estate, but he does not seem to have succeeded in it, and after six years the landlord took the farm off his hands. James then returned to the family home at Bankend, and after Alexander's death James was recognised by the factor as the tenant of Bankend and paid the rent regularly. The defender says James did so as manager for the family. What was the exact footing on which he stood towards his late brother's widow and children is left, as I think, to pure conjecture, just as there is no definite proof as to the precise financial relations of the brothers themselves. How your Lordships can say that there is anything like proof of what these relations were I do not myself profess to understand.

The only facts that can be said to be known with certainty are these. In 1902, and again in 1904, James borrowed money from the pursuer, who was his brother-in-law, to the amount in all of £57. For these sums of money (£20, £12, and £25) James granted receipts to the pursuer, the last dated 5th February 1904 (a little more than a year before James's fatal accident). It is in these terms:—"Received from Mr David Greig the sum of Twenty-five pounds further to enable me to pay rent and taxes, etc., and for which I am to grant a conveyance to him of my Upper Bridge Street property to secure repayment of this and any other advances that may be made in future." This document was signed through a stamp "James Christie, 5th February

Greig v. Christie.
Lord Stormonth-Darling.

1904." It is not said that the security there mentioned was ever granted. Nor is it said that the loans were ever repaid. But as tending to corroborate the statement in the last receipt that the loans were wanted to pay rent and taxes, it is significant to find that the loans were made a few days before the half-year's rent was payable.

The pursuer being thus undoubtedly a creditor of the late James Christie at the time of his death, applied to the defender for repayment of the loans as representing his uncle. The defender denied liability, and the present action was raised on the footing that the defender represented the late James Christie as executor-dative, or otherwise as vitious intromitter with his goods, gear and effects. In the course of the proceedings it appeared that on 2nd May 1905 the defender, along with other members of the family, was appointed executor-dative qua one of the next of kin, but he admitted that he had not given up any inventory of the deceased's estate, nor obtained confirmation. For this the defender gave as his reason that he and his co-executors had not been able to discover any property belonging to the deceased other than some bedroom furniture of small value with which they had not intermeddled. The sole question in the action thus resolved itself into one of vitious intromission, aye or no.

For the principles on which this passive title is founded one requires to revert to the institutional writers and to decisions which do not come down later than Dunlop and the early volumes of Macpherson. Perhaps the reason is that questions of intromission without a title generally arise in the Sheriff Court, and are confined to subjects of small value.

Erskine, in his Principles (III. 9, 25), defines vitious intromission as "an unwarrantable intermeddling with the moveable estate of a person deceased without the order of law," and adds, "The bare intermeddling infers this passive title, though the thing intermeddled with should not be applied to any use by the intromitter." The subject is treated more at length in the Institutes (III. 9, 49–56), where it is said that the passive title is excluded when the thing intermeddled with was no part of the estate of the deceased, and also that the vitiosity may be purged if the intromitter gets himself confirmed executor, "as it shews a willingness in the intromitter to subject himself to account." The full penalty of vitious intromission being, as Mr Erskine remarks, "extremely severe, and introduced as a check to fraud, is excluded in every case where equity interposes for the intromitter, where, for instance, the value of the things intermeddled with is so inconsiderable as to remove all suspicion of fraud, unless there be direct evidence, or at least pregnant presumptions, to the contrary." Then he goes on to mention any probable title of intromission though imperfect in itself, such as letters o administration in England, as saving the intro mitter from the passive title. Mr Bell in hi Principles (sect. 1921) begins by stating tha "the proper mode of entry, and the only effectual check on dishonesty in intromissior with the moveable funds of a person deceased is confirmation; and wherever one having ar opportunity of intromitting does so without confirmation a universal responsibility is raised against him." Then he goes on to qualify this general statement by saying, "Any bona fide title of intromission, or circumstances removing the suspicion of fraud and affording a check on the intromission, will relieve against the penal consequences" (i.e. the incurring of universal liability).

Now, what were the actual intromissions founded on? They are of the simplest description, and stand on the evidence of the pursuer and the defender himself. The pursuer's account of it is: "I remember the death of James Christie. I was telegraphed to come and see him. I found some valuables in his cash-box. They were four single pound notes, two £5 notes, a cheque from Speedie Brothers for young shorthorn bulls sold by them and amounting to £46, 5s. 7d. There was also a gold watch. These were all put into the box, and the box locked up, and I have the key in my possession. That box still remains at Bankend in the possession of defender." The defender's account of what happened is in substance the same, with an important addition. He says: "There was a cash-box in the house. Pursuer put in it two £5 notes, a gold watch, and cheque for £46, 5s. 7d. He locked the box and took away the key. The box is still at Bankend. We opened it with a key we got in the house. I took the money out of the box to pay the funeral expenses. I produce the account for the same, amounting to £11, 13s. 9d. (No. 6/7 of process). The cheque was in payment for bulls sold at Speedie's sale. The account No. 6/2 of process is the account for them. The bulls belonged to my father. I took the cheque into Speedie's, and they gave me another cheque in my name. Mr Speedie knew to whom the bulls belonged. The watch is still at Bankend." There is some corroboration by the mother and sister of the defender, but the defender's own admission is enough. The only other witness who deals with this matter is M'Dermont, the cashier of Speedie Brothers. Speedie himself, who is referred to by the defender as "knowing to whom the bulls belonged," was not examined, and the defender is not corroborated as to Speedie's knowledge by M'Dermont, who says: "After Alexander's death in 1902 there would be grazing cattle sent in for sale from Bankend. They were entered in the name of Mr Christie—probably because we did not know who the owner was." It is fair to add that this witness depones that, while the two brothers were alive, it was James that sent in cows, and Alexander's name that was entered in connection with the sale of shorthorn cattle, but he admits that after the death of Alexander the auctioneers knew no other name but James's to put in the catalogue, and so both the account for the lot in question and the cheque for £46, 5s. 7d. were made out in James's name. I say this as bearing on the bona fide belief of the defender when he possessed himself of the cheque, and got Speedies' cashier (most irregularly) to substitute a cheque in the defender's favour. This matter of the cheque is really the only element of importance in the case, for I agree with the Sheriff that the money taken out of the cash-box and spent in funeral expenses was in a totally different position and must be disregarded. Indeed the pursuer's counsel ultimately presented his case on the footing that it raised no question of universal liability, but affected the defender's intromission with the sum in the cheque alone.

Now, what is a cheque? It is defined by sect. 73 of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882 as "a bill of exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand." According to the ordinary course of mercantile dealing it is, at all events when drawn on a man's own bank, universally regarded as a cash payment. The creditor may not be legally bound to receive it, for he is not bound to be satisfied with anything but current coin of the realm; but if he takes it without objection, subject only to the condition of its being duly honoured on presentation, he is held to have been paid in cash. All this was clearly expounded by the Lord President within the last six weeks in the case of Leggatt Brothers v. Moss' Empires Ltd., 1907, 15 S.L.T. at pp. 536, 537. Now, this cheque was sent to the late James Christie, the proper creditor of the auctioneer, on 17th February 1905, and it was received and retained by him down to the time of his death. What right, I ask, had the defender or anyone else to abstract it from the deceased man's cash-box and, with the connivance of the auctioneer, to substitute another cheque in favour of a different person? The defender may have believed, and it is even possible that he may have been right in believing, that the cheque represented the value of cattle which truly belonged to his father's representatives. But that was a question which might require a long and complicated clearing up of accounts, and could not certainly be summarily solved by the defender taking the law into his own hands. Moreover, he and the other members of his family had been parties to placing the deceased man in the position of being the proper legal representative of the farm, responsible for the rent and other outlays, and entitled to the drawings for stock and crop. The defender was the last man, therefore, who could fairly disturb an arrangement for which he was largely responsible. I think it would undo all the benefits which the law endeavours to secure by the orderly and regular administration of the estates of deceased persons, if a wholly unwarrantable and in some respects clandestine proceeding of this kind received any encouragement.

It is said that the bona fides of the defender ought to save the defender from penal consequences of his own acts, however irregular they may have been. Perhaps from the full penal consequences, i.e. of being held universally liable, but not certainly from the consequences of intromission without a title, to the extent at least of that intromission. "Every person," said Lord Cowan in Wilson v. Taylor, 1865, 3 M. 1060, "who intromits without title with the effects of a person deceased is a vitious intromitter, according to the legal acceptation of the term. He may have intromitted in perfect bona fide; and if so, it may be that although he is not the less a vitious intromitter, he may not suffer the penal consequences of vitious intromission. Universal liability is by no means the necessary consequence of vitious intromission, and in the present case I would be slow to sustain any claim of universal liability against the defender. But if there has been de facto intromission without a title with the estate of a deceased to a certain extent, it cannot, on any good ground, be contended that the good faith of the intromitter affords defence against a claim to that, or to a less extent, by a creditor of the deceased." The other judges concurred; and it appears that the case was one in which the bona fides of the intromitter was unusually clear, for the deceased was a woman who had borne an illegitimate child, leaving some money on deposit receipt, and the bank where it was deposited paid it, on the footing that the amount was not sufficient to warrant the expense of confirmation, on receiving a discharge from the whole of the deceased's relatives; and yet the defender was held a vitious intromitter to the extent of the money (about £90) which he had received from the bank without taking out confirmation, and responsible on that ground to a creditor of the deceased woman in a claim within that amount.

If the principles applied in Wilson v. Taylor were sound, it seems to me that they lead straight to the decision of this case in favour of the pursuer to the extent of £46, 5s. 7d. The amount of the cheque was undoubtedly part of the estate of the deceased James Christie at the time of his death. He alone had the right to cash it. What he was to do with the proceeds afterwards was for subsequent adjustment. The defender admittedly intromitted with the cheque, first by abstracting it from the repositories of the deceased, and then by exchanging it for another cheque in his own favour. This was, in my opinion, a vitious intromission, both because it was intromission without the shadow of a title, and also because there was a certain amount of clandestinity in it, at all events as regards the pursuer. Lastly, no amount of honest belief that the cattle were the property of himself and his family could save him from the consequences of intromission to the extent of the amount intermeddled with. I should therefore be in favour of recalling the Sheriff's interlocutor, and giving decree for £46, 5s. 7d., with expenses in both Courts.

But your Lordships are deciding otherwise. I cannot pretend to regard your decision otherwise than with regret and apprehension. It not only defeats a just claim, with which the Sheriff himself expresses "much sympathy," but it rewards with success a proceeding of the most irregular and, as I think, most reprehensible kind. If that were all, its effects might end with the case in hand. But I am apprehensive that it will encourage the belief among people who already perhaps have not too scrupulous a regard for regularity of procedure, and who certainly have unusual facilities for tampering with the moveable funds of deceased persons, that they are safe to disregard the check—"the only effectual check," as Mr Bell describes it—afforded by confirmation, and to act upon their own ideas of what they are pleased to consider equity.—20*th December* 1907.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling, Low and Ardwall.)

259. Addison v. Ainslie Brown.

LEASE—AGRICULTURAL SUBJECTS—IMPLIED GRANT OF RIGHT OF ACCESS OVER PRIVATE ROAD RUNNING THROUGH SUBJECTS LET—ROAD NOT INCLUDED IN DESCRIPTION OF SUBJECTS LET—ROAD NOT WAY OF NECESSITY, BUT CONVENIENT FOR WORKING FARM—CIRCUMSTANCES WHERE HELD THAT THERE WAS AN IMPLIED GRANT OF RIGHT OF ACCESS AS AN ADJUNCT OF SUBJECTS LET.

Reclaiming Note against Interlocutor of Lord Dundas.

This was an action brought by Abram Addison, tenant of the farm and lands of Manuel Mill, Linlithgow, against Robert Ainslie Brown of Manuel, S.S.C., Edinburgh for declarator "that the pursuer, as tenant of the farm and lands of Manuel Mill . . . . has right of free ingress and egress to the fields on said farm and lands by the road shewn upon the estate plan of Manuel made by James Young & Son, and dated 1852, lying said road to the south side of fields Nos. 32 and 33, and passing between fields Nos. 34 and 36 on the north, and fields Nos. 16 and 17 on the south, and tinted pink on the plan produced herewith, and running westwards from point A on said plan, past points B, C, D, E, F, and G, till it meets the public road at point J on said plan; and that the pursuer has the right, as tenant foresaid, to the free and uninterrupted use of said road, and right of passage over the same for himself as tenant foresaid, his servants, employees, and others, and for horses, cattle, and carts used by the pursuer as tenant foresaid, and for all purposes connected with the said farm and lands." The summons also contained conclusions for interdict and for damages.

The defender admitted that the pursuer had right to the reasonable use of the road in question from the point G to the point J on said plan, but he denied the pursuer's right to use the road from the point A to the point G.

The pursuer was the tenant of the farm and lands of Manuel Mill under a lease dated 11th and 21st December 1902, entered into between George Bayley, W.S., Edinburgh, proprietor of the lands of Manuel, and the pursuer. The defender was the singular successor of the said George Bayley in the said lands.

By the said lease the said George Bayley (the first party) let to the pursuer (the second party)—

All and Whole the mills of Manuel Mill, with the dwelling-house and office houses and two cot-houses at Burnbridge, all as now let to Peter Roberts, and together also with those lands now let to him and to Thomas Binnie, and those other lands in possession of the first party, and heretofore let by him as grass parks, which whole lands hereby let consist of the fields or enclosures marked Nos. 2, 3, 10, 15, 16, 17, 20, 22, 25, 27, 29 and 34, and intervening Nos. 36, 38, 39, 40, 43 and 56, and intervening numbers on the plan of the estate of Manuel, made by James Young & Son, and dated 1852, which has been seen and examined by the second party, which lands, lying in the parish of Muiravonside and county of Stirling, are computed or conjectured to extend to 112 acres imperial or thereby, although no extent is guaranteed. . . .

The road in question (from A to G) was numbered 35 on the said plan. The lease further provided:

There is hereby reserved to the first party . . . . the right to himself and others having his permission to use all roads through said lands. . . . Should the second party desire to have additional drains in the lands hereby let, and the first party be satisfied as to the expediency thereof, he shall supply the drain tiles, and the second party shall perform the carriages and execute the drainage works at his own cost. . . . The second party binds himself and his foresaids to keep the road from the public road at the gate of the avenue to Manuel House to the mills hereby let in good repair, and leave same in that state at the termination of this lease.

Proof was allowed and led. The import of the proof sufficiently appears from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

On 8th January 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced the following interlocutor:

"Finds, declares, and decerns, in terms of the first declaratory conclusion of the summons, that the pursuer has the right, as tenant of the farm and lands under the lease libelled, to the free and uninterrupted use of the road libelled, and rights of passage over the same for himself as tenant foresaid, his servants, employees, and others, and for horses, cattle, and carts used by the pursuer as tenant foresaid, and for all purposes connected with the said farm and lands; decerns against the defender for payment to the pursuer of the sum of £30 sterling in full of the petitory (second) conclusion of the summons; finds it unnecessary to dispose of the remaining conclusions of the summons; dismisses the same accordingly, and decerns; finds the pursuer entitled to expenses with the exception of all expenses incurred by him in connection with and in consequence of the amendment allowed by interlocutor of 17th October 1906."

He added the following Note:—

Lord Dundas.—The proof allowed by my interlocutor of 6th July has now been led—at quite unnecessary length, in my opinion, upon both sides I have come, without much difficulty, to the conclusion that the pursuer is entitled to decree in terms of the principal declaratory conclusion of his summons. Parts of the evidence are instructive; but it appears to me that the decision of the case must turn upon the proper construction to be put upon the pursuer's lease—a copy of which is No. 10 of process. The lease, which is dated 11th and 21st September 1892, is framed in singular and rather puzzling terms. It lets to the pursuer (1) the mills of Manuel Mill, with water-power, etc., and the houses "all as now let to Peter Roberts"; (2) "those lands now let to him and to Thomas Binnie"; and (3) "those other lands in possession of 'the landlord' and heretofore let by him as grass parks." The lease continues thus: "Which whole lands hereby let consist of the fields or enclosures marked numbers" (specified in detail) "on the plan of the estate of Manuel made by James Young & Son, and dated eighteen hundred and fifty-two, which has been seen and examined by the 'tenant,' which lands . . . . are computed or conjectured to extend to one hundred and twelve acres imperial or thereby, although no extent is guaranteed." The estate plan is No. 16 of process; Mr Carfrae's tracing of part of it, with letters imposed, is No. 6 of process; and the relative schedule of contents, dated in 1852, is No. 15 of process. Mr Carfrae, the pursuer's first witness, explains that, as shewn in his table No. 97 of process, the arable and pasture lands actually leased to the pursuer extend to 112·065 acres, exclusive of scarcements, sites of fences, roads, water, wood, banks of burns, and all houses. There are only three roads of any material importance in the case. In the first place there is the road in dispute, marked on No. 6 of process by the letters A to J. The bulk of this road, A to G, extending to ·861 acre, is No. 35 on the plan. No. 35 is not one of the numbers specified in the pursuer's lease. The part G to H, extending to ·101 acre, seems to be included in No. 36, which is specified in the lease. The remainder of the road, H to J, extending to ·042 acre, forms part of No. 37, which is not so specified. The second road leads from the mill to the point A on the public road. It is No. 21 on the plan; extends to ·575 acre, and is not specified in the lease. The third road leads from the mill to Burnbridge by the water side. It is No. 23 on the plan; consists of ·507 and ·74 acre (total ·581 acre), and is not specified in the lease. To complete matters, I may point out that a road or way leading from the mill to the damhead or weir and sluices—which, by the lease, the pursuer is bound to keep in good order—seems to be to the extent of ·229 acre, included in No. 10, which is specified in the lease, and to the extent of ·76 acre in No. 8, which is not specified therein. If, therefore, the extent of the pursuer's leasehold were to be ascertained upon a literal construction of the words of let, it would appear that he has no access at all to his mill and steading. The defender concedes that such a construction is inadmissible, and he says that he is bound and willing to afford the pursuer such access as are "ways of necessity" for the proper working of the farm. These accesses are, in the defender's view, the two roads, from the mill to the public road, above described; and the portion J to G of the road in dispute. This attitude does not seem to me to be logical or satisfactory. I do not think that both of the roads indicated could be "ways of necessity." But it is, in my judgment, clear that the lease is open to construction in regard to the matter of access, and that it must be construed, as a whole, according to the reasonable meaning of its language. A very important clause occurs, whereby the landlord reserves, inter alia, "(Third) the right to himself and others having his permission to use all roads through said lands." This, I apprehend, must mean either an exclusive reservation by the landlord of all the roads or a reservation to himself in common with his tenant. The latter view is maintained by the pursuer, and is, in my judgment, the correct one. The former view I find it impossible to sustain, although no doubt the words used are susceptible of such an interpretation. The defender's counsel was constrained to admit that the reservation in the sense in which he reads it, is superfluous; but he argued that some of the other reservations in the lease—particularly that of a cottage at Causewayend—are so also. In this I think he is mistaken. The cottage is situated in fiel l No. 39, which is expressly let to the pursuer, and the reservation has therefore a distinct purpose and effect Be this, however, as it may, it would, in my opinion, approach the grotesque if one were to hold, as matter of construction, that the parties to this lease intended to stipulate that the landlord should have exclusive right to use all the roads, and the tenant should have none at all. That this is not the proper construction of the language used appears to me to be confirmed by reference to another clause in the lease, by which the tenant is taken bound to keep the ground from the mills up to the point A on the plan No. 6 of process, in good repair, and leave it in that state at the termination of his lease. This is, I think, plainly an instance in which parties contemplated that the tenant should use a road—for obligation to maintain must surely imply right to use—which is not expressly let to him, and which indeed bears on the plan a number not included amongst those which are so let. The pursuer also founded upon a clause in the lease which provides that, if the tenant should desire to have additional drains "in the lands hereby let," and the landlord should be satisfied as to the expediency of such drains, the latter was to supply the drain tiles, and the former to perform the carriages and execute the drainage works at his own cost. It appears in the evidence that, during the lifetime of the late Mr George Bayley, the pursuer executed a considerable drainage operation upon a part of the road now in dispute, his purpose being, as the witnesses depone, to dry the road. This was done with the knowledge and approval of Mr Bayley, who supplied the drain tiles, the pursuer bearing the cost of the carriage and the labour. I think that this episode goes some way to confirm the view that the pursuer had, according to the contemplation of the parties, right to use the road as part of the subjects of his tenancy. Upon a proper construction of the lease, therefore, it is, in my opinion, matter of plain implication that the pursuer had and has right to the reasonable use of this road, as of the others upon his farm. If this view is well founded, there is an end of the matter. I may, however, say a few words as to the evidence of possession by previous tenants. The proof does not throw much direct light upon this matter, because it appears that, between 1856 and the pursuer's entry in 1892, the fields lying along the road in dispute were never let to one and the same tenant. It is to be observed, however, that prior to 1856 Alexander Brock was tenant of the whole farm; his lease (No. 36 of process) says nothing about roads; but there is a good deal of evidence to the effect that he was in the habit of using the road in dispute, as and when it suited him to do so, in the working of the farm. After Alexander Brock there were short tenancies by Andrew Osler (lease No. 37 of process) and George Brock; and from 1861 to 1892 Peter Roberts had the Mill (leases Nos. 38 and 39 of process); but during the whole period from 1857 to 1892 the grass parks along the road in dispute were let to separate tenants. The roup rolls are contained in Nos. 25 and 26 of process. There is some evidence to the effect that Peter Roberts was at one time lessee of fields Nos. 33 and 18 of the plan, and that he used the road in dispute in connection with them. So far as it goes the evidence as to previous possession seems to support—or at all events is quite consistent with—the pursuer's understanding of his own rights under his lease. There is, I think, sufficient evidence to shew that the pursuer after his entry, and down to a period subsequent to the advent of the defender, made use of the road in dispute for various purposes and in different manners. He depones that, before he took the lease, the late Mr Bayley expressly told him that he would have the use of the road for working the farm. I have some hesitation in accepting this statement implicitly; but apart from it altogether, I consider, for the reasons which I have stated, that the pursuer had and has a right to a reasonable use of the road, and that the defender is not entitled to deprive him of it. It is satisfactory to know that the defender is not, by this decision, losing any right which he had in view in making his purchase, for he frankly states in his evidence that, before buying, the question of roads did not occur to him, and he had not considered what access the tenant had over the farm.

2nd Div.
Addison v. Ainslie Brown.

In the view which I take of the case, it is not necessary to decide whether or not the road between A and G on the plan is a "way of necessity" in the legal sense of these words. My impression is in the negative. I think that the pursuer and his witnesses exaggerate the importance of the road as an adjunct of the farm. But it seems to be quite clear that, with a moderate amount of putting in order, it would at certain seasons and under certain conditions be of use and advantage to the farmer. The pursuer must, therefore, have an award of damages; but the amount must, in my judgment, be a modest one. The pursuer's own claim (No. 94 of process) is, I think, a greatly exaggerated and, as regards one item of £20, an uncandid one. I consider that he will be sufficiently compensated by a sum of £30. It will be unnecessary to deal with any of the other conclusions of the summons except that for expenses. The pursuer will be found entitled to expenses, except as regards an amendment which he was allowed to make by interlocutor of 17th October, during the first day of the proof. A question was then raised, when a witness was being interrogated as to the origin and history of the road in dispute. I did not see my way to excluding absolutely ab ante that line of evidence, which I thought might have some bearing on the case, and I accordingly allowed the pursuer to amend his record, so as to raise distinctly what was already rather obscurely alleged as to the road's history. Unfortunately, I did not notice that the amendment when tendered, went beyond what I had intended to allow, and introduced a question of public user. That is a case so essentially different from the case made in the summons and condescendence that I would have refused a motion, if it had been made, for leave to amend the summons (see Leny, 1894, 21 R. 749). Some evidence of use of this road by the public found its way into the proof; and the pursuer's counsel in his speech frankly admitted that his object in leading evidence as to the history of the road was to fortify his case of public user. That, as I have indicated, is a matter absolutely outside of the action as laid, and as now decided by me. The pursuer must therefore bear all the expenses incurred by him in connection with or in consequence of the amendment.

The Defender reclaimed and argued: The road in question was not part of the subjects let. There could be no implied grant of a right of access unless it were a way of necessity. It was not enough that it was necessary for the convenient working of the farm (Ersk., II. 6, 9; Duncan v. Scott, 1876, 3 R. (H.L.) 69; Galloway v. Cowden, 1885, 12 R. 578; Carmichael v. Penny, 1874, 11 S.L.R. 634; Cullens v. Cambusbarron Co-operative Society Ltd., 1895, 23 R. 209; Dodd v. Burchall, 1862, 31 L.J. Ex. 364; Union Lighterage Company v. London Graving Dock Company [1902], 2 Ch. 557, per Stirling, L.J., at p. 573). Here the road was not a way of necessity, because access could be had by another road. Where there were two possible roads of access the landlord was entitled to decide which should be used by the tenant (Bolton v. Bolton, 1879, L.R. 11 Ch. D. 968). In any view the road was not necessary for the convenient working of the farm and was not a suitable access. The evidence as to the road being an old public road was incompetent in the present action, and should not have been admitted (Thomson v. Murdoch, 1862, 24 D. 975).

Counsel for pursuer were not called on.

The Court adhered.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—We have had a long and able argument on behalf of the reclaimer in this case, but I have come to be clearly of opinion that he has not set before us any grounds on which we should interfere with the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary. I have considered that interlocutor, and also the note in which the Lord Ordinary has set forth his views, more than once. I think that that note so fully expresses the justice of the case that I need add nothing to what the Lord Ordinary has said. I move your Lordships to affirm the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—The pursuer here, as tenant of the farm and lands of Manuel Mill, claims right under the existing lease of the farm granted by a former proprietor in 1892 to use a road passing through the farm by a defined line shewn on a plan of the estates which is referred to in the lease. The farm is an ordinary agricultural and pasture farm, with the addition of a mill. The road is not a public one, but neither is it a private one in the sense of being one for the exclusive convenience of the proprietor. It is simply a farm road, passing through the lands let, with gates upon it, and nobody pretends that it is in very good order.

I quite admit that it is necessary for the pursuer, in order that he may succeed, to shew that his right is a contractual one, either expressly or by plain implication. But this right does not depend on the clause in the lease defining the enclosures actually let for tillage or grazing purposes. These are defined by enumerating certain numbers on the estate plan, and of course for their proper purpose they are conclusive. But that does not prevent it being otherwise shewn that there are certain adjuncts of the farm, such as accesses to and from the fields for ordinary agricultural purposes. Nor is it necessary, in my opinion, to shew that these are "ways of necessity" in the sense of their being the only possible accesses to and from the fields. It is enough, as I think, that they are, in a reasonable and obvious sense, intended for the use of the farm through which they run, and that they have been actually so used. The Lord Ordinary has decided the case in favour of the pursuer, both on a consideration of the lease and of the oral evidence. I think he is clearly right, and I should be content simply to express my concurrence in his judgment and the reasons for it.

But lest I should seem to disregard the strenuous if somewhat redundant argument of Mr Cooper on behalf of the reclaimer, I should like to say that the case of Duncan v. Scott, in 1876, 3 R. (H.L.) 69, seems to me about as unlike the present case as can be imagined. That was a case in which a tenant claimed the right to use a road which formed no part of his farm, but was, simply and obviously, the private approach to his landlord's mansion-house. All that he had to found on was a "collateral licence," as Lord Cairns expressed it, granted by a former proprietor to a former tenant, and referred it to a chance conversation between the tenant and the man who shewed him the boundaries of the farm. It was no wonder that the House of Lords held that the old permission was in no sense of the nature of a contract appurtenant to the possession of the farm.

Lord Low.—It is no doubt the case that the road in question is not expressly included in the subjects let to the pursuer, but that is equally true of every road upon the farm, including the road which forms the only access to the mill and the farmhouse and steading. That arises from the fact that the lands let are described in a somewhat unusual way. In the lease the mill and houses are first described, and then the lands are in the first place described generally as "those lands now let to Peter Roberts and to Thomas Binnie, and those other lands in possession of the first party (that is, the landlord), and heretofore let by him as grass parks." That description was evidently, and I think with reason, regarded as being too vague, and accordingly the lease proceeds, "which whole lands hereby let consist of the fields and enclosures marked numbers," and then the numbers are given, "on the plan of the estate of Manuel, made by James Young & Son, and dated 1852."

The numbers by which the various fields are marked upon the plan did not include the roads, which were also marked by distinctive numbers, and accordingly the defender is justified in saying that the roads are not among the subjects expressly let to the pursuer.

The roads, however, are mentioned in the lease. The pursuer is taken bound to keep the road leading from the public road to the mill and farmhouse in good repair, which implies that he had right to use that road. Further, the lessor reserved "the right to himself and others having his permission to use all roads through the lands." I think that that reservation plainly implies that some right to the roads through the lands had been conferred upon the tenant; otherwise there would have been no point in the proprietor reserving right to himself.

The defender, however, contended that there was only an implied right to the tenant to use such roads as were actually necessary for the possession and enjoyment of the subjects let. He admitted that the road to the mill and farmhouse was in that position, and also the portion of the road in question between the letters J and G on the plan No. 6 of process, because without the use of that portion of the road the pursuer would have no access at all to the fields marked 16, 17, 34, and 36 on the plan. It will be observed that the portion of the road between J and G is the portion furthest away from the farm steading and the natural and most direct way to which is along the other portion of the road. The defender, however, maintains that the pursuer is not entitled to use any part of the road except that between J and G, and that to reach that part he must take a long round by a public road by which he can enter the road at the point J.

That certainly appears to me to be prima facie an extravagant contention; but the defender tries to justify it on the ground that the part of the road between the steading and the portion J to G is so steep that it is impracticable for carts, whereas the public road by which the point J can be reached is comparatively level. Now there is no doubt that some parts of the road in question (which runs uphill from the steading) are so steep as to be unsuited to heavy cartage. It is, however, proved that the first part of the road, which is not very steep, forms the best way, and has been used for the purpose of carting manure to the field No. 32 on the plan, and that the remainder of the road is quite suitable for such purposes as moving stock, or taking horses to lands which are being ploughed. Further, I see no reason why the road should not be used for leading corn crops home to the steading, it being downhill all the way.

This therefore seems to me to be a clear case of implied grant, because the road in question runs right through the farm and is plainly of the nature of a service road, and it is also, in my judgment, required for convenient and comfortable enjoyment of the farm.

I have therefore no doubt that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary was right.

Lord Ardwall.—My Lords, I agree. The documents founded on by both parties here consist of the lease No. 10 of process, a Plan No. 6 of process, and a schedule relative thereto. There are several roads on this farm, all of them treated in the same way as the road specially in question in this action; they are excluded from the fields let by the lease, and they are scheduled under the head of "Roads" in the schedule relative to the plan which was shewn to the pursuer when he took the farm. The defender's argument amounts to this: that the pursuer is not entitled to the use of a single road upon the farm, and might be interdicted from using any one of them, unless he is prepared to shew that the road he proposes to use is what Mr Cooper calls a "road of necessity." This contention is, in my opinion, almost too ridiculous for serious consideration, but it has been so completely demolished by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion that I content myself with adopting that opinion so far as this point is concerned.

The reason of this particular road not being included in the portions of ground let to the pursuer may very possibly have been that the landlord desired to make it clear that the road was not in whole or in part to be ploughed up when the tenant came in the ordinary rotation of crops to plough up any of the fields through or alongside of which the road passes; or the whole roads may have been omitted from the lands let in the tenant's interest so as not to impose upon him the duty of keeping them up without special stipulation; and a special stipulation was inserted in the lease binding the pursuer to maintain one of these roads.

My opinion as to roads on a farm is that if a tenant takes a farm through or alongside of which he sees roads laid down on the landlord's property, he is entitled to assume as an implied term of his contract of tenancy that he shall be entitled to use all existing roads unless it be specially stipulated that he shall not do so, and that was not done here, as the Lord Ordinary has very clearly shewn in his examination of the terms of the lease.—20*th December* 1907.

I. Entail—Lease—Sheep Farm—Stipulation Inter Naturalia—Obligation by Heir of Entail in Possession to Take Over Sheep Stock at Termination of Lease—Question Whether Obligation Binding on Succeeding Heir—Proof—Averments as to Nature of Obligation Held Relevant.

II. Succession — Liability for Testator's Debts—Subsidiary Liability of Special Legatee—Competency of Declarator Against Special Legatee When General Representatives of Testator Domiciled Abroad Have Not Been Discussed.

The following statement, as taken from the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary, sufficiently sets forth the circumstances giving rise to this action, the material averments and contentions of the parties.

"The pursuer in this case is the tenant in possession of the farm of Ardery, under a lease entered into between him and Sir Rodney Stuart Riddell. The duration of the lease was fifteen years from Whitsunday 1903, with an option to either party to terminate the lease at the end of the fifth or tenth year thereafter, on twelve months' notice. The farm of Ardery is part of the entailed estate of Sunart, in the county of Argyll, to which the defender succeeded on 2nd January 1907 as heiress of entail on the death of her brother Sir Rodney. Shortly after her succession her agents gave notice terminating the lease at Whitsunday 1908; and the pursuer does not deny that the lease will come to an end as at that date.

"When the pursuer entered upon the farm he was required to take over the sheep stock from the outgoing tenant as valued by arbiters, and the total price he paid for it amounted to £1319, 1s. 11d. The lease contains a clause with regard to the delivery of stock at its termination, which is quoted in Cond. 2. It takes the tenant bound to deliver to the landlord or incoming tenant, as far as possible, not more than the same number of sheep of the same classes as he received at his entry; and the proprietor agreed that the pursuer should receive the same prices as he paid on his entry for the stock so delivered. The defender's agents, soon after she succeeded to the entailed estate, intimated to the pursuer that she repudiated any obligation to take over the sheep stock; and the leading conclusion of the action deals with this matter. The pursuer seeks declarator that the obligation undertaken by Sir Rodney Stuart Riddell is binding on the defender as heiress of entail in possession of the said lands in succession to him. This declarator proceeds on the assumption of the defender surviving the term of Whitsunday 1908, when the obligation, if there be one, becomes prestable. But it is obviously convenient that the question of law should be decided before the actual arrival of the term, so that parties may be able to make arrangements for the disposal of the sheep stock; and although the defender pleads that some of the other conclusions [i.e. the third and fourth conclusions as set forth infra] are premature and fall to be dismissed, there is no corresponding plea with regard to the first two conclusions. The argument for the defender was accordingly substantially directed, on this point, to the second, fourth, and fifth pleas in law. These pleas raise the general question whether an obligation by an heir of entail in possession of a sheep farm to take over the sheep stock at the termination of a lease to which he is a party, is binding on the succeeding heirs of entail.

"Before considering the law it is necessary to advert to the averments which the pursuer makes and of which he asks a proof. He says that an obligation binding the tenant to deliver the sheep stock at the termination of the lease, and a corresponding obligation on the landlord to pay for the stock at a fixed or valued rate, is, and has from time immemorial, been a universal condition of sheep-farm leases in the north and west of Scotland, and is founded on the considerations (1) that sheep stock in that part of the country requires to be acclimatised to a particular farm or district; and (2) that sheep stock habituated to a certain holding does not wander beyond the boundaries, and this enables march-fences to be dispensed with. For these reasons the condition is one entirely in the interest of the estate and of the succeeding proprietors, who would find their holdings practically unlettable if the stock were dis-plenished at the termination of each lease. Without this condition the farm could never have been let in terms of the deed of entail for 'the highest rent that could be got from a good and responsible tenant.' The term of entry and the ish of the lease were also fixed in accordance with the condition that the stock was to remain on the ground, as it is impossible to remove sheep from such a farm at the term of Whitsunday, when lambs are too young to travel, or to realise sheep stock at that term except at a ruinous loss. He further avers that the leases on the estate of Sunart, including those granted by the entailer, have always contained a similar condition. These averments are denied by the defender, who further maintains that they are irrelevant. She admits that the obligation would have been prestable against Sir Rodney Riddell if he had survived the termination of the lease, and might also possibly be binding on his executors, but maintains that it cannot affect an heiress of entail 'who takes the estate by singular title and is not liable for the personal contracts of predecessors; and she says that the obligation to take over the sheep stock is merely a personal contract, and not the less so because it occurs in a lease of heritable subjects."

The Lord Ordinary sustained the first plea in law for the defender, and dismissed the third and fourth conclusions of the action; quoad ultra, repelled the second plea in law for the defender, and allowed a proof.

Lord Salvesen [after narrating the facts as set forth above].—It is singular that this question has not hitherto been made the subject of direct decision; and I think it may be assumed in the pursuer's favour that heirs of entail in possession have not hitherto disputed the binding character of similar obligations though undertaken in leases granted by their predecessors. In some cases, perhaps, they might have no interest to do so; but in others, especially during the last thirty or forty years, when such obligations are supposed to have become specially onerous, owing to an alleged practice of valuators to overvalue sheep stock, in a question with a landlord it cannot but have been to the interest of heirs of entail in possession to repudiate such obligations if they thought that they could do so successfully; and if the pursuer's averment as to the custom of inserting similar clauses in leases of sheep farms is to be accepted, such cases must have been very numerous.

I was referred to various authorities, from which I think it appears to be indisputable that a lease granted by an heir of entail as an act of ordinary administration, is binding on a succeeding heir if it has been made real by possession before the succession opened. Now I think if the pursuer's averments are established, that the lease in question was an act of ordinary administration in connection with such a subject as a sheep farm. On the same assumption the obligation which is objected to must, in the general case, be one which it is to the interest of an heir of entail in possession that he should be able to grant, whether he happen to survive the termination of the lease in which it occurs or not. It may be presumed that the rent payable by the tenant depends, at least in part, on the landlord undertaking this obligation, and would have been less if there had been no such obligation, if, indeed, the subjects would have been lettable at all as a sheep farm for a period of five years. It may be that in certain circumstances a burden may be imposed on a succeeding heir of entail for which he receives no corresponding advantage, but that is not conclusive against the burden being one which runs with the lands. In the case of Queensberry, 18th February 1814, F.C., it was held lawful for an heir of entail to stipulate for forehand rents in corn farms, so as to deprive the succeeding heir of the right which might have been otherwise competent to him in preference to executors, if the legal and conventional terms had been the same; and the subsequent case of Breadalbane v. Jamieson, 1877, 4 R. 667, shews that an heir of entail may, by an act which is not in contravention of the entail, impose a burden on the succeeding heir from which the latter receives no corresponding benefit. The particular act that had this effect was the destruction of the existing mansion-house, which to the extent of its value must have diminished the value of the entailed estate, and the rebuilding of which had only been commenced when the heir of entail died.

Outer House. Lord Salvesen.

Other burdens which might be undertaken in a lease by an heir of entail, and yet be made to affect the succeeding heir to his disadvantage, may easily be figured. In the lease in question, for instance, there is an obligation by the lessor to put the fences and gates in a proper state of repair and to reroof the old farm buildings with corrugated iron. This obligation might not have been implemented before the death of the granter, although the tenant had made his right real by entering to the farm; but I apprehend that, as an ordinary act of administration, the burden would then have fallen to be discharged by the succeeding heir, subject, possibly, to any right of relief he might have against the executors of his predecessor, if the obligation ought, in ordinary course, to have been implemented before the succession opened.

I was referred by the defender to a series of cases with regard to ameliorations, which are summarised by Lord Deas in his opinion in the case of Breadalbane v. Jamieson at p. 675. In all these it was held that an obligation by a lessor of entailed lands to pay his tenant for buildings erected by him, or meliorations made by him during the currency of the lease, was not binding upon a succeeding heir of entail who was in possession when the lease expired. These decisions rest upon the principle that an heir of entail is not bound by the personal contracts of his predecessor; and that such an obligation, although occurring in a lease, is to be treated as "extrinsic of its character as a real right, and not even essential to its objects as a contract." See Lord Deas' opinion in M'Gillivray's Exrs., 1857, 19 D. 1106. I was also referred to the two recent cases of the Earl of Galloway v. The Duke of Bedford, 1902, 4 F. 851, and 1904, 6 F. 971, in which the law on this subject was fully discussed in the First Division. In the earlier of these two cases a lease of salmon and trout fishings by an heir of entail was reduced by his successor on the ground that a grant of trout fishing creates merely a personal obligation upon the granter, and does not therefore affect the lands. But in that case the principle was clearly recognised that a lease which is within the ordinary powers of administration of an heir of entail in possession, when made real by the tenant having entered on the subjects, is binding on succeeding heirs of entail. The decision, therefore, does not affect the present case, unless it be affirmed that an obligation to take over sheep stock at the end of the lease of a sheep farm is necessarily outwith the range of proper administration. Obligations of a similar kind are common in agricultural leases; e.g., obligations to take over dung or straw left by the tenant at the expiry of the lease, at a valuation. It may be that a succeeding heir of entail has not the same interest to challenge the validity of such an obligation as he has in the present case; but, in principle, the two seem to be indistinguishable, and both must be treated either as personal contracts or, as I think, as part of the real right acquired by the tenant in possession under a written lease, and as such binding upon singular successors, including heirs of entail. Accordingly, I have come to the conclusion that I must repel the second plea in law for the defender, and allow the parties a proof of their averments on this head.

If the view I have expressed be sound, it is probably of small consequence how the third and fourth conclusions are dealt with, but in any event they must be disposed of. The third conclusion seeks a declarator that the whole heritable and moveable estate of the late Sir Rodney Stuart Riddell is liable for the obligation in question; and the fourth seeks a declarator that the defender, as special legatee of certain moveables [including the furniture and silver plate], is liable for the obligation to the extent of the value of the moveables she has received; or, alternatively, that she is liable subsidiarie and subject to the condition that the trustees and executors of the deceased shall have been first discussed. [The said trustees were domiciled abroad, and had refused to prorogate jurisdiction in this action. The defender's first plea in law was as follows:—"The trustees and executors of Sir Rodney Riddell not being parties to the action, the defender is entitled to have the third and fourth conclusions thereof dismissed as incompetent against her." The second plea was that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant.] In my opinion the third conclusion cannot be competently dealt with in the absence of the executors and general representatives of the deceased. No judgment pronounced in this action would be res judicata against them, and if the obligation upon which the pursuer founds be one which cannot be enforced against the heir of entail, it follows that the deceased's trustees are the proper parties to convene in a declarator of this kind. The same observation applies to the fourth conclusion, which—as far as I know—is quite unprecedented. If the general representatives are ultimately found liable in the obligation, it follows that the defender will have to make it good to the extent of any moveable estate which she has taken by succession. But I think it would be out of the question that she should have to litigate a matter in which she is not primarily interested, and may not be interested at all, if there are sufficient funds to meet the deceased's whole obligations as well as the legacies which he bequeathed. The pursuer's proper course is to sue the trustees and executors in their own forum; and if he constitutes his claim against them and fails to recover his debt from want of funds, he may perhaps be entitled to have recourse to the defender to the extent to which she has obtained benefit from the estate, but it will be time enough to decide this when the question is raised. I shall accordingly dismiss these conclusions.—4*th December* 1907.

Gavin's Trustees v. Walker's Trustees.

I. HUSBAND AND WIFE—MARRIAGE CONTRACT—FUNDS SETTLED BY WIFE'S FATHER IN MARRIAGE CONTRACT ON WIFE IN LIFERENT WITH LIFERENT TO HUSBAND IN CASE HE SURVIVE — CONVEYANCE BY WIFE TO MARRIAGE-CONTRACT TRUSTEES OF ACQUISITA AND ACQUIRENDA — DIVORCE OF HUSBAND AND PREDECEASE OF WIFE—LIFERENT FORFEITED BY HUSBAND—HELD IN A QUESTION BETWEEN MARRIAGE-CONTRACT TRUSTEES OF PARTIES AND WIFE'S EXECUTORS, THAT FORFEITED LIFERENT FELL TO WIFE'S EXECUTRY.

II. SUCCESSION—LEGITIM—FUNDS SETTLED IN MARRIAGE CONTRACT ON WIFE IN LIFERENT WITH LIFERENT TO HUSBAND IN CASE HE SURVIVE—DIVORCE OF HUSBAND AND PREDECEASE OF WIFE—LIFERENT FORFEITED BY HUSBAND AND FALLING INTO WIFE'S EXECUTRY — CLAIM BY CHILD OF LEGITIM OUT OF FUNDS FALLING INTO WIFE'S EXECUTRY FROM LIFERENT FORFEITED BY HUSBAND—HELD (1) THAT CHILD ENTITLED TO LEGITIM OUT OF SUCH FUNDS; AND (2) THAT PROPER DIVISION OF SUCH FUNDS FOR PURPOSES OF ASCERTAINING AMOUNT OF LEGITIM WAS TRIPARTITE.

This was an action of multiplepoinding to which the parties were (1) the trustees acting under the marriage contract of Mr and Mrs Gavin, pursuers and real raisers, and also claimants; (2) the trustee acting under the trust disposition and settlement of Mrs Gavin; and (3) Mrs Georgina Gavin or Johnstone, daughter of the first parties, with consent of her husband.

The facts of the case are fully related by the Lord Ordinary.

The Lord Ordinary issued the following interlocutor:—

"Finds, upon a just construction of the documents libelled, (1) that the claimants the trustees under the antenuptial contract entered into between Mr and Mrs Gavin are entitled and bound, as such trustees, to hold the capital sum of £5000, forming part of the fund in medio, until the death of Mr Gavin; (2) that the claimant Mrs Gavin's testamentary trustee is entitled to be ranked and preferred to the fund in medio, so far as consisting of interest; (3) that the said fund, so far as consisting of interest, is subject to a valid claim at the instance of the claimant Mrs Johnstone for legitim; and (4) that, in ascertaining the amount of said claim for legitim, the division of the third fund must be tripartite and not bipartite."

Lord Dundas.—The fund in medio in this multiplepoinding is a sum of £5000, which the late Dr George Walker bound himself, under the marriage contract of his now deceased daughter, Mrs Mary Scott Walker or Gavin and her husband, to pay to the trustees thereunder (who are now represented by the pursuers and real raisers), together with the income and interest accrued thereon, from 14th July 1899—being the date of Mrs Gavin's death—to the date of the present action. Mr and Mrs Gavin (she being then Miss Mary Scott Walker) were married on 11th January 1866. They entered into an antenuptial marriage contract dated 8th and 10th

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Dundas.

Gavin's Trustees v. Walker's Trustees.

January. By the said contract the bride made over to the trustees therein named her whole property, heritable and moveable, then belonging or resting owing to her, or that should pertain and be owing to her during the subsistence of the marriage (excepting, inter alia, the sum or sums to which she might derive right under and in virtue of the obligation by her said father, thereinafter written), for the purposes of paying the annual proceeds of the said means and estate to herself, during her lifetime; and after her death, if her husband should survive her, to her said husband during his lifetime; and on the death of the spouses, of paying or delivering over the fee or capital of the said means and estate to the child or children of the marriage, subject to a power of appointment which it is unnecessary here to refer to in detail. By the said contract, the bride's father, Dr Walker, bound himself to make payment to the trustees at the first term of Whitsunday or Martinmas after his death, of the sum of £5000 in trust for the following purposes, viz.:—"To pay the interest and produce of the said sum to the said Mary Scott Walker during all the days of her life, and after her death, in the event of her being survived by the said John Gavin, to pay the said interest or produce to him during all the days of his life; and on the death of the survivor of the said spouses, the said trustees are hereby directed to pay over one-half of the capital of the said sum to the child or children of the said marriage, subject to the power in favour of the said intended spouses afterwritten of appointment and division among the said children and their issue and of substituting an annuity; . . . to pay over the other half of the capital of the said sum of £5000 on the death of the survivor of the said spouses, to whomsoever the said Mary Scott Walker may appoint. . . ."

One child was born of the marriage—a daughter—who is now Mrs Johnstone, and is, along with her husband and their marriage-contract trustees, a party to the case. The marriage was dissolved on 14th March 1885, by decree of divorce in an action by Mrs Gavin against her husband, upon the ground of his desertion. Mrs Gavin died, as already mentioned, on 14th July 1899. Mr Gavin is still alive. Mrs Gavin left a trust disposition and settlement and codicils by which she disponed her whole estate to trustees, of whom the claimant Mr C. C. Nisbet is now the sole survivor. By her settlement, Mrs Gavin, in exercise of the power of apportionment contained in her marriage contract with regard to the said sum of £5000, directed and appointed that the one-half thereof, which is by said marriage contract to be paid, on the death of the survivor of Mr Gavin and herself, to the child or children of the marriage, should be laid out in the purchase of an annuity to or for behoof of her daughter Mrs Johnstone; and with regard to the other half of the £5000, which is directed to be paid, upon the death of the survivor of Mr Gavin and herself, to whomsoever she might appoint, Mrs Gavin directed the same to be paid to her trustees for behoof of her mother, Mrs Walker, for her liferent use allenarly; and after that lady's death (which occurred on 15th September 1900), to be divided and paid over to and among a variety of charitable and other institutions, and certain persons named in the settlement.

In 1901 a special case was brought in the Court of Session for the decision of various questions in regard to the funds settled by Mrs Gavin and her father respectively in her marriage contract, other than the one-half of the said sum of £5000 directed to be paid to whomsoever she might appoint, as to which one-half no question was at that time raised. The case is reported 1901, 4 F. 278, affirmed 1903, 5 F. (H.L.) 24. The parties to the case were (1) the present pursuers and real raisers; (2) Mrs Johnstone's marriage-contract trustees; (3) the trustees under Mrs Gavin's settlement; and (4) Mrs Gavin. The result of the decision, briefly put, was (1) that, even if the fund had vested in Mrs Johnstone, she was not entitled to payment of it until the death of her father; and (2) that the liferent forfeited by him fell to her mother's executors.

To complete the history of the matter, it should be explained that Dr Walker died on 28th September 1866, leaving a trust disposition and settlement and codicils, and survived by his daughter Mrs Gavin and by a son George. The terms of the settlement are summarised in Art. 10 of the Condescendence annexed to the summons; and are more fully set forth in the report of a special case which was submitted to the Court for its judgment upon the construction of the settlement (Walker's Trs., 1870, 8 M. 870). The Court found that the son's share did not vest in him at and prior to his decease, and was not conveyed by a trust settlement which he had left, but that the same devolved upon Mrs Gavin under her father's trust settlement; and that the said devolved share was carried to the trustees under her marriage contract by force of the general conveyance of her estate therein contained.

In this state of the facts, competing claims are made to the fund in medio. I think there is little doubt that the capital of the £5000 must remain, as it is at present, in the hands of the marriage-contract trustees. During the life of Mr Gavin this has, I apprehend, been so decided by the House of Lords (5 F. (H.L.) 24), in regard to one-half of the said sum; and I see no sufficient ground for arriving at a different conclusion in regard to the other half. The words "on the death of the survivor of the said spouses" appear to me plainly to govern both branches of the clause in the marriage contract; and the reasoning which led to the decision upon the one-half is, in my judgment, equally applicable to both. I did not, indeed, gather that any argument was seriously pressed to the contrary of this view.

But the delicacy of the case arises in regard to the proper disposal of the fund in so far as it consists of income accruing since Mrs Gavin's death. It is claimed, on the one hand, by the marriage-contract trustees, and, on the other hand, by Mrs Gavin's testamentary trustee. By the decision in the House of Lords to which I have referred, the liferent forfeited by Mrs Gavin was held to fall to Mrs Gavin's executry. It was argued to me on the part of the marriage-contract trustees that their claim in a question with the executor is not in any way precluded by this judgment. In this I think they are right, for the plain reason that the question now arising does not appear to have been raised in that case, or to have been under the consideration of the Court or the House of Lords. . . .

I think that, even if the House of Lords had had before them the argument submitted to me on behalf of the marriage-contract trustees, they would still have preferred the claim of the executor or testamentary trustee. For the basis of the judgment seems to be that, Mr Gavin's liferent being in effect struck out of the instrument, what is taken from the husband must enure to the wife, and there is a resulting trust in her favour. In other words, the marriage-contract trustees hold this liferent right for Mrs Gavin, and the only question is whether it does or does not fall within her conveyance to them of acquisita and acquirenda. In my opinion it does not. What she conveyed to them was (a) what belonged to her at the time of the marriage, which this liferent certainly did not; and (b) what should "pertain and be owing to her during the subsistence of the marriage"—which, again, seems clearly to exclude this liferent, because it came to her, not during the subsistence but by the dissolution of the marriage. Even if the effect of the forfeiture was, as was argued to me, to increase the estate of Dr Walker after his daughter's death by the amount of the liferent forfeited by Mr Gavin, the result would not, in my judgment, be different. For the daughter, as has been explained, was the only person who had any interest in the residue of her father's estate; and the right to the forfeited liferent being thus in her, plainly fell to her testamentary trustee, unless the marriage-contract trustees could shew that it was included in the terms of her conveyance to them, which, for the reasons already stated, I think it was not.

If these views be sound, one must next consider a claim put forward on behalf of Mrs Johnstone to a share in this portion of the fund in name of legitim, which is disputed by Mrs Gavin's testamentary trustee. In my opinion the claim is well founded. If I am right in holding that the forfeited liferent falls within the executry estate of Mrs Gavin, I find it difficult to see why it should not be subject to legitim. It was urged that the forfeited liferent, being ipsa natura income and not capital, and income accruing only after Mrs Gavin's death, must be excluded from the legitim fund. I was referred to the well-known case of M'Murray, 1852, 14 D. 1048; but it does not seem to me to help the argument. It was there decided that children are not entitled, in claiming their legitim, to a share of the profits arising after their father's death from his business which had been lawfully carried on by his trustees. The demand for legitim was not made for a number of years after the father's death, owing to the minority of the children. But when it was made, the estate in which the legitim fund was included was clearly that of the father as at his death, and not as it stood—whether enlarged or diminished by the actings of the trustees—at the date of the claim. The Lord President (M'Neill) thus summed the matter up (at p. 1053): "I think their [the trustees'] employment of the fund was justified and warranted by the deed. It was not the legitim which was employed. The legitim was a debt to be paid when claimed, the debt being a certain share of the estate as at the father's death. Does it differ from any other debt or legal obligation? I think not; and therefore do not think the profits can be said to be part of the legitim, or that the trustees are accountable to the children for them." I was further referred to cases under the Thellusson Act, which were said to support by way of analogy the contention that this money was indelibly stamped with the character of income, and could never be regarded as an aliquot part of the capital of Mrs Gavin's moveable estate (Logan's Trs., 1896, 23 R. 848; Campbell's Trs., 1891, 18 R. 992). I have studied the cases, but I have not been able to extract from them any useful guidance by way of analogy or otherwise upon the point under consideration. Counsel for Mrs Johnstone, on the other hand, drew my attention to two decisions, Muirhead, 1867, 6 M. 95, and Pringle's Trs., 1872, 10 M. 621, which are cases dealing with the ascertainment of legal rights, and do, I think, throw light on the present question. In Muirhead, a husband who died in 1865 had two policies of insurance on his own life, dated respectively in 1835 and 1839. It was held that the sums contained in these policies formed part of his executry estate subject to jus relictæ. The Lord President (Inglis), after pointing out that the obligation under the policies was necessarily not one to pay to Mr Muirhead himself, proceeds thus (p. 98): "But although the obligation never could be implemented to Mr Muirhead himself, if it be an obligation to pay to his executors, because they are his executors, it seems impossible to resist the conclusion that the sums in these policies form part of the executry estate; and, if so, cadit quæstio, because the executry estate is just the fund to be divided, and of which one-third falls to the widow by virtue of her jus relictæ. If this money did not form part of the executry, I do not know what is to become of it; it is part of the succession; it is not heritable, but moveable; and, as nobody can take it but as succeeding to the deceased, it must be included in the free executry estate. But, if so, is it to be excluded from the operation of that rule of law by which the moveable succession in intestacy is divisible into three equal parts? That would be very strange and anomalous, because, if the widow is not entitled to any part of it, I presume that the children are as little entitled to a share, and the result would be that the whole amount would go to increase the dead's part." This case seems to show at least that money may form part of an executry estate and be subject to jus relictæ or legitim, although it was not, and could not be, paid to the deceased during his life, but only to his executors. Pringle's case followed a few years later. There, a husband predeceased his wife, upon whose life he had effected two policies of insurance. It was held, in a question with children claiming legitim, that the policies formed part of his moveable estate at the date of his death, and, in calculating the amount of legitim, were to be valued at their actuarial value, that is, at their real value in the market. It is to be observed that here (differing from the facts in Muirhead) the policies were current at the death of the husband and father; and this distinction was commented on by the learned judges; but they decided—to use the words of the Lord President (Inglis) at p. 624—"on very much the same grounds on which we decided the case of Muirhead." His Lordship added: "I take leave to say that that was a very well-considered case, and it is one from the principles of which I see no reason to depart." I have studied this question as well as I can with the aid of the cases cited; and I confess that I see no good answer to Mrs Johnstone's demand for legitim. The forfeited liferent must, I think, be considered as part of Mrs Gavin's executry estate. I do not see how otherwise it could be dealt with. If this is so, I do not understand why it should not be subject to legitim.

The next and last question for decision then arises. It is whether the division of these funds in ascertaining the amount of legitim should be bipartite or tripartite. My opinion is in favour of the latter of these alternatives. In support of the contrary view, I was referred to the following authorities:—Ersk. Inst., III. ix. 20; Bank. Inst., III. viii. 15; Nisbet, 1726, M. 8181; Borthwick, 1685, ibid.; Jervey, 1762, M. 8170; Johnston, Hume 290. But these authorities appear to deal with the renunciation by a wife of her jus relictæ, by acceptance of a special provision in satisfaction of it, which may result in a bipartite division of the husband's executry estate, between the legitim fund, on the one hand, and the dead's part, on the other. The old case of Hamilton, 1561, M. 8178, to which I was also referred, and which depended upon forisfamiliation, would not, I apprehend, be now good law; but, if it were, it would merely be a case where the children's claims were satisfied or lawfully excluded, which would naturally result in a bipartite division. The answer to the argument in favour of such a division appears to me to be found in the principles explained by the House of Lords, though not laid down for the first time, in the special case already referred to, of which this multiplepoinding is the sequel. The statutory forfeiture by Mr Gavin of his liferent, as a consequence of his divorce, enures to the benefit of his wife and of no one else. It is quite a different case from that of the exclusion or voluntary discharge of rights in consideration of some substituted provision. The effect of Mr Gavin's forfeiture was, in my judgment, equivalent to an assignation by him of his lost interests in favour of his wife.

The parties desired that I should, at this stage, do no more than embody my opinion upon the points argued, in the form of findings; and this course I shall accordingly adopt.—10*th December* 1907.

Process—Summons—Amendment—Action for Payment of a Sum Part of Which was Not Due at the Date of the Action—Amendment Increasing the Sum Sued For—Act of Sederunt, 20th March 1907, sect. 2 (f)—Crear v. Morrison, 1882, 9 R. 890, Distinguished.

In this action T. & R. Duncanson sued George Anderson for payment of the sum of £580.

The pursuers averred that they were proprietors of a plot of ground, and that the defender had agreed to take over one feu of the said plot and become responsible for the erection of a tenement on that feu. They further averred that a mason and contractor, Elphinstone Forrest, performed the mason work for the said tenement, and that the sum sued for was due to Forrest by the defender for that work. The pursuers paid Forrest this sum and obtained from him an assignation, in virtue of which they sued the defender.

The defender, after the case had been heard, added this plea to the record: "In any event the action is premature and incompetent, the sum sued for not having been due when the action was raised."

The facts, so far as bearing on this plea, are set forth in the Lord Ordinary's opinion.

Lord Mackenzie [after stating the facts].—A difficulty has, however, arisen in consequence of a point taken by the defender for the first time in his amendment on 14th November 1907. The point is that, under the agreement founded on, the sum of £580 sued for was not due at the raising of the action, one half being payable by bill at three months. Article fourth of the agreement provides for payment of instalments as the same shall be fixed by the architect, one half in cash and the other half by bill at three months. The certificates founded on are dated 7th March and 6th April, and the action was raised on 11th April 1907.

The defender founds on the case of Crear v. Morrison, 1882, 9 R. 890, which decides that it is incompetent to raise action or use diligence upon a debt not yet due. I am accordingly of opinion that as regards one half of the sum of £580 sued for the action was premature. It was argued that if this was so the whole action was bad, and Crear was founded upon in support of this proposition. In that action, however, what was sued upon was a running account for £47, 15s. 7d. commencing 16th February and ending 28th November 1881. The bargain between the pursuer and defender was that four months' credit was to be given on a running account. An action was brought on the 1st February 1882, and this was dismissed. The defender here maintained that there were in Crear's case items in the account to the extent of £5, 5s. 7d. in respect of which the four months' credit had expired when the action was raised. These, according to his argument, were due when the action was brought, and yet the Court did not grant decree for their amount; in the same way it was contended that the present action should not be held good quoad the one half of the £580 which was payable in cash, and therefore due when the action was brought. In the case of Crear, however, what was produced and sued on was a running account. As the Lord President points out, there were a great many dates in it, but that did not rob it of the character of a running account. The pursuer had agreed to allow the defender four months' credit on a running account. The account there could not be split up. That, however, does not appear to me to be an authority which supports the defender's contention in the present case, that the action may not be insisted in as regards one half of the sum sued for, which under the agreement it was stipulated should be paid in cash.

The next question is, What is to become of the action as regards the one half of the £580 which was not due when the action was brought? The result of Crear's case would be that to the extent of one half of the sum sued for the action should be dismissed as premature. The pursuer, however, maintained that under the Act of Sederunt of 20th March 1907, sect. 2, subsect. (f), he should be allowed leave to amend, to the effect of reinstating the one half of the sum sued for which since the action was raised has become due. The terms of the material portion of sect. 2 (f) are these:—"It shall be competent for the pursuer, at any time before final judgment, to amend the conclusions of the summons or other writ to the effect of increasing the sum for which he sues, or subjecting any other additional funds or property to the adjudication of the Court."

Now, suppose in the present case the pursuers had originally brought their action for only £290, the one half of the £580 which was then due, could they under this subsection competently have added a conclusion for the other £290 when it fell due? I think they could. The liability for these two sums depends on the same contracts and upon exactly the same considerations; if the defender is found liable to pay the one half he must be found liable (in some process) to pay the other half, because the issue involved in the case is whether he is liable to pay the whole. I should be slow to take any course in this case which would encourage the idea that a creditor can sue for a debt before it is due. The circumstances, however, are peculiar. The objection was not stated by the defender until after the case had been heard and was at avizandum, and after considerable expense had been incurred. If it had been stated in the original defences, the result might have been different. If no part of the sum sued for had been due when the action was raised, I do not think the course of procedure indicated as after mentioned could have been allowed.

I think, in the circumstances of this case, the defender should be allowed to place himself (if so advised) in the same position as if the other one half of the £580 had not originally been included in the action. This may be done by a minute of restriction. If a motion is thereafter made for leave to amend, by adding the other one half, which is now due, I should be prepared to grant it, and to hear parties on the question of expenses.—12*th December* 1907.

(Lord Mackenzie.)

263. Allan's Executor v. Union Bank of Scotland.

I. DILIGENCE—ARRESTMENT ON DEPENDENCE—BANK—HELD THAT AN ARRESTMENT IN THE HANDS OF A PARTY, THE AGENT OF A BANK, WAS EFFECTUAL TO ATTACH A SUM ON DEPOSIT-RECEIPT WITH THE BANK—GRAHAM V. MACFARLANE & CO., 1869, 7 M. 640, DISTINGUISHED.

II. DILIGENCE—ARRESTMENT—BREACH OF—HELD THAT PAYMENT BY A BANK TO A OF A SUM ON DEPOSIT-RECEIPT IN NAME OF A AND B, "PAYABLE TO EITHER OR SURVIVOR," WAS NOT A BREACH OF AN ARRESTMENT OF ALL SUMS DUE OR BELONGING TO B—DOUBLE DISTRESS—BAD FAITH.

In June 1903 the now deceased Miss Catherine Allan raised an action in the Sheriff Court of Orkney against Mrs Elizabeth Allan or Nicholson and her husband, to recover the sum of £116, which had been deposited with the National Bank in name of Miss Allan and Mrs Nicholson, and payable to either or survivor. This deposit-receipt, as the pursuer averred, was on 18th April 1901 presented by Mrs Nicholson to the branch bank at St Margaret's Hope of the defenders, who issued a new deposit-receipt for £126, 13s. 7d. in name of Mrs Nicholson and her daughter Catherine Allan Nicholson, payable to either or the survivor. Arrestments on the dependence of the action were used in June 1903 in the hands of the defenders' agent at St Margaret's Hope in the terms given in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

On 25th January 1905 the Sheriff (Wilson) found that Mrs Nicholson was liable to account to Miss Allan for the said sum of £116.

Miss Allan having died, the pursuer, her executor, now sued the defenders for payment of the sum of £126, 13s. 7d. He averred that the defenders had paid this sum in breach of the arrestment to Mrs Nicholson or her daughter; that this was done after the proof in the foresaid action was led; and that the defenders' agent at St Margaret's Hope had been examined as a witness in the case, and that the defenders acted in bad faith in making the payment. The defenders averred that the payment was made in good faith and in the ordinary course of business on presentation of the receipt duly endorsed by Miss Nicholson.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia:

"4. The said arrestment being inept and ineffectual to arrest any funds in the defenders' hands, the defenders should be assoilzied.

"5. In any event, the said arrestment being ineffectual to arrest money due to Mrs or Miss Catherine Nicholson, the defenders should be assoilzied.

"6. The defenders having paid the said sum as in duty bound under their contract on the endorsation of Miss Nicholson, are entitled to absolvitor."

Lord Mackenzie.—The first question in this case is whether the arrestments set out in Cond. 4 are effectual to attach any funds in the defenders' hands.

The defenders found on the case of Graham v. Macfarlane & Co., 1869, 7 M. 640, as an authority in favour of their argument that the arrestments are inept. The arrestment was used on the dependence of an action at the instance of Miss Allan against Mrs Nicholson, by which there was "lawfully fenced and arrested in the hands of Alexander Campbell, agent at St Margaret's Hope for the Union Bank of Scotland Ltd., the sum of £120 sterling, more or less, due and addebted by said Union Bank of Scotland Ltd. to the said Mrs Elizabeth Allan or Nicholson."

The question to be considered (as stated by the Lord President in Graham) is, whether this can be read as an arrestment in the hands of Alexander Campbell in his representative capacity as agent of the bank, and as such holding de facto funds belonging to the bank at St Margaret's Hope, the office which issued the deposit-receipt in question. I think it can and should be so read. The terms of the arrestment in Graham's case were different. There the schedule of arrestment bore that the arrestments were used "in the hands of you, Messrs H. & A. M'Ewan, agents of the Union Bank of Scotland at Lochgilphead, the sum of £200, less or more, due or addebted by you to the said Duncan Graham, defender." There was there nothing to shew that the arrestment was not simply in the hands of the firm of H. & A. M'Ewan.

The next question is whether the defenders have, in breach of the arrestment, paid away money attached by it. The pursuer alleges that they have paid away, in breach of the arrestment, the contents of a deposit-receipt £126, 13s. 7d. issued by their branch at St Margaret's Hope, in name of Mrs Nicholson and her daughter Catherine Allan Nicholson, "payable to either or survivor." There is no dispute that the deposit-receipt in question was not endorsed by, or paid to, Mrs Nicholson. It was endorsed by, and paid to, her daughter Catherine Allan Nicholson. The pursuer's case is that the bank should have refused to pay to the daughter, after the arrestments had been used to attach the sum of £120 more or less, due and addebted by the bank to her mother. The argument was that the bank, when called on to pay by the daughter, should have treated the case as one of double distress and have raised a multiplepoinding. The bank's answer is the case of Anderson v. North of Scotland Bank Ltd., 1901, 4 F. 49. The deposit-receipt there was in favour of A and B, "payable to either or the survivor of them." B sued the bank with concurrence of A. The bank averred that the money truly belonged to A, and pleaded that they were entitled to retain it in security of a debt due to them by A. This was held irrelevant, because the bank was bound in respect of the express terms of their deposit-receipt to make payment to A. The bank had given an unequivocal document binding them to pay to two people or either of them. Either was in a position to present the receipt to the bank and demand payment. If that is so I am unable to see in the present case why the fact that the bank were interpelled by arrestment from paying to one, should furnish them with any answer to a demand for payment by the other. If they had no answer to a demand for payment made by Miss Nicholson, it follows that they were perfectly entitled to pay to her. There would only have been double distress had the competing claims been by the arresting creditor and Mrs Nicholson.

There are averments that the defenders acted in bad faith in paying over the contents of the deposit-receipt, founded on statements that the bank's agent knew the whole circumstances of the case. These do not seem to me to be relevant. Whatever his knowledge was he could not refuse to pay to the bank's creditor who produced the document of debt duly endorsed. No arrestment had been used to interpel the bank from paying to the creditor who did present the deposit-receipt. They had no concern with the property of the money, and for this reason the case is different from Matthew v. Fawns, 1842, 4 D. 1242, cited for the pursuer.

I am therefore of opinion that the sixth plea in law for the defenders should be sustained, and that they should be assoilzied, with expenses.—21*st December* 1907.

DILIGENCE—ARRESTMENT—ARRESTMENT TO FOUND JURISDICTION—SUBJECTS ARRESTABLE—SHARES IN LIMITED COMPANY.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. pp. 521, 924.)

The question in this case, at this stage, was whether the pursuers, a limited company having their registered office in Edinburgh, had founded jurisdiction against the defenders, both residing in the United States of America, by the arrestment of certain shares belonging to the defenders in the Missouri Land and Live Stock Co. Ltd., having its registered office in Edinburgh. The arguments and authorities on the point fully appear in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Guthrie.

The American Mortgage Company of Scotland Ltd. v. Sidway and Another.

The Lord Ordinary held that the arrestment of the shares in question had founded jurisdiction against the defenders.

Lord Guthrie.—The pursuers allege that they have founded jurisdiction against the defenders, residents in the United States, by the arrestment of certain shares belonging to the defenders in the Missouri Land and Live Stock Co. Ltd., which has its registered office in Edinburgh. The defenders are admitted to have been proprietors of these shares on 21st March 1903, the date of the alleged arrestment. But the defenders maintain that, by the law of Scotland, shares in limited joint stock companies are not arrestable, and therefore there is no warrant for proceeding against them in Scotland. At the date of arrestment, although dividend appears to have been earned, no sum was actually payable to the defenders either in the shape of dividend or return of capital.

The general rule is thus enunciated by Lord Deas in Lindsay v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 1860, 22 D. 571, at page 596: "All moveable and heritable property in Scotland is attachable in one way or other. We have poinding to attach what is in a man's own own possession; arrestment to attach personal estate in the hands of another; and adjudication to attach heritable property and various other things which cannot be attached by either of the two former diligences." In the case of ordinary partnerships it is not disputed that, while the assets of the Company are not arrestable for debt due by one of the partners, the share of that partner in any balance of the assets belonging to him is arrestable. See Ersk., III. iii. 24; II. Bell's Commentaries 508, note 3, and 536 (I. 3); Parnell v. Walter, 1889, 16 R. 917, per Lord Kinnear, pp. 924–5; Cassells v. Stewart, 1879, 6 R. 936, 8 R. (H.L.) 1, per Lord Gifford, 6 R. 956.

But the defenders deny that the rule regulating ordinary partnerships applies to shares in limited joint stock companies. They found on the principle enunciated in many English cases, such as that of In re George Newman, 1895, 1 Chan. 674, per Lord Justice Lindley at p. 685: "An incorporated company's assets are its property, and are not the property of the shareholders for the time being." From this they argue that no debt was due by the Missouri Land Co. Ltd. to the defenders at the date of the arrestment, and therefore their shares in that Company could not be arrestable. This seems to me to involve a confusion of ideas. As

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Guthrie.

The American Mortgage Company of Scotland Ltd. v. Sidway and Another.

Mr Bell put it (II. Com., p. 71): "It is the obligation to account which is the proper subject of attachment." That obligation exists here as between the defenders and the Missouri Company, and I see no reason if the obligation is, as it seems to be, a present obligation, of more than nominal value, not alimentary and not specially appropriated, why it should not form the subject of a valid arrestment, even although an accounting might be required to ascertain its value. The method of making it forthcoming is illustrated by the form of summons in Mr Graham Stewart's Law of Diligence, p. 847, and the interlocutor in the undefended case of the Mallina Gold Company.

I think the question is decided by the case of Lindsay v. The London and North-Western Railway Co., 1860, 22 D. 571, in the First Division, and by the case of Sinclair v. Staples, 1860, 22 D. 600, in the Second Division. No doubt in Lindsay's case, as the defenders pointed out, there were dividends payable on the shares and also other moveable property, which would of themselves, apart from the shares, have formed sufficient ground for the arrestment; but each of the First Division judges—the Lord President M'Neill, Lord Ivory, Lord Curriehill, and Lord Deas—expressly affirms the arrestability of shares in a joint stock company. In Sinclair's case, where only shares were involved, the defenders argued that the debate turned on whether the proper diligence was arrestment or adjudication rather than on the question of whether either was competent. This is true; but the pursuers in that case maintained that arrestment was not a diligence applicable to a species of moveable property like shares in a joint stock company, and this argument was negatived by the Second Division.

The defenders contended that these cases were not applicable: first, because they were decided with regard to shares in companies under the Joint Stock Companies Act 1856, and the Missouri Land and Live Stock Co. Ltd. was established under the Companies Act 1862; and, second, because the Missouri Company is a limited company. In regard to the first point, I was not referred to any differences between the two Acts which would affect the question now under consideration. The second disappears, when it is observed that the shares of the Company concerned in Sinclair's case were limited in liability.

It appears to me to be sufficient warrant for arrestment in this case that there are here shares in a joint stock company, of present ostensible value, belonging to the defenders, whose interest in them is not alimentary and not specially appropriated, which shares give the defenders a substantial interest in the Company and its assets, and can be turned at any time into money.

The defenders also contended that it had not been proved that the shares possessed any value. The proof does not contain any direct statement on this point, but I think I am bound to assume that shares in a Company which is regularly paying large dividends, and in which there have been periodical returns of capital to the shareholders, must possess substantial pecuniary value. —26*th December* 1907.

265. Home Drummond and Others v. Pepper and Others.

FISHINGS—SALMON—DRIFT OR HANG NETS IN RIVER OR ESTUARY—INTERDICT—ONUS OF PROOF — CIRCUMSTANCES IN WHICH ONUS THROWN ON RESPONDENTS TO PROVE THAT THEY WERE FISHING BY NET AND COBLE OR OTHER LAWFUL MEANS.

Lieutenant-Colonel Home Drummond and others, who were proprietors of salmon fishings on the river Forth, sought to interdict James Pepper, Alexander Ross, Hutchison Wells and others from "fishing for salmon, or fish of the salmon kind, in any part of the river or estuary of the Forth, with the nets known as drift nets or hang nets, and from placing or setting nets of that description in any part of the said river or estuary." The respondents did not deny that fishing by drift or hang nets was illegal as decided by the House of Lords in the case of Duke of Atholl v. Glover Incorporation of Perth (1900, 2 F. (H.L.) 57; 8 S.L.T. p. 77), but denied that they were, in fact, fishing by that method on the occasions condescended on in the statement of facts for the complainers, and averred that they were using "the method of fishing ordinarily known as net and coble." The complainers maintained that the respondents had adopted devices to simulate net and coble fishing in order to deceive the water bailiffs, while in fact they were fishing on the principle of drift or hang nets. The Lord Ordinary held that the circumstances disclosed, viz. the season of the year, the state of the tide at the time, and the nature of the locality in which the respondents were fishing, shifted the onus to them to prove that they were in fact fishing by "net and coble," "sweep net," or other lawful means. He held that they had failed to discharge that onus, and therefore granted interdict against them in terms of the note. The facts which he held to be proved are fully set forth in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

Lord Guthrie.—On 24th July 1907 the respondents Ross and Wells were net fishing for salmon in the Tulliallan fishings, on the river Forth, below Alloa, under a license from James Thomson, the lessee of the fishings. The question in this case is whether they were sweep-net fishing, which is legal, or drift-net (otherwise called hang-net) fishing, decided by the House of Lords in 1900 to be illegal in the case of the Duke of Atholl v. Glover Incorporation of Perth 2 F. (H.L.) 57, overruling the case of Masters of Allan Mortification v. Bernard Thomson, 1879, 7 R. 221 (river Forth fishings), and the subsequent case of Earl of Wemyss v. Earl of Zetland, 1890, 18 R. 126 (river Tay fishings).

This question may be considered under two heads: First, Was the net used by Ross and Wells, in material and construction, a sweep net or a drift net? and second, Were they using the net on the occasion in question as a sweep net, or as a drift net?

Before discussing these questions it is necessary to consider the nature of the fishing ground. Before 1900, only drift-net fishing was practised in this part of the Forth, sweep-net fishing having been found impracticable, in the sense of being unworkable to profit. It is common ground that the ordinary sweep net, such as No. 12 of process, cannot be worked at this part of the river for the purposes of the respondents, who are fishermen for profit, not for sport; the ground is too muddy and the river is too wide; and other forms of net such as the circular net called the "Prospector," spoken to by Bernard Thomson, have been abandoned as indefensible in law. Ordinary sweep-net fishing is not in use much below South Alloa Inch, about five miles higher up the Forth.

But it is said by the respondents that they have been able to lighten the material and alter the construction of the ordinary sweep net so as to adapt it for the Tulliallan fishings at the place in question. In these circumstances, the onus shifts from the complainers to the respondents almost at the outset of the case.

I. Material and Construction.—The material of No. 23, a flax net, said by the respondents to be the net in use on 24th July, is much lighter than the material of No. 12, a cotton or hemp net, produced by the complainers as a specimen of an ordinary sweep net, although not so light as No. 13, produced by the complainers as a specimen of an ordinary drift net. The result of the evidence is that the material of No. 23 is too light for efficient sweep-net fishing, because, during the process of enclosing characteristic of that method of fishing, a heavy strain is put upon the net both by the weight and by the struggles of the fish, while on the other hand the material of No. 23 is well fitted for drift-net fishing, either to catch the fish by hanging them by their gills or teeth, or to take them by entanglement.

As to the construction of the net, an attempt was made to provide the net with three of the features ordinarily distinguishing a sweep net from a drift net, namely, a bag, a staff and bridle, and a tow-rope. The bag is very little deeper than the net, and seems to have been added to the net, not for the purpose of fitting it for the uses of a sweep net, but as a blind. The respondent Ross asserts that "there is no difference between the bag in the net which we have produced and the bag in an ordinary sweep net." But none of the witnesses, not even the respondents' witness Bernard Thomson, from whom the bag was borrowed the day before by the respondents, ever heard of so small a bag in connection with a sweep net. It is too small for a sweep net, without being so large as materially to interfere with the use of the net as a drift net. I refer particularly to the evidence of the complainers' witness, Mr David Robb, of the Tay Salmon Fishery Co. Ltd. The bridle-and-staff apparatus also is abnormally small, and the tow-rope is abnormally light. There was no heavy bottom rope such as is invariably found in sweep nets, and the method of attachment of the net to the top and bottom ropes was that usually associated with drift nets.

II. Use.—The evidence here is contradictory as to, first, whether Ross and Wells had with them two boys or one; second, whether the boy or boys, walking along the muddy shore, had a continuous hold of the tow-rope until Wells got hold of it, or whether the rope was dropped by the boy or boys and allowed to float down with the net until Wells picked it up; third, whether Wells and Ross made a sweep with the net for the purpose of enclosing and landing on the shore any fish that might be in it, or whether the sweep that is spoken to by them was not a pretence when they saw Macrae and the others approaching in their boat from the "Dart," not in the course and for the purpose of sweep-net fishing, but to simulate legal fishing, and to hoodwink or at all events evade the bailiffs; and fourth, whether the fish in the net were dead or alive when taken out of the net.

In view, first, of the time of the year, July, one of the two months most suitable for drift-net fishing, on account of the number of fish, and because, owing to the warmth, the fish swim higher in the water; second, the state of the tide, just the period when the current is not strong enough to swing round a drift net and put it out of fishing order, the "ideal time for hang-net fishing," as the complainers' witness, Beattie, calls it; third, the nature of the locality, specially as spoken to by the complainers' witness, Mr David Bentley Murray; fourth, the material and construction of the net; and, fifth, the small amount of able-bodied strength employed,—I think the onus is on the respondents to prove that they were, in this particular season of the year and state of the tide, specially suitable for drift as distinguished from sweep-net fishing, in this place unsuited for sweep-net fishing, and with this net, the material and construction of which both pointed to drift nets, using the net as a sweep net, and not as a drift net. This onus I think they have failed to discharge.

I accept the situation of the respondents' net at different periods, as shown on the chart produced, No. 11 of process, which, if correct, is inconsistent, especially in the zigzag lines, with the immediate sweep which takes place when the fish are caught by enclosure. I accept also the complainers' version of the time occupied by the respondents between paying out the net (a method, by the way, which is necessary in drift-line fishing owing to the lightness of the nets, and is not usual with the heavier sweep nets, which drop from the stern of the boat without assistance) and taking it into their boat, which in any view considerably exceeds the time occupied in sweep-net fishing. In view of the evidence of Macewan, Struth, and James Henderson, I believe that both the boys Wells and Henderson were present, although the complainers' witnesses, whose attention was chiefly directed to the net and the men, say that there was only one. What the boys were doing on the shore is more doubtful. But whether on this occasion they continued to retain hold of the tow-rope or not till Wells came up, it was evident, from the ages, ten and twelve, of the boys, and from their appearance, that they were not fit to withstand the considerable outward strain that is liable to be put by a tide or river current on the tow-rope in sweep-net fishing, even before the net is begun to be hauled ashore. The evidence as to the condition of the two grilse and the sea trout taken, when first handled by the respondents, is also conflicting, but it is admitted that none of them were in the bag of the net where fish are usually found in sweep-net fishing.

On the whole matter I think the burden of proof has been shifted on to the respondents, and that they have failed to establish the defence contained in their answers.—1*st January* 1908.

PROCESS—PRINTING—HELD THAT WHERE A CASE WAS TRANSMITTED FROM THE SHERIFF COURT UNDER SECT. 9 OF THE SHERIFF COURTS ACT 1877, THE PETITIONER MUST PRINT.

Sect. 8 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. cap. 50) provides for the extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction to certain questions of heritable right or title, etc.

Sect. 9 thereof enacts: —"In regard to every action brought under the preceding section in the Sheriff Court, the following provisions shall have effect; that is to say, (1) If a defender shall, at any time before an interlocutor closing the record is pronounced in the action, or within six days after such an interlocutor shall have been pronounced, lodge a note in the process in the following or similar terms; that is to say, 'The defender prays that the process may be transmitted to the Court of Session,

[Signed by the Defender or his law agent]'

it shall be the duty of the sheriff clerk forthwith to transmit the process to the Keeper of the Rolls of the First Division of the Court of Session, who shall, under the directions of the Lord President of the Court, mark on the petition the Division and the Lord Ordinary before whom it shall depend, and shall transmit the process to the depute-clerk officiating at the bar of such Lord Ordinary; and the process having been so transmitted shall thereafter proceed before the Court of Session as nearly as may be as if it had been raised in that Court."

The petitioners, Ferguson's trustees, presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow craving interdict against the respondents, Brown's trustees, selling, under a power of sale contained in a bond and disposition in their favour, certain lands in which the petitioners were vested.

The respondents had the case transmitted to the Court of Session under sect. 9 of the Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Act 1877.

The petitioners moved the Lord Ordinary to ordain the respondent to print, and argued that, as the respondent was responsible for the case being brought to the Court of Session, he was in the same position as a party appealing for jury trial, and was bound, as in that case, to print.

The Respondents argued: That as sect. 9 provided that the case should proceed as if it had originally been brought in the Court of Session, the usual rule, namely, that the pursuer was bound to print, applied.

Lord Mackenzie.—Seeing that sect. 9 (1) of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1877 provides that after the process has been transmitted it "shall thereafter proceed before the Court of Session as nearly as may be as if it had been raised in that Court," I am unable to see any reason for departing from the usual practice; and therefore I am of opinion that it is the pursuer's duty to print the record.—21*st December* 1907.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Hamilton.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute at Hamilton (A. S. D. Thomson) in an action at the instance of three persons, who were tenants of a farm called South Netherburn Farm, against six defenders, four of whom were coalmasters, one a bricklayer, and the other a grocer. The prayer of the petition was (first) to ordain each of the defenders to abstain from causing to fall or flow, or knowingly permitting to fall or flow, or to be carried from their collieries, works, houses or offices, and others attached to the same into the Netherburn burn at any point in the course of said burn on the pursuers' farm or at any portion of its course prior to entering on the lands of said farm, any poisonous, noxious or polluting liquid whereby the water of the said burn was rendered unfit for the use of man or beast; and (second) to grant decree against the defenders, ordering them jointly and severally to pay damages to the pursuers.

The pursuers averred that the Netherburn burn was the only natural source for obtaining water for the supply of the cattle on their farm, that the defenders had permitted the effluent from coal-washing operations at their collieries and sewage from houses owned by them to flow into the burn, whereby the water was rendered unfit for watering cattle; that some of their cattle had died in consequence thereof, while the supply of milk from the stock was materially diminished and the stock had been decreased in value.

The Sheriff-Substitute found in fact that illness was caused to the pursuers' cattle by drinking water from the Netherburn burn which was contaminated with sewage; that all the defenders, except James Nimmo & Co., The United Collieries Ltd., and William Cooper, contributed to the pollution of the Netherburn burn with sewage; and found in law that the defenders other than the three mentioned were liable in damage to the pursuers for the loss sustained by them, and ordained the defenders James Gemmill, William Barr & Sons, and Charles Surgeoner, in terms of the prayer of the petition, and decerned against them conjunctly and severally for a sum in name of damages.

The circumstances were set forth in the note to the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor as follows:—

I think it is proved that the Netherburn was polluted with sewage; that the pursuers' cattle suffered in consequence; and that all the defenders contributed to the pollution except The United Collieries Ltd., James Nimmo & Co. Ltd., and William Cooper.

That the burn was polluted with sewage to some extent is clearly proved. The various analyses demonstrate this, and many witnesses as well for the defenders as for the pursuers speak to it as the result of their own observation.

That the burn above the properties of the defenders is pure, or comparatively so, is not disputed seriously. Some attempt was made to shew that manure and top-dressing of the fields might account for it, but the evidence was feeble and the parties did not press it. Some attempts were made to shew that houses just south of Surgeoner's contributed more than Surgeoner's and Barr & Sons' houses, but as to this again the evidence was not strong, and I imagine that the pursuers would have called these parties as defenders if they had thought they had a stronger case against them than against those lower down the stream whom they have convened. Mr Duncan C. Barr's evidence makes it clear that the pollution becomes more and more marked as you follow the stream from Surgeoner's property past Barr & Sons' and Gemmill's properties to the bridge, the inference of course being that the defenders, or some of them, are adding pollution to it in its course.

That the pursuers' cattle suffered from drinking the polluted water is, in my opinion, proved. I think the deaths of two heifers and a cow must be attributed to this cause, but not the death of the third heifer, which seems to have died of lead poisoning. I think also that the supply of milk was diminished, and that some of the cattle were in poor condition from drinking polluted water.

Fleming v. Gemmill and Others.

It was strongly contended that it is a mere superstition to hold that sewage-polluted water affects the health of cattle, but I cannot, on the evidence before me, accept this contention. It certainly has not been invented to serve the purpose of the present case, because defenders have produced a pamphlet shewing that before this case arose, the view which they contend for had the support of eminent writers on veterinary subjects. It seems to be the case that cattle do not suffer from typhoid fever, and that they can drink, without any specific disease resulting, water which would be highly dangerous to human beings; but the fact is spoken to by too many witnesses of standing to be disregarded, that sewage-polluted water does irritate the bowels and lower the tone of cattle, even although it does not set up any specific disease. I think this was the case on pursuers' farm. Severe sickness was so prevalent amongst their cattle that the inference of some common cause was irresistible, and in the absence of any other explanation, the conclusion seemed inevitable that the burn water was the cause.

The next question is, Who are responsible for the pollution? The condition of the pursuers' dungstead and tanks will not solve the question. They are no better than they should be, but the blame hardly rests there. I think all the defenders, save those specially excepted above, are proved to have contributed.

As regards William Barr & Sons, the analyses of Dr Tatlock and Dr Clark seem to bear heavily against them, and there is considerable evidence that in some way or other sewage from their property does find its way into the burn.

As regards Charles Surgeoner, there is quite a large body of evidence to shew that the sewage from his southernmost houses, at all events, finds its way into the burn. The same may be said of James Gemmill. He has certainly cleared himself so far as regards his colliery, but there is abundant evidence that, so far as regards his property adjoining the burn, he is the chief offender, and pollutes the burn more than any one else. It is somewhat puzzling that this should be the case, because, like Barr & Sons, he proves that his houses have only earth closets, and that he has provided a septic tank of a kind, yet the fact remains that sewage is discharged from his pipe into the burn, and apparently in considerable quantity.

A question of law remains whether I can award the pursuers damages against the defenders who have polluted the stream, in view of the fact that the other defenders must be assoilzied, and that the pursuers' conclusions are for a joint and several decree against all the defenders. The point of law thus involved will have to be settled some day; at present it is, I think, open to question. There have been opinions both ways in the Supreme Court, and the result here would be so hard to the pursuers if I were to refuse them damages against the parties proved to be at fault, after a very long proof, that I am disposed to give them decree. I have the authority of Lord Moncreiff in Robinson v. Reid's Trs., 2 F. 928, in support of this course. See also Douglas v. Hogarth, 4 F. 148, and Baird's Trs. v. Leechman, 10 S.L.T. 515.

The remaining question is as to the amount of damages which should be awarded to the pursuers. For the two heifers and a cow which died I award £10, £11 and £14, or £35 in all. The third heifer probably died of lead poisoning. For deficiency in milk I award £30. . . . For depreciation in the value of the cattle a large sum is claimed. . . . I think I may allow £50 on this head. These three sums of £35, £30 and £50 amount to £115, for which I pronounce decree.

The defenders Gemmill, Barr & Sons, and Surgeoner appealed to the Court of Session.

A preliminary objection was taken by the appellants to the competency of the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor. They argued that as the prayer of the petition concluded for damages against six defenders jointly and severally, a conjunct and several decree against three of those defenders only was not competent; that to found such a decree the words used in the prayer, "jointly and severally," were not sufficient without the addition of the words "and severally," "or severally or one or more of them," or words to a similar effect. They referred to the following cases:—Robinson v. Reid's Trs., 1900, 2 F. 928; Douglas v. Hogarth, 1901, 4 F. 148; Baird's Trs. v. Leechman and Others, 1903, 10 S.L.T. 515; Mackersay v. Davis & Sons, 1895, 22 R. 368; Wallace v. Braid and Others, 1898, 6 S.L.T. 118; Cook v. Barnton Hotel Co., 1900, 2 F. 1011; Caughie v. Robertson and Others, 1897, 25 R. 1.

The Respondents argued that the decree was competent, and referred to Leslie's Trs. v. Lumsden and Others, 1851, 14 D. 213, and Braidwoods v. Bonnington Co., 1866, 2 S.L.R. 152.

The Court repelled the objection.

The Lord President.—In this case a farmer, the land in whose occupation bounds a certain stream, raised an action in the Sheriff Court against six persons who, he alleged, polluted the stream, and the prayer of the petition was to ordain each of the defenders to abstain from causing a flow from their collieries or works or offices of noxious matters of various sorts, and "(second) to grant a decree against the above-named defenders, ordaining them, jointly and severally, to pay to the pursuer" certain sums of money which the pursuer alleges were the value of cattle which he lost through their being poisoned by the deleterious ingredients of the stream which they had drunk. There was a long proof on the matter, and the Sheriff-Substitute eventually found that the pollution had been caused by three of the defenders and not by the other three; and accordingly he pronounced an interlocutor in terms of the prayer against each of the three defenders, ordaining them to abstain, and granting decree jointly and severally against them for certain sums of money, being the sums at which he assessed the damage. An appeal was taken against that by the three persons found liable, but before going into the question of the merits the point was raised by their counsel that the decree given by the Sheriff was wrong, because it was impossible for the Sheriff to grant such a decree upon the prayer of the petition, in respect that the petition having asked for a decree for payment against six defenders, jointly and severally, it was impossible to grant decree jointly and severally against only three of the defenders.

Perhaps at this time of day it is curious that the point is not perfectly settled, but counsel were unable to bring to our notice any authority deciding the matter, though there are many obiter dicta on one side and on the other. In that state of matters one must take up the matter on principle, and on principle I confess I do not think there is really much in the argument for the appellants. I can quite understand that for precaution's sake the common form of prayer has been more ample than the form in this case; that is to say, I think the common form of prayer or conclusion in a summons has been to find the defenders liable "jointly and severally, or severally," or in some cases where special caution is taken such words may be added as these—"or as their several liability may be determined in the course of the process to follow hereon." But while that is so, I do not doubt that under a prayer or a conclusion asking for a joint and several decree, it is quite possible to give decree in any form that joint and several liability admits of. As to what joint and several liability really means there can be no doubt. Mr Bell in his Principles, for instance, in sect. 56 says quite clearly that joint and several obligation means that "each is liable for the whole or for a share," and there is a passage to the same effect in the Commentaries. It would seem to me an absurd result that if in a prayer or conclusion you echo the words of obligation, you could not get all that the law says the obligation truly means, and upon that very short ground I put my judgment. But I have also discovered an old case which without settling the point seems to me to shew that that is the same view as was held in old times. The case is that of Hay v. Elphinston, January 11, 1763, M. 14658. What happened, as narrated in the report, was this: "James Hay brought an action against Charles Elphinston and John Gray, and also against James Hamilton of Hutchison, concluding for damages and expenses on account of their having wrongfully adjudged him to serve as a soldier during the subsistence of the Press Acts in the years 1757 and 1758.

"The Court, by interlocutor of the 6th of August 1762, found the whole defenders conjunctly and severally liable in £200 of damage and expenses.

"The defenders having reclaimed by joint petition, which came to be moved upon the last day of the session, it was refused as to Mr Elphinston and Mr Gray; but as some of the judges seemed to be of opinion that Mr Hamilton was not equally guilty, the pursuer, in order to be free of any further litigation, agreed at the bar to pass from that gentleman; upon which he was assoilzied.

"The pursuer having extracted the decreet, and charged Mr Elphinston and Mr Gray with horning, a bill of suspension was offered in their name; in which, besides repeating the argument pleaded for them in the original cause, they further insisted: That, in respect of the pursuer's passing from the other defender, Mr Hamilton, they could only be liable in two-thirds of the sum charged for."

In that they were found to be wrong, and the inference to be drawn from the procedure in the action seems to me to be this. At that time reclaiming petitions were dealt with upon their own merits, and it was not necessary, as it is now according to our practice, to recal the interlocutor reclaimed against—at least in part—before proceeding to vary it. An interlocutor used to be pronounced which gave effect to the alteration desired by the Court without disturbing the original judgment, and that was what was done here: the reclaiming petition was refused as to Mr Elphinston and Mr Gray, and, upon counsel at the Bar passing from Mr Hamilton, that gentleman was assoilzied. But the old decree was left alone, and I think it is quite clear that the decree which the pursuer extracted was the original decree in which the three defenders were found jointly and severally liable; that is to say, he went upon the old decree, and he charged Elphinston and Gray alone. That does not settle the point in the present action, but it shews, I think, that if the doctrine urged on the other side had been right, there would have been open a defence which obviously was not considered open—namely, that a decree against three defenders jointly and severally could never be a good basis for a charge against two defenders jointly and severally where the third defender had in the meantime been assoilzied. Accordingly I have no doubt that the Sheriff here is right in so far as regards the question of the competency of the decree.

Lord M'Laren.—When an action is brought against several persons without the addition of words descriptive of the nature of their liability, then I take it that even if one of them should be assoilzied, or if the pursuer should pass from his action against him, the instance would still be good against the defenders who remained, the only question being whether they were liable jointly or severally. In the case I am putting, I think the better opinion is that they would only be liable jointly unless words denoting several liability were added. But then in order to avoid such a result, under which the pursuer would lose a part of his claim, the law authorises the use of the words "jointly and severally." These seem to me to cover the whole ground. The word "severally" implies that against whatever number of defenders a man proceeds, each is liable for the whole sum sued for, and the word "jointly" or "conjunctly" secures to those against whom the decree is made operative the right of rateable relief against the persons who have not paid. This, as I have said, seems to me to cover the whole ground. I am unable to see that the addition of the words "and severally," or the words "or severally," to the description in which "severally" is already contained, can have any meaning at all, and it seems to me that the suggested addition is mere surplusage. I think that the conclusion as it stands is rightly framed, and that under such a conclusion it is perfectly competent to pronounce a decree in the terms pronounced by the Sheriff.

Fleming v. Gemmill and Others.

Lord M'Laren.

Lord Pearson.—The defenders here, six in number, were sued for payment of three separate sums of money, which they were to be ordained jointly and severally to pay to the pursuers to make good certain damage sustained by them. Three of the defenders have been assoilzied, and the remaining defenders now take the objection that no decree can pass against them for want of the words "or severally, or one or more of them," or some similar words in the conclusion of the summons. The expression "jointly and severally" was originally part of the language of obligations, and imported a reserved right, on the part of the creditor of two or more persons in a divisible obligation, to hold them bound, either each for his own share or each for the whole. The question as to the effect of using the expression in the pecuniary conclusion of a summons seems not to have been definitely settled in practice. Perhaps it would be more apt to use the expression "jointly or severally" in a summons. But I see no reason why the expression here used should not be regarded as sufficient to warrant the Court in pronouncing decree against all, or against each, or against one or more even in different shares, according to the view which the Court takes of the liabilities of the various defenders on the merits; and this, even although one or more of the defenders may be assoilzied.—6th December 1907.

The case was afterwards heard on the merits.

Argued for Appellants: (1) A tenant had no title to sue an action of interdict for pollution of a stream unless he could shew that it amounted to a nuisance at common law. An action for mere pollution was competent to a proprietor alone. A tenant had simply the right of user of the stream for the purposes of his farm; the right to sue an action for pollution merely was for an infringement of a common law right which belonged to the proprietor (Armistead v. Bowerman, 1888, 15 R. 814). Gemmill and the pursuers derived right from the same landlord, and it might be that he was doing no more than he was authorised to do by his landlord. (2) The pollution here was admittedly caused by an improper use of the drainage system provided by the defenders on the part of their tenants. In such circumstances the defenders could not be held liable, unless the use was authorised by the leases. The houses must be destined to cause pollution before the landlords could be liable (Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan, 1866, 5 M. 214, at 216 per L.J.C. Inglis; Hamilton v. Dunn, 1838, 3 S. and M'L. 356 at 379, per L.C. Cottenham; Weston v. Tailors of Potterrow, 1839, 1 D. 1218; Devlin v. Jeffray's Trs., 1902, 5 F. 130). But if the landlord was liable in an action of interdict on account of the acts of his tenant, he was not so liable in an action of damages. The case of the Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird & Co. 1876, 3 R. 839, was a case where a village had been established beside a stream and a system of drainage had been provided which was unsuited to the locality, and the proper use of the system caused pollution. Here the proper use caused no pollution, but only the improper use. Where the landlord had no reason to anticipate a misuse of his property he was not liable. [The Lord President referred to Rich v. Basterfield, 1847, 16 L.J. C.P. 273, 4 C.B. 783; Harris v. James, 1876, 45 L.J. Q.B. 545.] There was a distinction between interdict and damages in this matter, because interdict might be granted in respect of a reasonable anticipation of injury, but damages must be for something in the past. (3) In claiming damages against the defenders jointly and severally the pursuers undertook the onus of shewing that they, and they only, contributed to the pollution. Further, they could only recover from each the damages caused by his pollution. The joint and several liability in Smith v. O'Reilly (1800, Hume's Dec. 605) was on the ground of combination or concert for a common purpose. It was so stated by Lord Watson in Palmer v. Wick and Pulteneytown Steam Shipping Co. Ltd., 1894, 21 R. (H.L.) 39 at 44. Mere contribution could not make one liable in damages for the whole wrong. A person was liable only for his own act except where there was concert (Duke of Atholl v. Dalgleish, 1822, 1 S. 511 (n. e. 472); Bell, Prin., sect. 550; Stair, I. 9, 5). (4) In any event interdict should not be pronounced de plano. The defenders should have an opportunity of submitting a scheme.

Argued for Respondents: (1) A tenant had a title to sue such an action as this. Ex adverso of the pursuers' lands there was a stream in which they had a patrimonial interest, which they were entitled to protect. They had the right of the landlord assigned to them by implication for this purpose. The right of the tenant was recognised in Collins v. Hamilton, 1837, 15 S. 895. (2) Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird & Co. (cit.) settled the liability of the landlord in an action such as this. The matter of the construction of the premises was the essential thing here as in that case. Every one was, of course, liable for his own acts, but in addition the person injured was entitled to take the most effectual method by way of interdict to stop the injurious acts (Dunn v. Hamilton, 1837, 15 S. 853 at 872 per L. Pres.). The effluent of several houses owing to their construction reached the stream together, and it was therefore impossible for the pursuers to say which of the tenants committed the pollution. A landlord was liable in respect of the ownership of property the use of which led to injury, if he ought to have seen that that would be the probable result and did not prevent it. Of course he was not liable merely ex dominio, but this admission had clear limitations (Weston v. Tailors of Potterrow, cit., per Lord Medwyn at 1226 and L.J.C. Boyle at 1230). Apart from contribution to injury and negligence he was not liable. The only difference between interdict and damages was a difference in the proof required. (3) The conjunct and several liability of joint wrongdoers was settled by the case of Smith v. O'Reilly (cit.).

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute, found in fact (1) that the pursuers, who were tenants of the farm of South Netherburn, kept a stock of cattle on said farm and watered their cattle from the Netherburn burn; (2) that all the defenders except James Nimmo & Co., The United Collieries Ltd., and William Cooper, contributed to the pollution of the Netherburn burn with sewage; (3) that as the result of the pollution of the Netherburn burn, which was the natural water supply of the pursuers' cattle, the milk supply of the pursuers' cows was diminished and eight or ten of the pursuers' cattle fell off in condition; found in law that in these circumstances the defenders (other than the three above excepted) were liable in damages to the pursuers, and assessed the damages at £80; therefore decerned and ordained the defenders, James Gemmill, William Barr & Sons, and Charles Surgeoner, all conjunctly and severally, to make payment of said sum; and continued the cause that the said defenders last above mentioned might submit to the Court a scheme for the avoidance of pollution of said burn.

The Lord President.—My Lords, in this case questions have been raised both of fact and law. The case is a long one and there is a great deal of evidence, which I do not propose to analyse, because upon the result of it I come to the same conclusion as the judge of first instance. I think it is proved that this stream is polluted, and that there is a material contribution from each of the three defenders Gemmill, Barr, and Surgeoner. But I propose to say a word or two upon the questions of law that were raised in a very anxious and good argument at the bar. First, the defenders raised the question of the title of the pursuers. They said that even admitting that there was pollution which rendered the stream less pure than it was before, and of which a proprietor could have complained, the right of a tenant was somewhat less; that a tenant could not complain of the mere deterioration of the quality of the water, but must raise the question to something equivalent to nuisance; and that the pursuers' case has fallen short of the proof which was necessary for that. I do not think there is any difference in the quality of the title, if I may use such an expression, of the proprietor and of the tenant in this matter. It seems to me that the tenant is the assignee of the landlord's title, by the mere force of the lease, to every extent that it is necessary to give it to him for his protection in the lease, and inasmuch as the subjects let include a stream, one of the natural uses of which is to water cattle at it, it seems to me that the tenant has every right which the landlord had to maintain the purity of the stream. In other words, he is the assignee of the landlord's title in so far as it is necessary for his own protection in the subjects let.

The second point is this: Those persons who are attacked, that is to say the defenders, are landlords but not occupiers. They are proprietors of different blocks of houses from which the pollution comes; and it was very strenuously argued that they were not liable because the wrong, if wrong there was, had been done by the action of their tenants and not by their action. In other words, that the filth which found its way into the stream was not anything for which they were directly responsible. In particular it was pointed out that they had taken proper precautions in the planning out of their houses to arrange that filthy matter should not get into the stream, by the establishment of dry closets which, of course, have no drains communicating with the stream. The state of facts, however, is that while there were these dry closets, there was also a liquid system of drains to which access was got by open syvers and jawboxes in front of the various cottages. This liquid system was run through a sort of cesspool, and then was irrigated upon the land which was upon the banks of the stream. Now upon this matter also there is a good deal of authority, and the difficulty in each case, I think, is to settle into which of the two categories the case is to fall. I take cases as representing the extremity, so to speak, on one side and on the other. As the one extreme I take the position of Lord Melville in the case of the Duke of Buccleuch v. Cowan, 23rd Feb. 1866, 4 M. 475. As the other extreme I take the case of the Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird & Co., 14th June 1876, 3 R. 839. Now in Lord Melville's case the species facti was this: Lord Melville, as proprietor of Melville Castle, joined along with the Duke of Buccleuch, who was proprietor of Dalkeith Palace, and Sir James Drummond, the proprietor of Hawthornden, in order to object to the pollution of the Esk by the paper manufacturers. Lord Melville himself had a property which he let as a mill. Against Lord Melville it was urged that he could not object because he himself—if there was pollution from the mill—was the author of it in respect that he was the proprietor. Lord Justice-Clerk Inglis laid it down that that depended on the terms of the lease, and that if Lord Melville had not by the terms of his lease in any way shewn that he gave his tenants right to pollute, then the pollution was their act, and not his act. The case, on the other hand, of the Caledonian Railway Co. v. Baird & Co. was a case where the Caledonian Railway Company, who had private rights in a canal, objected to the pollution of the water by the inhabitants of a mining village which belonged to Messrs Baird. The Messrs Baird had, as here, made provision for a system of dry closets, but none the less the pollution found its way into the canal, and the Court held that the Messrs Baird could be interdicted because they were responsible for what was happening. It is true that in that case the Messrs Baird seem to have assumed responsibility for what their tenants were doing, and further, that these miners were tenants at will—that is to say, their tenancy depended upon their being employed, and they were all on terms of contract which permitted of their being turned out on the shortest notice. But none the less in that case the law was pretty clearly laid down that if a landlord erects his premises in such a way that what may be called the natural result will be pollution, he will be liable, although in one sense he is not the person who personally contributes to the pollution. The truth is, it would be a very unfortunate result if it were otherwise, because if you had, in one sense, to catch the actual offenders, you would have to proceed to interdict every man, woman, and child living in the place. On the other hand, it is quite clear that where the pollution is due to the ultroneous act of the tenant and is not a thing which the landlord could foresee, then the landlord cannot be liable. In the case of Baird that very point was put by Lord Gifford, who observed that the landlord could not have been held answerable if the miner had run out of his cottage at night with refuse and thrown it into the stream.

Fleming v. Gemmill and Others.

The Lord President.

When I come to apply the law to the facts in this case, the view I take of it is this: Although no doubt there was this provision of earth closets, there still was an opus manufactum, namely, the drain, by which impurities, put in at the syvers and jawboxes, would sooner or later find their way to the stream: and it would be childish not to suppose, from the known habits of such persons as the tenants of these cottages, that pollution would ensue. It is clear that, apart from the grosser form of sewage, there are many forms of sewage, which certainly cause pollution, and which may find their way into the stream by means of a drain which is open as a receptacle for any slops that may be put into it. Therefore, as this opus manufactum exists, I think the landlord must be responsible for what happens in consequence of it.

Then there comes the question of what is to be done. The tenant, I think, is entitled to interdict, but, on the other hand, it has been your Lordships' invariable custom in cases of this sort never to grant interdict de plano as has been done in this case. Therefore, I think the defenders here ought to have an opportunity themselves of submitting some scheme which may remedy the pollution complained of.

But there is another question in this case—the question of damage. The tenants here sue for damage to their cows, which ensued in respect of the effect on their health of the pollution, and that damage is divided into three heads. Three cows, that is, two heifers and a cow, died; there was a deficiency in milk in the whole herd, and there was a deterioration in the value of the herd of cattle themselves. The learned Sheriff-Substitute has granted for these three matters sums of £35, £30 and £50. Upon that also a legal question was raised—namely, as to whether there was conjunct and several liability in respect of the pollution for such damage. It seems to me that there is. As soon as you find that there is a material contribution, then, I think, each person is, so to speak, versans in illicito, and he acts at the risk of being found jointly and severally liable along with other persons for the damage that may ensue.

But there remains the question of damage. Upon the second and third heads I think damage is proved—that is to say, I cannot doubt that these cattle were damaged by drinking bad water. There has been a good deal of somewhat startling evidence in this case as to the effect on the cattle of the water; but I cannot say that I think the evidence, although startling, is very satisfactory; and no wonder, as it is mostly brought out by reading an article of a well-known authority and then asking the witnesses if they agree with it. It seems to me that the article fails in this respect, that it does not exhaust the whole possibilities of the case. I do not think it helps the matter to shew that you cannot have a specific disease without the bacteria or the microbe of that specific disease. That does not end the matter, because it does not exclude the possibility of the general health of any animal being reduced by the drinking of impure water; and although the Court is bound, as far as it can, to follow the course of scientific knowledge, and not to act upon antiquated notions, it does not seem to me that in this case we have yet had it proved that sewage is as good as pure water for cows.

Therefore, upon the two latter heads I entertain no doubt. Of course on this matter of damage—it is a rough thing at best—I should not be disposed to alter the decision which the Sheriff-Substitute has come to. But upon the question of whether the cows that actually died, died of the sewage pollution, I think there is difficulty; and the conclusion that I have arrived at on that matter is that there must be a verdict of not proven. There is the unfortunate fact that in the only cow on which an autopsy was made the stomach disclosed lead. The symptoms of lead poisoning are perfectly consistent with the symptoms which were observed in the cows that died, and there is also the fact that the pursuers have not been able to exclude other sources of possible poisoning—namely, the Glasgow refuse which was upon the field, and which, containing paint pots, might supply the ingredients for lead poisoning. I think the case there has been left in an undetermined condition. Therefore I am for disallowing the first sum which is sued for, upon the ground that the pursuers have not satisfactorily shewn that the death of the cattle was due to this cause. Upon the whole matter, I am for disallowing the first sum, decerning for the other two sums, and recalling the Sheriff's interlocutor so far as it interdicts, in order that the defenders may have an opportunity of submitting a scheme to somebody to be named by the Court, as is usual in these cases, before interdict should be pronounced against them.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court at Stirling.

In this case Morrisson, a dairyman at Kirkcaldy, sued Robertson, a dairyman at Cambusbarron, for the delivery of two cows and, failing delivery, for a sum representing their value. The facts as narrated on record and as established by proof were as follows:—In January 1906 the pursuer took the cows in question to the auction mart of Messrs Oliver & Sons in Edinburgh, with the intention of selling them. Whilst there a man, who subsequently proved to be one Alexander Telford, falsely represented to the pursuer that he wanted to purchase the cows on behalf of his father, "Mr Wilson, Westrigg, Bonnyrigg." The pursuer had previously sold several cows through Messrs Oliver to James Wilson, a dairyman at Bonnyrigg, whom the pursuer knew to be of credit, but with whom he had no further acquaintance. In the belief that he was dealing with this James Wilson the pursuer sold the two cows to Telford for the price of £34, 12s. The pursuer did not receive payment of the price. Telford sold the cows to the defender, who admittedly purchased bona fide and for a fair price. Telford was subsequently convicted of the theft of the cows.

Morrisson v. Robertson.

The parties' material pleas were as follows:—

For the Pursuer:

1. The two cows in question having been obtained by the said Alexander Telford from the pursuer either by theft or under essential error, or both, he is entitled to delivery thereof as craved.

For the Defender:

1. The averments of the pursuer are insufficient to support the conclusions of his action.
2. The two cows in question having been obtained by the man Wilson or Telford by a voidable title, and his title not having been voided at the time of the sale, and the defender having bought the cows in good faith and without notice of the seller's defective title, the pursuer has no claim for delivery thereof.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Mitchell), having heard parties on the defender's preliminary plea, repelled that plea so far as it bore upon the pursuer's case of essential error, and allowed a proof.

Note.—This discussion on the sufficiency or relevancy of pursuer's averments, which was full and instructive, raises difficult questions.

Two cows of pursuer's, it is alleged, passed on 31st January 1906, ostensibly by way of sale, into the hands of a man Telford, on his representation that he was Wilson junior, son of a certain dairyman known to pursuer, and on 2nd February, by sale, from his hands into defender's. Pursuer has received no price or value for his cows, and Telford was, it is alleged, on 6th March convicted of the theft, inter alia, of these cows. The first question is whether pursuer's condescendence is relevant in statement and good in law to support—if proved—his leading claim of recovery of the cows.

At the debate pursuer contended, and defender admitted, that if the cows were stolen by Telford pursuer is entitled to recover them from defender even as a bona fide purchaser. Pursuer also maintained that if he was under essential error, he has the same right. Defender denies that error in the circumstances stated could have the result claimed. He further avers that the error arose through pursuer's own negligence and fault, but this matter was not before me at this stage. Pursuer does not directly aver mala fides on the part of the defender; and I rather understood he did not urge his denial of bona fides.

1st Div.

Morrisson v. Robertson.

I agree with defender in his Answer 6, that pursuer's statements may support an averment of (fraud or) essential error. The question here, then, is one of law, and after consideration I think the case of essential error presented by pursuer, if proved, would justify his claim for delivery against the defender—a result which, admittedly, would not arise if pursuer's case were one of mere fraud.

No doubt the error is stated to have been induced by Telford's false story (Cond. 2–5), but pursuer (Cond. 6) goes on to aver that he would not have agreed to sell then unless he thought he was selling to Wilson, that there was therefore no sale and no property passed, and that this was essential error or theft.

It seems clear that error with regard to the identity of a supposed purchaser is error in substantials, prevents consent, and negatives a supposed contract (Bell's Prin., sect. 11; I. Com. 313; Stewart v. Kennedy, 17 R. (H.L.), 25); and the precise question here appears to be whether fraud inducing such error makes it cease to be such error and to have such effects. Recent cases in Scotland are, apparently, awanting; and no very distinct authority from the institutional writers was referred to. Professor G. J. Bell, who was quoted on both sides, distinguishes essential error and fraud, and he does not consistently make it clear that the presence of fraud takes such error out of the category of essential error, with the results of such error as to third parties. In England there appears to be a succession of cases where essential error made void a supposed sale, induced by fraudulent misrepresentations, to the effect of declaring that there was no sale, and of giving recovery to the original seller out of the hands of an innocent purchaser (Benjamin on Sales, 5th ed., p. 462, also p. 459), and I do not see that there is a difference in principle in this point, which makes these cases inapplicable. Most of these cases are founded on in a note in Lord M'Laren's edition of Bell's Commentaries (Vol. I. p. 261); Kingsford v. Murray, 26 L.J. Ex. 83; Higgins v. Burton, 26 L.J. Ex. 342; Hardman v. Booth, 32 L.J. Ex. 105; see also Cundy v. Lindsay, 3 App. Cas. 459; and the doctrine of that note sets forth the view that in the absence of consensus in idem placitum produced by fraud, there is essential error, with no contract, no transfer, and no title to retransfer, and, specifically, there is no such title in the person of a fraudulent buyer who has induced the belief in a seller, as the inductive cause for sale, that he is selling to some one else.

In the same Answer (6) defender says that pursuer's statements do not support an averment of theft. I am at present rather inclined to think they do not—that the case presented is one, not of taking away but of getting away. But allowing proof on the question of essential error, I reserve this question at this stage, any proof taken practically covering both points.

Defender's second plea, founded on the Sale of Goods Act, sect. 23, was not expressly before me at the debate, and I do not expressly deal with it here.

After proof the Sheriff-Substitute found that in the sale in question the pursuer was in essential error, induced by the false representations of Telford; that Telford had no title to sell and did not effectually sell the cows to the defender; and ordained the defender to deliver the cows to the pursuer.

Note.—I do not find it necessary to add much by way of note to my judgment of 16th November 1906.

Essential error is a doctrine of Scots law, applicable I think to the facts of this case, and for similar facts the English decisions seem to arrive at the same conclusion on the ground of no contract of sale, the cases cited coming apparently under the corresponding rule or principle of mutual assent (Benjamin on Sales, fifth edition, pp. 92, 93, and 98). The recent Scots case Bryce v. Ehrmann, 7 F. 5, referred to and distinguished in Weiner v. Gill and v. Smith, 1906, L.R. K.B. Div. 575, does not seem to go at all on different lines from those above referred to. I find, then, that pursuer has proved this part of the case which I found relevant on 16th November.

It was argued on the proof for defender that there could be no case of essential error here with regard to identity of the purchaser, as there was a person actually present to whom the cows were actually delivered; and it was even urged that it did not matter to the pursuer to whom he sold. But identity and credit are inseparable in reality and are in effect so treated in the cases cited; and it is admitted that Alexander Telford had no credit or means. The postponement of payment arranged for and the method of it seems to me specially to connect the identity and the credit of this purchaser. Opinions in one or two of the English cases raise other subtleties, which, however, I think do not affect the application of the decisions to the present case.

Defender's other argument is that pursuer is barred through his negligence in the matter. But, assuming that defender was not negligent himself, I think, on a fair estimate of the circumstances of a sale of cattle, the pursuer was not wanting in ordinary prudence in believing and acting on Telford's story.

Defender admits on record (Ans. 5) that cows similar to the description given by the pursuer are in his possession; and in the proof at the close of pursuer's evidence it was admitted and noted that the cows purchased by the defender from Telford were the two cows purchased by Telford from the pursuer.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Lees), who recalled the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor and assoilzied the defenders.

Note.—I regret I cannot concur in the judgment of the learned Sheriff-Substitute.

It is plain the pursuer has no case against the defender merely in respect of Telford's fraud. The pursuer was willing to sell, and possession of the cows was got by Telford with his consent. This put Telford in a position to sell over again: and the defender acquired in good faith and for a full price before the pursuer took any steps to interpel a sale. It is not doubtful on the authorities that in such circumstances no right arises to the pursuer against the defender in respect solely of Telford's fraud.

But then it is said the pursuer was under essential error in selling to Telford. What was that error? Not as to Westrigg. The alleged error was in supposing that the Wilson mentioned by Telford was a dairyman with whom the pursuer occasionally dealt. But this error was not induced by Telford. It was the pursuer's own hastiness that caused the error. According to the pursuer's contention, his remedy would have been equally good even if his purchaser had been a son of a Mr Wilson of Westrigg, provided he was not a son of the dairyman.

I have looked at the cases mentioned by the learned Sheriff-Substitute, but I am not satisfied that they rule the point. Telford's misrepresentation was not the cause of the sale. The pursuer was willing to sell, and if he had got his money he could not have claimed restoration of the cows on the ground that he would sell only to the dairyman. He was in the market to sell, and it was not the sale that was induced by his rash assumption but the willingness to give credit.

But more than that—the case is not against Telford. If the pursuer's claim is good against the defender it is good against any sub-purchaser, however remote, and all because of his causeless assumption that he was selling to the dairyman's son. The same rule would require to apply to any other sale. Take the case of the Stock Exchange. If a holder of stocks seeking a purchaser sold to a man Smith who he causelessly assumed was a partner in a certain firm, it would surely be extravagant to hold that after the stocks had changed hands, it may be a dozen times, and the value had risen, the original seller could claim return of the stocks from a remote sub-purchaser, merely on the ground of the mistake he had made in regard to the identity of the person who gave the name of Smith. The business of life could not be carried on subject to such a rule. And who is to know whether the mistake might not be a mere afterthought? This would leave far too much to the seller.

Then, too, credit might have to be given for the price paid by the sub-purchaser. But if the price was always a full one at the time of each sale, where would there be a difference for which to decern? The injured but credulous seller could only get decree, failing return, for the difference between the present value of the thing sold and the price paid by the sub-purchaser. Here, seemingly, there would be none. It would be damnum absque injuria.

On the whole case I think the defender is entitled to absolvitor.

The Pursuer appealed and argued: The effect of Telford's false representations was to induce in the pursuer essential error, and accordingly any contract between him and Telford was void ab initio. There being no contract with Telford, the latter obtained no possessory title to the cows, and he could not give a good title to a purchaser from him in bona fide (Hardman v. Booth, 1863, 32 L.J. Ex. 105; Cundy v. Lindsay, 1878, 3 App. Cas. 459).

Argued for the Respondent: (1) There had been a personal sale to Telford which gave him a possessory title sufficient to protect a purchaser from him in bona fide (Sale of Goods Act, 1893, sect. 25, 2). The fact that the contract with Telford had been induced by his fraud was not enough to prevent Telford from conferring a good title on a third party. (2) The pursuer had put Telford in possession in circumstances which barred him from claiming in this action.

"Recal the interlocutors of the Sheriff-Substitute and of the Sheriff, dated 8th January 1907 and 8th March 1907 respectively: Find in fact (1) that on 31st January 1906 Alexander Telford falsely and fraudulently represented to the pursuer and appellant that he was the son of Mr Wilson, Bonnyrigg, that he had authority from Mr Wilson to purchase two cows; (2) that the appellant, who knew Mr Wilson of Bonnyrigg to be a farmer and in good credit, was deceived by said representation, and agreed to sell two cows to Mr Wilson on the usual credit, and delivered the cows to Telford; (3) that the respondent, on 2nd February following, purchased the said cows from Telford in good faith and without notice of the appellant's right, and paid the price demanded by Telford: Find in law (1) that the appellant did not sell the two cows to Telford, or to Wilson of Bonnyrigg; that the cows were not delivered to Telford upon a contract of sale, but notwithstanding such delivery continued to be the appellant's property; (2) that the appellant was imposed upon, and is not chargeable with negligence in delivering the cows to Telford as the supposed agent of Wilson; and (3) that the respondent having obtained the two cows from a person who had no title either of property or possession thereto, is under obligation to restore the cows to their true owner the appellant, or to account to the appellant for their value as at the date when he acquired them; and remit the cause to the Sheriff-Substitute to dispose thereof in conformity with this finding, and decern: Find the appellant entitled to expenses," etc.

Lord M'Laren.—In this action the pursuer, Robert Morrisson, who is a dairyman, sues for the delivery of two cows which he says are his property, but which, having been obtained from him by fraud, have actually passed into the possession of the defender by what is not disputed to be a bona fide purchase. The case which the pursuer makes on record is of this nature. He says that he had taken the cows to market for sale, but there were no offerers at his price: and then he says that shortly after the cows had been withdrawn from the sale ring, a man who afterwards turned out to be Alexander Telford, of no fixed residence, came up to the pursuer and falsely represented that he wanted to purchase two cows on behalf of his father, Mr Wilson, Westrigg, Bonnyrigg. The pursuer says that he had already sold cows to James Wilson, a dairyman at Bonnyrigg, although he was not very well acquainted with him. But he knew that he was a dairyman at Bonnyrigg, as when he purchased cows through the sale ring in the Edinburgh auction marts his name was always given as "Wilson, dairyman, Bonnyrigg"; and the pursuer believed that the Mr

Morrisson v. Robertson.
Lord M'Laren.

Wilson, Westrigg, Bonnyrigg, whom the said Alexander Telford falsely represented as his father, was the said James Wilson, who is a person of good credit. Then he says that he did not know Alexander Telford at all, but he was induced by the said false representations to believe, and did believe, that this Telford was the son of the said James Wilson, and that he had the authority of the said James Wilson to purchase cows on his behalf. These are the pursuer's averments. I do not think it necessary to go into the evidence, but it may suffice to say that the pursuer's averments are completely proved. He was induced by the fraudulent representations of Telford, which I have just read, to part with two of his cows upon credit. I think that these facts were not seriously disputed, and on the other hand it was not disputed that the defender had purchased the cows for value which he paid without suspicion that they had been improperly obtained.

Now in these circumstances the question arises whether the pursuer can recover the cows as his property, or whether they have by their transmission to a purchaser for value been irrevocably taken out of the pursuer's possession. This appears to me to be just one of those questions which a lawyer who is willing to think for himself could have no difficulty in solving, even if he had not precedents to guide him. If there had been a contract of sale, then, although the pursuer might have had an action of damages against the person who obtained the goods by fraud, or might have had an action for reducing the sale, yet if in the meantime the property of the cows had passed by lawful subsale to a third person, then the right of that third person, the analogue of the defender in the present case, would be indefeasible. Having acquired the property by purchase from someone who had a lawful title, he would have had a good defence to an action of this nature. But then the case of the pursuer is that there was here no contract of sale. If Telford, the man who committed the fraud, had by false representations as to his own character and credit obtained the cows from the pursuer on credit, then I think that would have been the case of a sale which, although liable to reduction, would stand good until reduced. But then that was not at all the nature of the case. The pursuer never sold his cows to Telford. He believed that he was selling the cows to a man Wilson at Bonnyrigg, whom he knew to be a person of reasonably good credit, and to whom he was content to give credit for the payment of the price. This belief that he was selling the cows to Wilson was induced by the fraudulent statement of Telford that he was Wilson's son. It is perfectly plain that in such circumstances there was no contract between Telford and the pursuer, because Telford did not propose to buy the cows for himself, and because the pursuer would not have sold them on credit to a man of whom he had no knowledge. Neither was there any sale of the cows by the pursuer to Mr Wilson, Bonnyrigg. Wilson knew nothing about them, and never authorised the purchase: the whole story was an invention. There being no sale either to Wilson or to Telford, and there being no other party concerned in the business in hand, it follows that there was no contract of sale at all, and there being no contract of sale the pursuer remained the undivested owner of his cows, although he had parted with their custody to Telford in consequence of these false representations.

So much being premised, then I think it follows that as Telford had no right to the cows he could not give a good title to the defender even under a contract for an onerous consideration. He had no better title to sell the cows to any third person than he would have had if he had gone into the pursuer's byre and stolen the cows. This seems to me to be perfectly clear upon a consideration of known principles, but it is satisfactory that in the judgment which we are to give according to the law of Scotland, we are confirmed by a decision of the English Court of Exchequer, in circumstances which are in all respects parallel to those in the present case—I mean the case of Higgons v. Burton, 1857, 26 L.J. Ex. 342. There never were at any time, as I think, such differences in the law of sale in the two parts of Great Britain as would have affected the present question; but under the Sale of Goods Act these differences have been reduced to the vanishing point, and I can have no difficulty in holding that a decision given by an English Court in a case of this kind is an authority which is entitled to the greatest weight, and which, if sound, would be directly applicable to the same state of circumstances arising in Scotland. Therefore, both on principle and on authority, I think that the pursuer has established his case, and is entitled to a decree for the vindication of his property.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with your Lordship. I think the principle upon which the case must be decided is so well established that it requires little explanation; but since we are differing from the learned Sheriff-Depute it may be well to refer shortly to the authorities which appear to me to be conclusive. Probably the most apposite is the judgment of the House of Lords in Cundy v. Lindsay, 1878, L.R. 3 A.C. 459; and the first observation with which Lord Chancellor Cairns begins his opinion is certainly directly applicable, viz. that it is always a disagreeable duty "to determine as between two parties, both of whom are perfectly innocent, upon which of the two the consequences of a fraud practised upon both of them must fall; and that in discharging that duty we can do no more than apply, rigorously, the settled and well-known rules of law." Then his Lordship proceeds to lay down rules which according to his judgment must determine the question whether a purchaser in good faith and for value has or has not acquired a title to property which he has purchased from a seller to whom the property did not belong. He states in the first place a distinction with reference to a purchase in market overt, which has never been recognised by the law of Scotland, and which we may therefore dismiss. But the other rules which he lays down are all common to the law of both countries. His Lordship says: "By the law of our country the purchaser of a chattel"—or, as we should say, corporeal moveable—"takes the chattel as a general rule subject to what may turn out to be certain infirmities in the title. . . . If it turns out that the chattel has been found by the person who professed to sell it, the purchaser will not obtain a title good as against the real owner. If it turns out that the chattel has been stolen by the person who has professed to sell it, the purchaser will not obtain a title. If it turns out that the chattel has come into the hands of the person who professed to sell it, by a de facto contract—that is to say, a contract which has purported to pass the property—to him from the owner of the property, there the purchaser will obtain a good title, even although afterwards it should appear that there were circumstances connected with that contract which would enable the original owner of the goods to reduce it and to set it aside, because these circumstances so enabling the original owner of the goods, or of the chattel, to reduce the contract and to set it aside, will not be allowed to interfere with a title for valuable consideration obtained by some third party during the interval while the contract remained unreduced." This last rule is one example of a general principle which has governed the decision of many cases of a different kind, of which Oakes v. Turquand, 1867, L.R. 2 H.L. 325, in the liquidation of Overend & Gurney, is a familiar instance. The principle is that a contract obtained by fraud is not void but voidable; and since it follows that it is valid until it is rescinded, the recision may come too late if in the meantime third persons have acquired rights in good faith and for value. But then, on the other hand, if such third persons have acquired their title through a person who himself did not acquire the goods by virtue of any contract with the true owner, or to whom they were not intentionally transferred by the true owner upon any title, then the purchaser can obtain no better title than the person from whom he acquired, who ex hypothesi had no title at all. The doctrine is established by a great mass of authority, and I agree with your Lordship in thinking that the case of Higgons v. Burton, and other cases which were referred to in the course of the argument, such as the case of Hardman v. Booth, 1863, 32 L.J. Ex. 105, decided in England, are very valuable authorities which we may well follow. But the truth is, we do not require to go beyond our own Books for authority for a doctrine which is stated distinctly by our institutional writers, and which has been followed in the decisions of this Court from a very early date. It is stated with great precision by Lord Stair, who takes exactly the distinction which Lord Cairns takes in Cundy v. Lindsay, between a title obtained by virtue of a contract which may be set aside as fraudulent, and possession which is supported by no contract at all. Thus he says, Ins. 4, 40, 21: "In moveables, purchasers are not quarrellable upon the fraud of their authors, if they did purchase for an onerous equivalent cause. The reason is because moveables must have a current course of traffic, and the buyer is not to consider how the seller purchased, unless it were by theft or violence, which the law accounts as labes reales, following the subject to all successors." There is the distinction quite clearly put; and it is stated with equal precision by Mr Bell (Prin. sect. 527), who gives in his illustrations a series of decisions beginning so far back as 1629 with the case of The Bishop of Caithness, in which the doctrine has been applied by this Court.

Therefore, I think that Mr Morton in his able argument put his case on exactly the right ground when he said that there was no contract between his client and Telford, the fraudulent person. He said that if Telford had obtained the cattle by fraudulent contract he should have had nothing to say, but that there was no contract at all with Telford; and upon the facts I agree with your Lordship that that is an exactly accurate statement. If a man obtains goods by pretending to be somebody else, or by pretending that he is an agent for somebody who has, in fact, given him no authority, there is no contract between the owner of the goods and him: there is no consensus which can support a contract. The owner, in this case the pursuer, does not contract with the fraudulent person who obtains the goods, because he never meant to contract with him. He thinks he is contracting with an agent for a different person altogether. He does not contract with the person with whom he in fact supposes that he is making a contract, because that person knows nothing about it, and never intended to make an agreement; therefore there is no agreement at all. I think the fallacy of the reasoning of the learned Sheriff-Depute becomes quite apparent when one considers that, in order to make a contract of sale, you must have a certain seller and a certain buyer. The learned Sheriff says that the pursuer was willing to sell, and was in the market to sell; but then a general desire to sell to someone is not a contract to sell to any particular person, and it is as clear as evidence can make it that the pursuer never intended to sell to Telford. He knew nothing about him, he never thought of him, and never intended to deal with him. Therefore there was no consensus which could lead to any agreement. For these reasons I entirely agree with your Lordship that the pursuer is entitled to recover his cattle if they are still extant. If the defender is not in a position to deliver either or both of the cattle, the question will arise as to the pursuer's remedy for the value, which has not been disposed of by the Sheriff-Substitute. In the meantime I agree with the decision which your Lordship proposes.

Morrisson v. Robertson.
Lord Kinnear.

Lord Pearson.—I agree so far with the learned Sheriff that the pursuer has no case merely in respect of Telford's fraud, or merely in respect that he sold the cattle to Telford under essential error. But I think the real question here arises at a prior stage. The Sheriff's view is, that there was here a contract; and if there was, then he is probably right in his view of the law. I am unable to find that the proof establishes any contract to which the pursuer was a party. Telford did not represent himself as being principal, but as an agent. The pursuer was entirely deceived, both as to the identity and also as to the intention of the person with whom he supposed he was contracting, and intended to contract, and in that essential part of a contract there was no consensus in idem and therefore no sale. I think that the case falls within the principle of the English cases of Higgons and Cundy; and that the delivery to Telford gave him no such title of possession as would enable him in law to transfer the property of the cattle to another.—19*th December* 1907.

Expenses—Company — Liquidation—Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. cap. 89), sect. 87—Petition for Leave to Proceed With Action Against Company — Leave to Proceed Granted, and Petitioners Found Entitled to Expenses—Expenses Incurred Prior to Appearance of Liquidator of Company to Oppose Petition Disallowed by Auditor—Objection to Auditor's Report Sustained.

Note of Objections to Auditor's Report.

On 1st June 1907 an order was pronounced by the Court for winding up James Donaldson & Co. Ltd., Leith. On or about 12th July 1907 the trustees of the late James Anderson, manufacturing chemist, Edinburgh, presented a note to the Lord Ordinary in the liquidation, in terms of sect. 87 of the Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. cap. 89), praying for leave to proceed with an action of sequestration for feu-duty which they had raised against James Donaldson & Co. in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh. They craved expenses in the event of the Company or the liquidator appearing and opposing the petition. Answers were lodged for the Company and the liquidator.

After sundry procedure the Lords of the Second Division, on 26th October 1907, granted the prayer of the note, and found the petitioners entitled to "expenses."

On taxation the Auditor disallowed, inter alia, all items incurred prior to the date of lodging answers.

The petitioners presented a note of objections to the Auditor's report. They objected, inter alia, to the disallowance of the said items.

The following authorities were cited: County of London Electric Lighting Co. Ltd. v. Pattisons Ltd. and Liquidators, 1900, 7 S.L.T. p. 408; M'Leod v. Leslie, 1865, 3 M. 840.

The Court sustained the objection to the Auditor's report.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I think that the first objection should be sustained. Whatever may be the merits of the question as to whether expenses should be given as between the successful and the unsuccessful parties to the case only from the time when the opposition began, that question should have been settled at the time when the motion for expenses was made. Any other rule would be productive of the greatest inconvenience. It is out of the question that the matter should be decided by the Auditor on statements made by a party, and should then come up here on a note of objections to his report. The Court having found the petitioners entitled to expenses, it seems to me that "expenses" means "expenses in the cause," unless there is something in the interlocutor to shew that some expenses which would otherwise be legitimate are excluded. The liquidator does not need to appear unless he chooses. But if he chooses to appear and take up the case, he takes up the whole case, including a possible liability for expenses already incurred. Here the liquidator saw fit to appear, and I can see no ground for writing off expenses merely because they happen to have been incurred before he appeared. If he loses his case his liability is just that of an ordinary litigant.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire.

In this action a joiner sought to recover a certain sum alleged to be due to him as the balance of instalments payable under a contract with the defender for the execution by the pursuer of the joiner work upon a tenement of houses. The contract in question was constituted by tender and acceptance of which the essential terms were as follows :—

I.—Excerpt from Estimate of the carpenter, &c. Works of Tenement at Grangemouth, with Note containing Conditions subjoined thereto.

Tenement at Grangemouth.

Estimate of the Carpenter, Joiner, Glazier and Ironmongery Works of Tenements proposed to be erected at East End for Mr James Jarvie.

James Robertson,
Architect, Grangemouth.

(Then follows detailed schedule of work, quantities and rates as supplied by architect, and the detailed prices filled in by pursuer and respondent, the total of said prices amounting to £432, 12s. 5d.)

Note.— . . . . The work to be done in a sufficient and tradesmanlike manner to the entire satisfaction of the proprietor or architect, who will be at liberty to make alterations and to increase, lessen or omit any part of the work they may think proper, the value of which to be ascertained by measurement when finished, and charged at the schedule rates or others corresponding thereto and in proportion to slump sum in letter of offer.

The work to be at contractor's risk from commencement until finished and taken off his hands by the architect or proprietor, who will not be responsible for any delay or damage to work caused by any of the tradesmen connected with contract.

Tender.

Grange Burn Road,
15th April 1905.

Mr James Jarvie.

Sir,—I hereby offer to execute the carpenter, joiner, glazier and ironmongery works of tenement you propose to erect at Grangemouth, agreeably to plans thereof, to the extent of and as described in the annexed schedule measurement, for the slump sum of four hundred and thirty-two pounds 12s. Your acceptance of this offer will be binding on—Your obedient servant,

John Robertson.

Grangemouth, 20th April 1905.

Mr John Robertson, Joiner.

Dear Sir,—I am instructed by Mr James Jarvie to accept your offer for carpenter, joiner, &c. works of tenement, East End, here, amounting to four hundred and thirty-two pounds twelve shillings (£432, 12s.) sterling.—Your truly,

James Robertson.

P.S.—You might meet me on the ground at two o'clock to-morrow (Friday) afternoon.

The pursuer's main averment was in the following terms :—

Cond. 2. The pursuer contracted with the defender to execute for the defender the joiner work of a tenement of houses at East End, Grangemouth, in accordance with plans and specifications and schedule of measurements, at an estimated sum of £432, 12s. The work was duly executed conform to contract, but additional work had to be done. Payments to the extent of £390 were made in the course of the work by the defender to pursuer. The whole work amounted to £473, 15s. 3d. The defender's architect, Mr James Robertson, Charing Cross, Grangemouth, was satisfied that the whole work was duly executed, and made a measurement and granted the pursuer a certificate for the balance due to him, viz., £83, 15s. 3d., conform to measurement and certificate herewith produced. The defender paid pursuer £42, 12s. on account thereof, which, with the said previous payments, made a total payment of £432, 12s., being the original amount of said contract.

The certificate above referred to was in these terms :—

£83, 15s. 3d.

Grangemouth, 24th November 1905.

James Jarvie, Esq.—Tenement, East End, Grangemouth.

I hereby certify that Mr John N. Robertson is entitled to a payment of eighty-three pounds 15s. 3d. stg. to account of his contract for joiner work, being the fourth and final instalment on that contract.

James Robertson,
Architect.

To Andrew Hunter, Esq., Solicitor, Falkirk.

	£473	15	3

The defender's main contention was as follows :—

It was definitely understood and arranged, and it is admitted in the architect's letter to defender's agent, dated 12th December 1905, that said sum of £432, 12s. was to cover everything, and that no extras were to be charged against the defender. The sum sued for represents extras and additional work which were not authorised by the defender. The architect's final measurement and certificate produced were unauthorised, and are not accurate. The method of measurement adopted therein is not proper, and in some instances the quantities are overstated. The items in the jobbing accounts included therein are covered by the original contract, while other items, for instance the fee for re-measuring the work, are not proper charges against the defender. The offer and acceptance produced constitute an entire contract, and the architect had no express or implied power to order extras or to sanction work disconform to contract. The accuracy of the certificate granted by the architect is not admitted.

1ST DIV.

Robertson v. Jarvie.

The defender also averred that the work was in several respects (enumerated in the pleadings) disconform to contract. His statement and the answer of the pursuer thereto are in the following terms:—

STAT. 3. The specification provides, inter alia, that the work shall be done in a tradesmanlike manner, and to the satisfaction of the proprietor (the defender). The work, however, has not been so executed, and the defender has all along declined to accept it as conform to contract. As regards pursuer's answer, reference is made to the previous statement (No. 2). On the occasion of defender's visit referred to, no inspection was made by defender, nor did he express his satisfaction as averred. Quoad ultra, pursuer's statements in answer are denied, so far as inconsistent with defender's averments.

Ans. 3. Denied. The specification provides that the work is to be completed to the satisfaction of the proprietor or architect. The architect is satisfied, and has granted a certificate for payment. The defender was not, as far as pursuer is aware, ever on the contract during its execution, and the pursuer received no instructions from defender at any time, all communications in connection with the contract being made to or by the architect. The architect was also the inspector on the contract, and made regular daily visits to it, and he, as representing defender, had every opportunity of objecting to what is now alleged to be defective work. After pursuer's work was completed, and while the painter work was going on, defender came to the tenement and inspected same, along with the architect, in presence of pursuer and Mr John Cochrane, painter, and there and then expressed to pursuer his satisfaction with the work done by pursuer.

The parties' pleas were:—

For the Pursuer:

1. The defences are irrelevant.
2. The pursuer having executed the work detailed in the said measurement, and the defender's architect having certified the amount sued for to be due to the pursuer, the pursuer is entitled to decree as craved, with expenses.

For the Defender:

1. The action is incompetent.
2. The action is irrelevant.
3. The defender having paid pursuer the slump sum specified in the contract, defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses.
4. Defender's architect having no power to order extras or to certify work disconform to contract, and the extras for which payment is now claimed having been executed without defender's authority and against the express arrangement between the parties, defender is not liable therefor.
5. The work executed by pursuer being disconform to contract, the action should be dismissed, with expenses.
6. Et separatim, the work executed by pursuer being disconform to contract, defender is entitled to a deduction from the contract price, sufficient to complete the work in exact compliance with the contract, and the amount sued for being insufficient for this purpose, defender should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Mackenzie) pronounced the following interlocutor:

Repels the first, second, and third pleas for the defender, and repels the first plea in law for the pursuer in so far as the defences relate to the disconformity to contract of the extra work performed by the pursuer, and to that extent allows to both parties a proof of their respective averments in so far as not admitted; quoad ultra, sustains said plea. . . .

Note.—In this case a contractor sues for the sum of £41, 3s. 3d., being the balance of a sum of £83, 15s. 3d. certified to be due to him by the defender's architect on his contract for the erection of a tenement of houses. The sum sued for is in excess of the sum contained in the pursuer's offer.

On the preliminary pleas there are two main questions in dispute: First, Does the contract between the parties provide for extra work being ordered and performed; and secondly, Is the architect's certificate of satisfaction sufficient in the circumstances to render incompetent an inquiry into the alleged deficiences in the pursuer's carrying out of the contract work?

On the first question I think there can be very little doubt. The contract is contained in the documents Nos. 12 and 13 of process. No. 12 consists of a detailed estimate containing quantities and rates, followed by a number of written conditions, and completed by an offer in the shape of a letter to the defender, which is accepted by No. 13, written by the defender's architect.

It is argued by the defender that the contract is contained only in these two letters, and that the conditions form no part of it. I cannot take this view. In the letter of offer the pursuer undertakes to do the work "agreeably to plans thereof to the extent of and as described in the annexed schedule of measurement for the slump sum of £432, 12s." The schedule is thus expressly "annexed" as a part of the offer, and it cannot be argued that the conditions form no part of the schedule, as some of them contain detailed directions as to the material and workmanship.

But if this be so, it follows that these conditions must all be taken as qualifying the offer. Now one of the conditions clearly provides for extras or omissions from the work being ordered by the proprietor or his architect, and that these will be valued at schedule rates. The defender seeks to set up another and a different agreement as to "extras." But he cannot do so by parole evidence (Kilpatrick v. Allanshaw Coal Company, 8 R. 327), and his averments on this head are therefore irrelevant. In this way the argument that the sum in dispute is not due as being for extras falls to the ground.

But there is another question which must be decided before a proof is allowed. The defender takes many objections to the work as carried out by the pursuer. In so far as these apply to the original contract, the defender appears to be barred by his own action, in paying the full sum thereunder, from now pleading bad workmanship or deficiencies. But beyond this, it appears to me that the defender is not precluded from proving his allegations. It is true that a clause such as exists here, "the work to be done in a sufficient and tradesmanlike manner to the entire satisfaction of the proprietor or architect," has been found to constitute a reference binding on the parties, and on which the architect's findings must exclude all other proof (Chapman v. The Edinburgh Prison Board, 1844, 6 D. 1288). But it appears to me that there may be questions outside of this reference. If some of the express stipulations of the contract have been contravened, as would appear to be the contention of the defender in the fourth article of his statement of facts, it would seem to raise a question not of the sufficiency or tradesman-like character of the work, but whether work such as is described comes under the contract at all. The architect's certificate is not final as regards anything outside the contract; and although in one sense the extras in this case are within the contract in the sense of justifying their having been ordered by the architect, his certificate would not appear to cover any work in these which the defender can shew not to be in accordance with the rates and conditions contained in the schedule (Ramsay & Son v. Brand, 25 R. 1212).

To this extent I think the defences are relevant, and I allow a proof.

On appeal the Sheriff (Brand) adhered to the interlocutor appealed against.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session, and argued that the case was irrelevant in respect that there was no averment that the pursuer had the authority of the defender or of the architect for the additional work condescended on.

The pursuer was allowed to amend his averments by the addition to the statement first above quoted of the words "Such additions and alterations were all ordered and authorised by the architect as such, and as acting for the defender." The defender added a denial of this statement.

Argued for Appellant: According to the terms of the contract the architect's certificate was not final either as regards the additional work or as regards the work alleged to be disconform to contract. The appellant was entitled to proof of his averments on both these points. Even assuming the architect's certificate to be conclusive as regards work stipulated for in the contract, there was still room for enquiry as to work alleged to be a departure from the contract (Ramsay & Son v. Brand, 1898, 25 R. 1212).

Argued for Respondent: The certificate granted by the architect was equivalent to a certificate that the work had been completed according to contract, and the appellant was not entitled to go behind that certificate unless fraud or its equivalent were averred (Goodyear v. Weymouth Corporation, 1865, 35 L.J. C.P. 12; Ayr Road Trustees, 1883, 11 R. 326, per L.P. Inglis at p. 342; Muldoon v. Pringle, 1882, 9 R. 915). The terms of the contract here constituted a valid reference to the architect, and brought the case within the rule of Goodyear (Chapman v. Edinburgh Prison Board, 1844, 6 D. 1288; Harvey v. Lawrence, 1857, 15 L.T. 571).

The Court recalled the interlocutor appealed against, allowed a proof to the pursuer of the statement added in the Inner House to Cond. 2, and of the statement contained in Ans. 3 to the defender's statement of facts, to the effect that "The pursuer received no instructions from the defender at any time, all communications in connection with the contract being made to or by the architect. The architect was also the inspector on the contract, and made regular daily visits to it, and he, as representing the defender, had every opportunity of objecting to what is now alleged to be defective work," and to the defender of the statement added in the Inner House in answer to Cond. 2, viz., "Denied that the said additions and alterations were all ordered or authorised by the architect," and remitted the case to the Sheriff for further procedure.

The Lord President.—My Lords, in this case the sum at stake is a very small and trivial one, but the pleadings have managed to raise a question of some delicacy as to how the case should be disposed of. The pursuer is a joiner, and he offered for the carpenter work of a house which was being put up for the defender, the defender's architect being Mr James Robertson. The contract is contained in an offer and acceptance. Schedules of offer had been sent out in the ordinary way, and the pursuer on 15th April wrote this letter:—"I hereby offer to execute the carpenter, joiner, glazier and ironmongery works of tenement you propose to erect at Grangemouth, agreeably to plans thereof, to the extent of and as described in the annexed schedule measurement, for the slump sum of four hundred and thirty-two pounds 12s. Your acceptance of this offer will be binding on—Your obedient servant, John Robertson." To that an acceptance was sent in these terms:—"I am instructed by Mr James Jarvie" (that is, the defender) "to accept your offer for carpenter, joiner, etc. works of tenement, East End, here, amounting to four hundred and thirty-two pounds twelve shillings sterling.—Yours truly, James Robertson" (namely, the architect). Upon that offer and acceptance, the work was done. The architect, it seems, gave certificates from time to time as the work proceeded, and a certain amount of money was paid; but in the end of the day the architect measured the work, and gave a note of his measurement, which ran thus:—"To amount of estimate £432, 12s. Additions—£59, 8s., making altogether £492. Deductions £18, 4s. 9d., bringing out a grand total of £473, 15s. 3d." £390 had already been paid, by interim payments, and accordingly the architect afterwards issued a final certificate in these terms:—"I hereby certify that Mr John N. Robertson is entitled to a payment of eighty-three pounds 15s. 3d. stg. to account of his contract for joiner work, being the fourth and final instalment on that contract." There is annexed to that a note of how the £83, 15s. 3d. is brought out, namely — Formerly certified, £390; above instalment, £83, 15s. 3d., making a total of £473, 15s. 3d., which is exactly the grand total which I read to your Lordships a moment ago as brought out by the measurement. The defender paid up £42, 12s.—the theory of the £42, 12s. being that that, added to the £390 already paid, made up the slump sum of £432, 12s.—and refused to pay any more. Therefore, of course, this action is really for the difference between £83, 15s. 3d. and £42, 12s., or, in other words, for the sum of £41, 3s. 3d.

Now the acceptance which I read to your Lordships by its terms introduced the conditions contained in the schedule issued upon which the contract was made. Like an ordinary schedule, this schedule gives details of the works, quantities and rates, and gives certain prices and states the particular way in which the work should be done, and then goes on as follows:—"The work to be done in a sufficient and tradesmanlike manner to the entire satisfaction of the proprietor or architect, who will be at liberty to make alterations and to increase, lessen or omit any part of the work they may think proper, the value of which to be ascertained by measurement when finished, and charged at the schedule rates or others corresponding thereto and in proportion to slump sum in letter of offer." My Lords, that is a common enough stipulation, and the effect of it is not doubtful; it is that it enables the proprietor, or his architect acting for him, to make alterations upon the work to be done, and if he makes alterations then the extras are to be charged for at the same rates as the schedule; and it also provides for measurement.

Now, my Lords, the position taken up by the two parties in this action is as follows. The pursuer says that inasmuch as he has got the certificate of the architect in the terms which I have already read, which shews that the architect was satisfied and had measured the work, he needs no more, and that he is entitled to decree de plano, because he says it is a fair inference that the architect ordered the extras and is satisfied, or he would not have given a certificate. The defender, on the other hand, says that he is entitled to open up the whole matter; and with the view of opening up the whole matter he puts in a set of averments in which he says that in various ways the work has not been conform to contract, and he gives a whole list of different defects which he says are in the woodwork, and he asks for a proof at large. These averments are made with the view of shewing that he has not got his money's worth, and that must be taken as a counter-claim to the sum otherwise due. He also denies that these extras had ever been ordered by the architect, and he denies that the architect had any power to order them.

What the learned Sheriff-Substitute has done is that he has repelled certain pleas for both parties. He has repelled the plea for the pursuer that the defences are irrelevant, which is a plea that is sometimes put in but which I do not think is ever really necessary, and he has repelled the first three pleas for the defender, which are pleas of incompetency and irrelevancy, and a plea that the defender having paid the pursuer the slump sum specified in the contract, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. But then he has allowed a proof to a limited extent, that is to say, he has allowed a proof of disconformity to contract of the extras. I am unable to think that that is quite the way in which the case should be disposed of.

I think one or two things are clear. In the first place, upon the contract I think it is clear enough that the architect, having been put forward by the proprietor as acting for him, is entitled to be the judge of whether the work is executed in a satisfactory manner or not. It would have been possible, I think, for the defender, who has got his house built, to have said to the pursuer, "I won't take such and such a piece of work, because it does not satisfy my architect"; and, on the other hand, I think it follows equally upon the other side that, as to the quality of the work, if the defender allows his architect, as he naturally would, really to represent him in this matter, and be the medium of communication between him and the tradesmen, and if the architect is satisfied with the work that is put in, the defender cannot turn round and say: "I am going to have another opinion about this, and I will get somebody else and put him in the witness-box to say that this work has not been executed in a satisfactory manner." That is the first point that I think is clear. The second point that is clear is that, so far as the extras were concerned, there was a perfect right in the defender, or the architect acting for him, to order the extras, and if the extras were ordered it is quite clear they must be paid for; that is to say, the slump sum for the work could not cover everything. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the precise sum that was to be paid depended upon the measurement and the application of that measurement to the schedule of prices in the schedule. There is no actual provision that the measurement should be done by any particular person, and I apprehend that the matter being intact, or being so to speak a clean slate, it would have been quite in the power of either party to say: "I won't accept the measurement of the architect as such, but I want a measurement by an independent person." But I think it is equally clear that if the architect at the time was allowed by both parties to measure the work, they cannot afterwards turn round and complain of his measurement, and say that the measurement must be done by somebody else; at least they cannot do it unless they urge something exceedingly specific against the architect's measurement, or accuse him of fraud or of committing some specific blunder which could be expressed in so many words. But mere general allegations that the measurement is not correct I do not think will do.

There is one other point upon this schedule that I should refer to, and it is that there is no arbitration clause to anyone. Now, what I have said about the contract already seems to me to dispose of all the various preliminary pleas, so to speak, of the two parties. First of all, as against the defender, the view that I take prevents him having any right to go into the question of disconformity to contract, if it is true that the architect has measured, and if it is true that the architect, all through the contract, was put forward by the proprietor as the person who was managing for him in this matter, and if it is true that the architect ordered the alterations. On the other hand, the view that I take equally disposes of the contention of the pursuer that he need do nothing more than simply produce the architect's certificate. The pursuer's counsel laid very great stress upon the case of Goodyear v. Weymouth Corporation, 1865, 35 L.J. C.P. 12, in an English Court, which no doubt is an authority of a Court of great weight. But there is a very vital distinction between Goodyear's case and this, and it consists in this, that in the contract in Goodyear there were two stipulations, neither of which is here. In the first place, there was a positive stipulation that the architect should be the sole judge of the value of any extras, and that nobody else was to be the judge upon that matter; and second, there was an absolute arbitration clause to the architect. Accordingly the Court there held, upon very obvious principles, that when the architect had given a certificate there was an end of the matter, because, of course, it would have been really mere surplusage if, when you had got a certificate from the man to say that the work had been done, of the value of which under the contract he was to be the sole judge, you should go through the form of having an arbitration in order to refer the point to that very man. Accordingly they gave decree de plano. Here there is no arbitration clause. There is not even any provision for giving any certificate. It is not a contract where the money is to be paid upon a certificate. I do not mean to say that the giving of this certificate was not perfectly natural and right, because it was a proper thing to do in order to certiorate the client that he could now pay the money to the tradesmen. It was absolutely natural, but still it is not a contractual right.

1ST DIV.

ROBERTSON v. JARVIE.

The Lord President.

Now the result of all this, I think, comes to be this. I think there must be proof, and proof of a very limited character. I think the only matters in this record that are relevant to be sent to probation are first of all the statement—I am sorry I cannot put it in neater form: really the pleadings are responsible for that, and not I—the statement, which was put in by way of amendment in Cond. 2, "that the additions and alterations were all ordered and authorised by the architect as such and as acting for the defender"; that statement, taken along with the statement of the same person in his Answer 3 to the defender's statement of facts in which he says that "The pursuer received no instructions from the defender at any time, all communications in connection with the contract being made to or by the architect. The architect was also the inspector on the contract, and made regular daily visits to it, and he, as representing the defender, had every opportunity of objecting to what is now alleged to be defective work." And upon the other side merely the denial of the statement which I read out of Cond. 2—namely, "Denied that the said additions and alterations were all ordered or authorised by the architect." The sentence which follows is not relevant to go to probation: "The architect had no power under the contract at his own hand to order or authorise the same," because that is a statement of fact which contradicts my view of the contract. I think there is nothing else that is relevant to go to proof. Therefore I propose to remit the case to the Sheriff-Substitute with instructions to him to order proof upon this limited matter, my view being that it is proved that the architect was put forward by the proprietor to represent him in this contract, and if the architect says, as indeed I suppose he must say, that he did authorise these additions, for which he afterwards granted a certificate, there can be no enquiry as to whether these things were disconform to contract or not, the architect being the proper judge of such matters.

Lord M'Laren.—I concur with your Lordship that there must be a proof in this case. I think the defender has only obtained a technical success, because upon a mere formal proof that the work has been done upon the architect's instructions I think the pursuer will establish his case. I may, however, make one or two remarks upon the legal questions which were argued to us, not that I think they raise any question of difficulty. I should be unwilling to suppose that there was any doubt about the nature of an architect's duties and his relation to the proprietor who employs him. I think there can be no doubt that within the scope of his employment an architect is the proprietor's agent, and if the building contract provides that the work is to be done to the satisfaction of the architect, then any order within the scope of the contract which the architect may give is a sufficient authority to the tradesman to execute the work, because he is entitled to take the order of the agent as equivalent to the order of the principal. Of course there might be a different question if the order given by the architect was so opposed to the terms of the contract that the tradesman was not entitled to assume that he had authority; but where, as in this case, the contract itself contemplates variations upon the specification, then such variations when ordered by the architect, if they fairly fall within the scope of the contract, are just as binding upon the principal as if they had been ordered by himself.

Robertson v. Jarvie.
Lord M'Laren.

Then, again, I must say that it is perfectly hopeless to contend that when an estimate proceeds upon a schedule of prices the sum named in the estimate can ever be conclusive as between the parties. The purpose of stating prices in the schedule and providing for measurement is that when these prices are applied to the measurement the arithmetical result obtained is the measure of the sum due, although it may be to some extent in excess of the sum that was estimated. The estimated sum is only, as its name imports, the best opinion of the architect or tradesman given at the time as to what the work is likely to cost when the scheduled prices are applied to the measurement. Now, it is sometimes prescribed in a building contract that the payments shall be made upon the architect's certificate. If there had been such a clause in this case I think, in agreement with your Lordship, that it would not have been possible to dispute the architect's certificate upon any of the trivial grounds which are set forth in this record. But then that has not been done, and although it may have been right from a mercantile and business point of view that the architect should give a certificate, and while one might even say that a reasonable man would probably have paid upon the certificate, yet it is not legally binding; and I think it is the right of the defender to call upon the architect to prove in the witness-box what he would have put into the certificate. I am far from saying that I should hold this to be in every case conclusive. That depends upon circumstances. There might be works certified by the architect which in the judgment of any impartial person were altogether outside the scope of the contract, and which the architect had no authority to order. But such cases can be dealt with as they arise. In the present case I agree with the conclusion to which your Lordship has come.

Lord Kinnear.—I am of the same opinion.—13*th December* 1907.

SHERIFF COURT.

(Sheriff-Substitute Grant and Sheriff Wilson, K.C., at Inverness.)

271. Shaw's Trustees v. The Provost, Magistrates, and Councillors of Inverness.

Burgh—Burgh Police Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. cap. 55), sect. 141—General Police Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. cap. 101), sect. 155—Construction of Foot-Pavement—Relevancy of Objection—Held that a Resolution under the General Police Act 1862, sect. 155, to maintain Footways within the Burgh and for that purpose to Levy a Special Assessment on Owners, Did Not Preclude the Police Commissioners of the Burgh from Calling upon Owners to form a Concrete Pavement in Front of their Properties, in Terms of the Burgh Police Act 1892, sect. 141.

On 25th May 1907 the Town Council of Inverness served an order on the trustees of the late Mr Charles Shaw, W.S., as owners of Thornhill House, Culduthel Road, in the burgh of Inverness, requiring them, in terms of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act 1892, sect. 141, to cause the footway in Culduthel Road in front of their property to be made and to be well and sufficiently paved in manner specified in the order. Against this order the appellants, in terms of sect. 339 of the said Burgh Police Act, brought this appeal in the Sheriff Court of Inverness-shire at Inverness, and stated the following objections: (1) That the appellants had already made a footway, the maintenance whereof had been taken over by the burgh many years ago, and the construction and form whereof had never been objected to; and, further, that the footway had been altered and widened by the burgh without consulting the appellants; (2) that sect. 141 of the Act of 1892 does not empower the Town Council to order a new footpath where there is one already, of which the Town Council have undertaken the repair and upholding; (3) that a concrete pavement would be unsuitable; (4) that it would prevent carriages from being driven up to the appellants' house; (5) that the pavement to be so formed by the appellants at their expense would be used by the occupiers of houses on both sides of the road; and (6) that the notice was not served in pursuance of any resolution of the Town Council. The Sheriff-Substitute (Grant), by interlocutor dated 24th October 1907, repelled the first, second, and fifth objections, on the ground that they were irrelevant or wanting in specification; and in respect that the sixth objection had been departed from, continued the cause for further procedure.

He added the following Note:—"The further procedure that I suggest for the consideration of the third objection that I have held to be relevant is that a remit be made to a burgh engineer of an independent burgh, that he should enquire into the facts condescended on and report to me."—24*th October* 1907.

The appellants appealed to the Sheriff (Wilson, K.C.). The argument appears sufficiently from the Sheriff's note infra.

The Sheriff, by interlocutor dated 29th November 1907, refused the appeal, affirmed the said interlocutor in so far as it repelled as irrelevant the first, second, and fifth objections stated by the appellants to the Town Council's order dated 25th May 1907; quoad ultra, recalled the said interlocutor, and as regards the remaining objections to the said order, found that the third and fourth objections were irrelevant and that the sixth objection had been departed from by the appellants. He therefore repelled the said objections, refused the appeal, and confirmed the said order.

He added the following note :—

Note.—Before dealing with the merits, I must refer to the question of the competency of this appeal, which has been taken against the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute, of date 24th October 1907. The right of appeal from Sheriff-Substitute to Sheriff is regulated by sect. 339 of the Burgh Police Act 1892, and as I read that section an appeal is allowed only against "the judgment" of the Sheriff-Substitute determining the subject-matter of the cause by confirming, quashing, varying, or redressing the order, resolution, deliverance, or act complained of.

Now, in the present case, prima facie there has been no appealable judgment, for the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute, while it bears to repel three out of the five subsisting objections, does not dispose of the remaining two objections, and as regards them continues the case for further procedure. But the respondents, although in their answers to the appellants' reclaiming petition they suggest that there is serious doubt as to the competency of the appeal, express their willingness that the case should be dealt with on its merits. Further, I am of opinion that the two objections which the Sheriff-Substitute did not dispose of are not competent or relevant objections. In that state of the pleadings I think that I may treat the proceedings as being competently before me, and it appears to me to be convenient and reasonable that I should deal with the appeal on that footing.

The appellants, who are owners of lands abutting on Culduthel Road, Inverness, were in May 1907 served with a notice by the Town Council, under sect. 141 of the Police Act of 1892, requiring them to cause the footway before their property to be made and paved with concrete. Against this order the appellants, in June 1907, appealed to the Sheriff, stating six objections.

[After enumerating the objections given supra, the Sheriff continued.] At the debate before the Sheriff-Substitute the appellants gave up the sixth objection, and on 24th October 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute repelled the first, second, and fifth objections as irrelevant, and continued the case for further procedure. It was at this stage that the present appeal to me was taken.

SHERIFF COURT.

Shaw's Trustees v. The Provost, Magistrates and Councillors of Inverness.

In the reclaiming petition lodged on 9th November 1907 in support of the appeal the appellants explain that they are now in a position to make their averments more specific than they were when the case was before the Sheriff-Substitute, and, inter alia, they crave leave to amend their pleadings. The most specific information, however, only amounts to this, viz. (a) that by minute of 28th August 1882 the Police Commissioners resolved to undertake the maintenance and repair in future of footways (other than footways of private streets) within the burgh, in terms of sect. 155 of the Police Act of 1862, and to levy a special paving assessment on owners for that purpose in terms of sect. 101 of that statute; and (b) that on 7th February 1898 the Town Council instructed the burgh surveyor to include in next year's estimates the cost of kerbing the footway in Culduthel Road.

I am of opinion that the case for the appellants, as averred in their original appeal, is wholly irrelevant—that is to say, I not only agree with the Sheriff-Substitute in holding three of the five contested objections to be irrelevant, but I think that the other two objections are also irrelevant. I am further of opinion that the additional information disclosed in the reclaiming petition, assuming it to be added to and form part of the grounds of appeal, would not make the appellants' case relevant. I will now explain briefly the reasons on which these opinions are based, and, in doing so, it will be convenient to deal with the appellants' five objections under two general heads, viz. :—(a) The objections Nos. 1 and 2, to the effect that the Town Council have no power to make any order on the appellants under sect. 141 of the Act of 1892; and (b) the objections Nos. 3, 4, and 5, to the effect that the kind of pavement ordered to be formed is unsuitable on various grounds.

(a) The chief ground on which the appellants rely in support of their contention that the order complained of is wholly ultra vires has reference to the resolution passed by the Police Commissioners in 1892 under sect. 155 of the Act of 1862. Now, in my opinion that resolution had, and has, no real bearing on the question of the appellants' liability to make and pave the footway.

Confining attention in the first place to the Act of 1862, it appears to me that under that Act the two obligations, (a) to construct pavements, and (b) to maintain and repair pavements, are clearly distinguished. Thus sect. 149 of the Act provides (a) that owners shall at their own expense, when required by the Commissioners, cause their footways to be made and paved; and (b) further provides that owners shall thereafter repair and uphold such footways. It is only the repairing and upholding which sect. 155 deals with, and for which by sect. 101 the Commissioners are empowered to levy a general assessment. I find no provision in the Act of 1862 entitling the Police Commissioners themselves to construct or make and pave footways and to levy assessment for the expense of such construction.

SHERIFF COURT.

Shaw's Trustees v. The Provost, Magistrates and Councillors of Inverness.

In short, so far as the 1862 Act is concerned, a resolution under sect. 155, while it would relieve owners of the expense of repairing the footways, would not relieve these owners from liability when required by the Commissioners to construct pavements. But the Act of 1862 having been repealed by the Act of 1892, it becomes necessary to consider the effect of this later Act, and on this point considerable light is thrown by the Court of Session cases, viz., The Police Commissioners of Govan v. Airth, 1896, 24 R. 41, and Cowan v. The Police Commissioners of Ardrossan, 1898, 1 F. 223. In the Govan case an owner who in 1878 had made and paved his footways under notice given to him in terms of sect. 149 of the Act of 1862, was held liable to be called on in 1894, under sect. 141 of the Act of 1892, to make and pave the same footway. In the words of Lord President Robertson: "The scheme of the statute [of 1892] is . . . . to repeal the former statutes and (in the matter in hand) to authorise Commissioners in absolute terms to order certain things without any qualification by way of reference to what has been ordered or done before."

Cowan's case—the second of the two cases above cited—decided that a resolution by the Commissioners of a burgh under sect. 142 of the Act of 1892, to undertake the maintenance and repair of all the footways in the burgh, did not preclude the Commissioners in subsequent years from requiring an owner to cause the footway before his property to be paved. Lord Adam pointed out that the construction of sufficient foot pavements would naturally be a gradual process—"as streets extended new foot pavements would become necessary where none had existed before, and where mere footpaths had formerly been sufficient for the traffic, it might be desirable that they should be converted into foot pavements." In Cowan's case, as I have stated, the resolution to undertake the maintenance and repair of footways was passed under the 1892 Act, whereas in the present case the corresponding resolution was passed under the 1862 Act. But I see no ground for holding that there is any difference in meaning or effect between a resolution passed under sect. 142 of the 1892 Act and a resolution passed under sect. 156 of the Act of 1862. In either case, it seems to me, the resolution must be regarded as referring only to the maintenance and repair, not to the construction of footways, and must also be regarded as consistent with the right of the Commissioners subsequently to require that the footways shall be made and paved by the owners of the adjacent property. I may also refer to the Sheriff Court case, Lindsay v. Coatbridge Town Council, 1901, 17 S.L. Review, p. 148, in which Sheriff Berry (following the principle of Cowan's case) held that neither a resolution by the burgh to undertake the maintenance and repair of footways under sect. 142 of the Act of 1892, nor a lapse of six years since the date of the resolution, barred the Town Council from proceeding under sect. 141 to require reconstruction.

The appellants, however, in addition to the resolution, also found in their first objection on the fact which they aver, that the footway in question has been altered and widened by the burgh authorities without consulting the appellants. This general averment has been made more specific in the reclaiming petition by reference to excerpts from minutes of the burgh authorities, shewing that the Town Council resolved "to put proper kerbing and widen the footway of Culduthel Road where required." The operations referred to, however, seem to me to be consistent with the Town Council having undertaken merely the maintenance and repair of the footway, and to be in no way inconsistent with their right subsequently to require the appellants to make and pave the footway. By sect. 17, subsect. 5, of the Burgh Police Act of 1903, a town council is now empowered to require an owner at his own expense to provide a footway fronting his property with kerb, and it is declared that notwithstanding anything done under this power the town council shall be entitled at any time thereafter to call on the owner to make and pave the footway. I think that this statutory provision illustrates the distinction between such an operation as kerbing and the complete construction of a pavement which is contemplated in sect. 141 of the Act of 1892, and which is required by the order now under consideration.

The appellants, in support of their first two objections, rely on two Sheriff Court decisions, viz. Lorimer v. The Commissioners of Dumfries, 1897, 14 S.L. Review, p. 177, and Castlebank Mills v. The Commissioners of Dumfries, 1901, 17 S.L. Review, p. 195. In my opinion, however, the grounds of decision in both these cases, in so far as they are applicable to the questions raised in this case, are inconsistent with the decisions and grounds of judgment in the Supreme Court cases of Govan and Cowan to which I have referred. I have therefore come to the conclusion that the appellants' first and second objections are irrelevant and untenable.

(b) With regard to the remaining objections, they seem to me to relate to matters of ordinary municipal administration, which, unless special circumstances are averred, ought to be left to the discretion of the burgh authorities; and I find nothing in the averments of the appellants which in my opinion would justify interference with the respondents in the exercise of their statutory powers. I refer on this point to Small & Co. v. The Dundee Commissioners, 1884, 12 R. 123, as illustrating the burden which lies on those who, as regards such practical questions as those raised by the objections, claim to have the discretion and judgment of the town council superseded by the Court.—29*th November* 1907.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 747.)

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Dundas.

The facts of the case and the statutory enactments referred to are sufficiently set forth in the previous report.

The defender pleaded, inter alia:

"2. The date of entry to the said subjects being 2nd February 1905, the defender is entitled to retain the whole of the rents of the pastoral farms, legally due at Whitsunday 1905 but conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905.

"3. In respect of the agreement between the parties for apportionment of the rents for the possession of said lands for the half year from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905, the defender is entitled to retain a proportion of the rents of the pastoral farms, legally due at Martinmas 1904 but conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905, corresponding to the period from 2nd February to Whitsunday 1905."

2ND DIV. Wigan v. Cripps.

On 17th January 1907 the Lord Ordinary decerned against the defender for the sum sued for, subject to adjustment of figures.

The Defender reclaimed and argued: (1) Under the assignation of rents in the disposition, the defender was entitled to all rents which were legally due in respect of possession had subsequent to his entry in February 1905 (Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1868, 31 & 32 Vict. cap. 101, sect. 8, Schedule B, No. 1; Campbell v. Campbell, 1849, 11 D. 1426). In the case of pastoral farms where the entry was at Whitsunday, the first half-year's rent was legally due at entry, and payment thereof entitled the tenant to retain possession only until the following Martinmas — a further payment at Martinmas being necessary to entitle him to remain until the following Whitsunday. The term of possession was from Whitsunday to Whitsunday, not from the Martinmas preceding the tenant's entry to the following Martinmas (Kerr v. Turnbull, 1760, 5 Brown's Sup. 876; Hunter v. Stewart, 1857, 20 D. 60). In the case of pastoral farms, therefore, rent was legally due in advance (Kames' Elucidations, p. 67). Mackenzie's Trs. v. Somerville (1900, 2 F. 1278) was distinguishable. It followed that the half-year's rent legally due at Whitsunday 1905 but payable at Martinmas 1905 was due in respect of possession from Whitsunday to Martinmas 1905, and belonged to the defender. (2) The half-year's rent legally due at Martinmas 1904 and payable at Whitsunday 1905 fell to be apportioned between the pursuer and the defender. No doubt the defender had no assignation to any part of that rent; strictly speaking, he was not entitled even to collect it from the tenants. But under the minute of sale the pursuer was bound to account to the defender for one-half of the rent legally due at Martinmas 1904 (Hunter v. Stewart, cit.). In this matter the minute of sale was not superseded by the disposition. By the minute of sale the pursuer undertook two obligations: (1) An obligation to grant a disposition of the lands, with an assignation to the rents legally due at or subsequent to Whitsunday 1905; and (2) an obligation to account for one-half of the rents legally due at Martinmas 1904. The disposition superseded the minute quoad the first obligation but not quoad the second, which was in the same position as if it had been a contract to deliver moveables (Jamieson v. Welsh, 1900, 3 F. 176).

Argued for Pursuer: No doubt in the case of pastoral farms the first half-year's rent was legally due at entry. But it did not follow that pastoral rents were payable in advance. Rent was due in respect of crop and year. The whole crop was gathered in the summer months, and possession during the winter months was thrown in as an unimportant accessory. Accordingly, a tenant entering at Whitsunday, who was entitled to the grass crop he found on the ground at entry, was to be regarded as having been constructively in possession from the term of Martinmas preceding his entry, and the payment due at entry was due in respect of that half-year (Campbell v. Campbell, cit., per Lord Wood; Somerville's Trs. v. Mackenzie, cit., per Lords Adam, Kinnear and Kyllachy). Pastoral rents, therefore, were not due in advance, but in respect of the half-year preceding payment. It followed that the rent legally due at Martinmas 1904 and payable at Whitsunday 1905 was due in respect of possession from Whitsunday to Martinmas 1904, and belonged to the pursuer, while the rent legally due at Whitsunday 1905 and payable at Martinmas 1905 fell to be apportioned. The minute of sale did not enlarge the defender's right, but merely provided for the apportionment of the rent payable at Martinmas 1905. But, further, the minute was superseded by the disposition. Jamieson v. Welsh (cit.) was distinguishable. There the missives contained a separate contract for the delivery of moveable subjects—a matter with which the disposition did not deal. Here the disposition did deal with the apportionment of rent, and its terms were conclusive.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and sustained the second and third pleas in law for the defender.

Lord Low.—The pursuer sold the estate of Glendaruel to the defender with entry at 2nd February 1905. The farms upon the estate are all pastoral, the term of entry under the leases being Whitsunday, and the first half-year's rent being payable at Martinmas thereafter and the second half at the succeeding Whitsunday. In this action the pursuer claims that he has right to the half-year's rent conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905 but legally payable at Martinmas 1904; and he also claims the proportion corresponding to the period from Martinmas 1904 to 2nd February 1905 of the half-year's rent conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905 but legally payable at Whitsunday 1905.

The defender, upon the other hand, maintains that he is entitled under the assignation of rents in the disposition in his favour to the half-year's rent conventionally payable at Martinmas 1905 but legally payable at Whitsunday of that year, and that he is also entitled, under a special contract made between him and the pursuer, to the portion of the half-year's rents conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905 but legally payable at Martinmas 1904, corresponding to the period from the date of his entry (2nd February 1905) to Whitsunday 1905.

I am of opinion that the defender's claim to the half-year's rent legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 is well founded, and that the pursuer is entitled to no part of that half-year's rent.

It is settled that when a proprietor dies between Whitsunday and Martinmas his executor is entitled to the half-year's rent legally payable at the term of Whitsunday before his death, and that if he dies between Martinmas and Whitsunday the executor is entitled to the half-year's rent legally payable at Martinmas. The same rule applies in the case of seller and purchaser, and accordingly, apart from the special contract which I shall consider presently, the pursuer is entitled to the half-year's rents conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905. The defender does not dispute that that is the case.

The pursuer, however, also claims a proportion of the half-year's rent legally due at Whitsunday 1905, which is conventionally postponed until Martinmas 1905. That claim is founded upon the clause in the disposition assigning the rents. The clause is in the form—"and I assign the rents"—provided by the Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1868, which declares that the clause shall "be held to import an assignation to the rents to become due for the possession following the term of entry, according to the legal and not the conventional terms."

In order to test the pursuer's claim I shall assume that the question arises in regard to the rent of a farm which had been let to a tenant under a lease with entry at Whitsunday 1904. The first half-year's rent would be legally payable at Whitsunday 1904, and the second half-year's rent at Martinmas 1904. The pursuer is admittedly (apart from special contract) entitled to these two half-years' rent, but his claim is that he is, in addition, entitled to a proportion of a third half-year's rent which he says is payable in respect of the possession of the farm from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905. That looks very like a claim for three half-years' rent in respect of one year's possession of the farm. The pursuer's counsel, however, explained that the claim is based upon the ground that the first half-year's rent legally payable at Whitsunday 1904 (the term of entry) is truly for possession for the half-year from Martinmas 1903 to Whitsunday 1904. I confess that that is, to me, an entirely novel idea. Plainly a tenant in a farm does not in fact pay rent in respect of possession of the farm prior to his term of entry, because not only has he no possession and no right to possess until the term of entry, but up to that date the farm is in the possession of the outgoing tenant. Further, rent is properly payable for possession. I take it that rent, from a legal point of view, is the consideration which the tenant pays, in money or money's worth, for the possession and use of the subject of the lease, and that definition is as applicable to a farm as to any other subject. Again, whether rents are payable backhand, or forehand, or at the legal terms, a farm is always let at a yearly rent, and the tenant, at one time or another, pays rent for every year and half year during which he possesses the farm.

It seems to me that the idea that, by what must be a legal fiction, a tenant entering a grass farm at Whitsunday is to be regarded as paying the half-year's rent which is legally due at that term, in respect of possession of the farm for the preceding half-year, arises out of the fact that, for the sole purpose of regulating the division of rents between the heir and the executor of a deceased proprietor, or between the fiar and the executor of a deceased liferenter, a somewhat artificial rule has been adopted in which regard is had not to possession but to crop.

For that purpose all farms were regarded as being either wholly corn farms (as they used to be called) or wholly grass farms. In the case of corn farms, entry was always at Martinmas (or, as it was sometimes expressed, "the separation of the crop"), because the outgoing tenant was then presumed to have ingathered his crop, and the incoming tenant required to get possession of the lands for the purpose of preparing them for the next crop. It was considered that a tenant could not be required to pay any rent until he had sown a crop, and accordingly the legal term of payment of the first half-year's rent was held to be the term of Whitsunday following the term of entry, when the incoming tenant was presumed to have completed the sowing of his crop, and the legal term of payment of the second half-year's rent was held to be the succeeding term of Martinmas when the tenant was presumed to have reaped the crop. The rule applied even although entry to the houses and grass lands was (in conformity with the almost universal custom) at the term of Whitsunday preceding the entry to the corn lands, because, as I have said, the corn lands alone were regarded. No doubt the result, in such a case, was that at the beginning of the lease the tenant had partial possession for six months for which he paid no rent at the time, but that was put right at the end of the lease, and in a succession of leases the landlord received a half-year's rent for every half-year of possession.

In this case of grass farms, the entry to which is by custom at Whitsunday, Mr Bell in his treatise upon leases points out that if the principle is that the full year's rent should not be payable until the crop has been reaped, then in grass farms the second half-year's rent should not be payable until the term of Whitsunday twelve months after entry, "because" (I quote the learned author's words) "the tenant is constantly during the whole period enjoying the benefit of the crop." The more logical course therefore would have been to hold that the first half-year's rent in a grass farm was legally payable at Martinmas six months, and the second half-year's rent at Whitsunday twelve months after entry. But, says Mr Bell, the Court have held otherwise, because "the practice of the country has so fixed the point."

I may add that my impression from a study of the old cases is that the legal terms in grass farms were originally fixed at the Whitsunday of entry and the following Martinmas, because the position of the tenant at his entry and at the following term of Martinmas respectively, was supposed to be analogous to the position of a tenant in a corn farm at the term of Whitsunday after his entry and at the following term of Martinmas respectively. The tenant of a grass farm at his entry finds upon the land a growing crop of grass, which was regarded as being analogous to a completely sown corn crop, and by the term of Martinmas he has obtained the benefit of the summer pasturage, from which his profit is chiefly derived, and therefore his position at that term was regarded as being analogous to the position of the tenant of a corn farm who at the term of Martinmas had reaped his corn crop.

But however that may be, there was this advantage in the legal terms of payment adopted in the case of grass farms, that one rule was fixed for all cases, the rule being that if the landlord survived Whitsunday one-half of the rent applicable to the crop of the year in which he died belonged to his executor, and if he survived Martinmas the whole rent applicable to that crop belonged to his executor.

The rule is nowhere more clearly stated than in the report in Brown Supplement (Vol. V. p. 876) of the case of Kerr v. Turnbull. In that case a tenant entered to a grass farm at Whitsunday, and by the lease the rent was payable one-half at the following Martinmas and the remaining half at the succeeding Whitsunday. The landlord died after Martinmas, and it was held that his executor was entitled to the half-year's rent payable under the lease at the following Whitsunday.

In a note to the report, the reporter (Monboddo) states the ground of judgment thus: "The simple rule in this case, and which will apply equally to corn and grass farms, is the crop, without attending to the division of the year which is arbitrary as to its commencement. According to this rule, the crop, whether of grass or corn, belongs to that year in which it grows and is reaped, and the rent of that crop is divided betwixt the heir and executor by the legal terms of the Whitsunday when the crop was sown and of Martinmas when it is reaped, so that, without enquiring about years at all, it is sufficient to consider whether the rent for that crop be still in the tenant's hands, or if it be uplifted by the defunct."

Now that statement of the law shews in the first place that, for the purpose of apportioning rents between heir and executor, every crop is assumed to be grown and reaped within the calendar year, or, to put it more definitely, the crop, whether corn or grass, is assumed to have been reaped by Martinmas in each calendar year. Therefore, for the purpose foresaid, it is unnecessary to consider what may be called the farm year—that is to say, the twelve months from and after the term of entry, for possession during which the first year's rent is in fact paid. Let me give a practical illustration. The tenant of a corn farm enters upon full possession of the farm at Martinmas 1904; but his first corn crop is grown and reaped entirely in 1905. Therefore, in a question between heir and executor the possession which he has had during 1904 is disregarded, and the whole rent is dealt with as being payable for the crop of 1905. Again, the tenant of a grass farm enters at Whitsunday 1904, and his first crop, which is growing when he enters the farm, is assumed to have been wholly reaped at Martinmas in that year; therefore, in a question between heir and executor, the rent is dealt with as being wholly payable for the crop of 1904, and the possession which the tenant has in 1905 is disregarded. It therefore seems to me that the rule for apportioning rents between heir and executor and the like is an arbitrary rule, fixed for that purpose alone, and has no application when the question is for what possession of the farm is a particular payment of a half-year's rent made.

That, however, is the question raised under the assignation of rents in the disposition. I have already quoted the statutory declaration of the meaning of the clause assigning the rents, and it will be observed, in the first place, that the rents assigned are only rents "to become due," and therefore the assignation does not include the rents legally due at Martinmas 1904, because these rents had become due prior to the term of the entry of the defender. In the second place, the rents assigned are rents to become due "for the possession following the term of entry," namely, 2nd February 1905. The first rent answering to that description appears to me to be the half-year's rent legally payable at Whitsunday 1905, because in the case which I have been supposing of the tenant entering under a new lease at Whitsunday 1904, he would have already paid one year's rent, and he would have been in actual possession of the farm for one year and no more.

Certain dicta in the recent case of Mackenzie's Trs. v. Somerville, 2 F. 1278, were quoted as supporting the view that the half-year's rent legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 was truly for possession of the farm from the preceding Martinmas. The main question in Mackenzie's case was whether certain farms upon the estate of Portmore which had been sold with entry at Martinmas 1897 were arable or pastoral. It was held that they were pastoral, and that accordingly rents legally due at Martinmas 1897 but conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1898 were not carried to the purchaser by the assignation of rents in the disposition.

The judgment, therefore (it being held that the farms were pastoral), was merely an application of the well-established rule upon which I have already commented; and it is to be observed that the purchaser's entry being at the term of Martinmas there was no question in regard to the rents of a divided term.

The pursuer founds upon certain dicta of Lord Kyllachy, who was Lord Ordinary, and of Lords Adam and Kinnear. Lord Kyllachy said: "The rents in question which were conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1898, were legally due at Martinmas 1897, and were so due as being the second half of the rent payable for the grass crop of 1897. To put it otherwise, they were legally due for the possession from Whitsunday to Martinmas 1897; the possession during the winter and spring 1897-98 being thrown in as an unimportant accessory."

Now the first of these sentences is an accurate statement of the rule that in questions between heir and executor, or seller and purchaser, the rent is to be regarded as payable for the year in which the crop is assumed to be reaped. In the second sentence I think that Lord Kyllachy evidently had in view the theory or hypothesis upon which the rule is founded in the case of grass farms, namely, that the whole of the grass crop has been reaped, in the sense that the tenant has received the whole benefit of it, by Martinmas. But however that may be, Lord Kyllachy does not say that the rent which is legally payable one-half at Whitsunday and one-half at Martinmas is not paid for possession from Martinmas to the following Whitsunday. What he says is that the possession from Martinmas to Whitsunday is "thrown in"; that is to say, possession for the latter period is thrown into and therefore is included in and forms part of the possession for which the rent is paid. If that be so, then it is obviously immaterial that the possession between Martinmas and Whitsunday is of little value to the tenant, because the rent stipulated is always the rent for the year, and it is only payable in two equal portions because it is the inveterate custom to do so.

Certain expressions used by the learned judges in the Inner House were also founded on. Thus Lord Adam, referring to the half-year's rents conventionally due at Whitsunday 1898 but legally due at Martinmas 1897, said: "These rents were the rents legally due for the possession of the crop of 1897." The phrase, "for the possession of the crop," is unusual, but I think that his Lordship's meaning would have been the same, only more accurately expressed, if he had said "for the crop of 1897," leaving out the word "possession." That, I think, is clear from the next sentence, in which his Lordship says: "The rent is due for the year in which the crop, whether agricultural or sheep, is raised." That is, in my opinion, a correct statement of the rule of law applicable to the kind of question which was under consideration.

In the same case Lord Kinnear said: "The rent in question, although collected by the defender, was rent derived from possession prior to his term of entry as purchaser, although it was payable at a term after that entry. It humbly appears to me that that was not a correct statement of the legal situation. His Lordship was dealing with the effect of the clause assigning the rents as interpreted by the statute, and it seems to me that the true ground for holding that the rent in question was not assigned to the purchaser by the statutory clause was, in the words of the statute, that it was not rent "to become due for the possession following the term of entry." I think that that was what Lord Kinnear was referring to; but there being no question between the parties as to rent due for a divided term, his Lordship did not pay so much attention to the form of the expression which he used as he would otherwise have done.

I have commented upon the dicta (which are no more than dicta) in Mackenzie's case at so great length, because they constitute the only thing in the way of authority which the pursuer's counsel was able to cite for the proposition which is the foundation of his claim, namely, that a tenant who enters to a grass farm at Whitsunday and then becomes legally liable for a half-year's rent, is to be regarded as being so liable in respect of constructive possession for the half-year preceding his entry. I do not think that the dicta in Mackenzie's case support that view, and I have already given my reasons for holding that it is a proposition which is contrary both to fact and principle.

I am therefore of opinion that the half-year's rents legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 were assigned to the defender, and that the pursuer is entitled to no part thereof.

I now come to the defender's claim for a portion of the rents legally due at Martinmas 1904. The defender admits that he has no right to any part of these rents at common law or under the assignation of rents in the disposition, but he says that he is entitled to a share of the rents proportionate to the period from 2nd February to Whitsunday 1905 in respect of an agreement entered into between him and the pursuer. That agreement is contained in the eighth article of a formal minute of sale executed by the parties in July and August 1904.

The article is in the following terms: "The second party (the defender) shall have right to the rents and duties of the said lands, and shall be liable in payment of the feu-duties and public burdens for the possession following the said term of entry, the first party having right to the rents and duties of the said lands, and being liable in payment of the feu-duties and public burdens for the possession prior to the said term of entry, and that notwithstanding that payment of the rent for the possession prior to the term of entry may be conventionally postponed to a date subsequent to that term. The rents, rates, and taxes for the possession of said lands for the half-year from Martinmas 1904 to Whitsunday 1905 shall be apportioned between the first and second parties."

It was maintained for the pursuer that that article was superseded by the disposition and cannot be founded upon or enforced. The only part of the disposition which could be regarded as superseding the article in the agreement is the clause assigning the rents; and if it could be shewn that the agreement is inconsistent with the effect attributed by the statute to the clause assigning the rents, I should without hesitation hold that the agreement was superseded by the disposition in so far, at all events, as it is inconsistent with, or modifies the effect of, the clause assigning the rents.

Now I would observe, in the first place, that the agreement does not deal only with rents, which alone are the subject of the assignation in the disposition, but with public burdens. The agreement is that the pursuer shall be liable for the public burdens for the possession prior to the term of entry, and that the defender shall be liable for the public burdens for the possession following the term of entry. It was not contended that that part of the agreement was affected by the disposition, and I understand that, as regards public burdens, the agreement has actually been carried out. If that be the case, it puts the pursuer in a somewhat awkward position, because, plainly, the defender undertook to pay the public burdens applicable to the period subsequent to his entry only upon the condition that he should have right to the rents applicable to the same period. The two things appear to me to be inseparable, and therefore I do not see how the pursuer can insist upon the defender paying a share of the public burdens and deny him an equivalent share of the rents.

That consideration, however, appears to me not to arise, because I am of opinion that the agreement is quite consistent with the disposition; that is to say, implement of the agreement would not prevent full effect being given to the assignation of rents in the disposition.

The only question which arises under the clause assigning the rents is what rents are thereby carried to the purchaser. I have already expressed the opinion that the half-year's rents legally payable at Whitsunday 1905 were carried to the defender, and that the pursuer had no right to any portion of these half-years' rents. Of course the inference is that the rents legally payable at Martinmas 1904 belonged wholly to the pursuer. And there is no doubt that that was the case, because if the pursuer had died at the date of the defender's entry and the competition had been between his heir and executor, plainly the rents legally payable at Martinmas 1904 would have gone to the executor, because they would have been in bonis of the pursuer at his death. If, therefore, the rents referred to in the agreement were the rents legally payable at Martinmas 1904, the parties were bargaining about money which at the date contemplated, namely, the defender's entry to the lands, would have vested in the pursuer, and would, if he had then died, have been in bonis of him. If, therefore, the agreement was in regard to the Martinmas rents, it is not superseded or affected by the disposition, because it deals with moveable estate with which the disposition had nothing to do.

Wigan v. Cripps.
Lord Low.

The question, therefore, is, are the rents referred to in the agreement those legally payable at Martinmas 1904? The answer seems to me to depend upon the question which I have already so fully discussed, namely, whether the rents legally due at Martinmas 1904 and conventionally payable at Whitsunday 1905, were or were not for possession of the farms between these two terms. As I have already answered the latter question in the affirmative, it follows that the rents referred to in the agreement are those legally payable at Martinmas 1904, and accordingly the defender is, in my judgment, entitled to have these rents divided between him and the pursuer in terms of the agreement.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and that the second and third pleas in law for the defender should be sustained.

274. Glass v. Glass's Trustees and Another.

Husband and Wife — Marriage — Constitution—Per Verba de Præsenti—Proof —Circumstances where Woman Held Entitled to Decree of Declarator of Marriage.

The Opinion of the Lord Ordinary sufficiently reports this case.

Lord Salvesen. — The pursuer in this case claims to be the widow of the deceased Robert Glass, whose trustees are the leading defenders. She was not regularly married to the deceased; and she has brought this action, after his death, in order to obtain a declarator that at and prior to his death the pursuer and he were married persons, and that she is entitled to all the rights and privileges competent to a lawful wife. The action was defended by the trustees, and also by one of the next of kin of Robert Glass; but in the course of the proof an arrangement was arrived at between them and the pursuer, under which they agreed not to contest the case further, on the footing that, if pursuer obtained declarator in terms of her conclusions, she should accept a specified sum in full settlement of her claims of jus relictæ and terce. This settlement, however, does not relieve me of the responsibility of deciding whether the pursuer has proved facts, circumstances and qualifications relevant to infer marriage between her and Robert Glass.

The circumstances, of the case are unusual. The pursuer was born in 1857; and as her parents were persons in humble life, she had early to make her own living. She remained at school until she was thirteen, after which she took employment for a short time in Aberdeen, where her parents lived. She then went successively to Montrose and Arbroath as a domestic servant; and in 1874 she came to Edinburgh with the object of obtaining a situation in a shop. She knew one family in Edinburgh, by whom she was introduced to the deceased Robert Glass. Having found it hopeless to obtain a situation such as she wanted, she accepted an offer by Glass to be a servant in his house in South St James' Street, Edinburgh.

Robert Glass had been previously married, but his first wife had died childless on 30th June 1874. He was then a man of about forty-four years of age—and kept two houses of ill-fame, one in High Street, and the other at South St James' Street, where he himself lived. He was assisted in the management of the latter house by a Mrs Roche, who also acted as a general servant; and she was living in the house when the pursuer entered his service about October 1874. There were several bedrooms in the house, which were used for immoral purposes; and it was part of the pursuer's duty to keep the house, including these bedrooms, in order. According to her evidence she did not know at the time when she accepted the situation offered to her by Glass how he earned his livelihood; but I have no doubt she became aware within a short time thereafter. After a couple of months Mrs Roche was dismissed, and Glass and the pursuer became the only regular occupants of the house. She says that Glass commenced to shew her attentions, and on various occasions sought to enter her bedroom, but that she resisted his overtures until on one occasion in December 1874 he asked her to marry him. She agreed to do so; and he thereupon took a Bible, opened it, and swore upon it that he took her to be his wife, and she also swore that she took him to be her husband. In reliance on this ceremony constituting marriage, the pursuer thereafter cohabited with Glass.

The only evidence of the interchange of consent is that of the pursuer herself, and I do not think that, per se, her evidence is sufficient to instruct that a binding contract of marriage was then entered into. What followed, however, is important. The pursuer received a wedding ring, which she wore for many years afterwards, and which was seen by other witnesses in the case; and for about fifteen years continuously she continued to live with Glass on the footing of being his wife. She was introduced to Glass's friends as Mrs Glass; and at an early date she informed her own relatives of her marriage. Numerous witnesses have been examined who speak to their being introduced by Glass to the pursuer as his wife, and who say that all along they treated her as such; and in the case of those who stayed at one or other of the houses in which Glass resided, that she took her place as the head of the household. This evidence is supported by a whole series of letters, beginning in 1877 and extending down to 1889, in which Glass addressed her as "My dear wife," and signed himself "your affect. husband, R. Glass." These letters were written to the pursuer either when she was at Aberdeen visiting her own relatives, or when Glass was absent from home in connection with his business as a bookmaker. The tone of the letters is just what one would expect from a person in Glass's position writing to his wife.

What is even more significant is that within a short period of the commencement of their cohabitation Robert Glass was in the habit of speaking and writing to the pursuer's relatives on the footing that they had become his own—which is consistent only with the view that he regarded himself as married to the pursuer. In June 1878, for instance, he writes to the pursuer's sister, addressing her as "My dear sister," and signing himself "your affect. brother, R. Glass." In these letters Glass speaks of pursuer's parents as "mother" and "father," and they shew that he was on affectionate terms with the whole family. As the Davidsons were in poor circumstances, Glass from time to time made them presents of money; and, according to the evidence of the members of the family who were examined, they never for a moment suspected from anything he said that he was otherwise than the pursuer's lawful husband.

It is only just to the pursuer to say that, although her relations with Glass commenced so inauspiciously, she seems to have disapproved of the business in which he was engaged, and very soon induced him to give up receiving visitors at the house which they occupied in South St James' Street. The other house continued to be used as a brothel until 1880, and was regularly visited by the police; and the pursuer has produced a record of the various police visits paid to the house, in all of which she is described as the wife of the occupier. There is only a single instance of her using her maiden name. That was in connection with her apprehension in connection with a theft which had been committed by one or more prostitutes in the house in High Street, and she explains that she gave her maiden name by request of Glass. No discredit appears to attach to the pursuer in connection with this incident. On the contrary, it was she who gave information to the police of the stolen money having been concealed in her house; and as the result of a prosecution the accused woman pleaded guilty. In 1880 the business in High Street was also given up, Glass having by this time devoted his attention to the more lucrative and less disreputable business of bookmaking. The pursuer says that she was mainly instrumental in inducing Glass to give up the house in High Street; and the evidence is to the effect that under her influence a great improvement was effected in his personal appearance, as well as in the cleanliness and comfort of the house which he occupied with the pursuer.

The facts which I have narrated appear amply sufficient, according to the authorities, to prove that a mutual agreement to marry had been entered into by the pursuer and Robert Glass. It has frequently been pointed out that "marriage, according to the law of Scotland, is not constituted by the mere fact of cohabitation with the assumption of the character of husband and wife and repute to that effect. The proper doctrine is that the consent by which marriage is constituted, in the law of Scotland, may be proved by such cohabitation and repute" (per Lord Moncreiff in Lapsley, 1855, 8 D. 61). In this case the proof is unusually strong, if regard be paid only to the period from 1874 to 1889. During all that time the parties cohabited as man and wife, and corresponded on that footing; and, so far as the evidence goes, there was absolutely no divided repute. Cases no doubt occur where people, having agreed to have illicit intercourse, pass themselves off as married persons for some ulterior object; as, for instance, to secure a suitable house, or to have social intercourse with respectable neighbours who would decline to associate with them on other terms. But this is not a case of that kind at all. There was, so far as I can see, no adequate motive why Glass should have assumed the relation of husband to the pursuer, unless he had previously agreed to accept of her as his wife; and accordingly, if this action had been brought in 1889, I do not see that the pursuer could possibly have failed in obtaining the declarator which she now seeks.

Outer House. Lord Salvesen.

Glass v. Glass's Trustees and Another.

What difficulty there is in the case results from the events which took place in 1889. It appears that for some time the parties had been living unhappily together—mainly because of Robert Glass's conduct with other women, and partly because the pursuer had been taking drink, a habit which with all his faults Glass was not addicted to. Accordingly, Glass instructed his own law agent to draw up a minute of agreement which provided for the parties living separately. This minute of agreement is signed by the pursuer in her maiden name; and its terms are such as to imply an acknowledgment by her that she and Glass had never been married persons—although it provided for her receiving a weekly payment of 25s. so long as she "remained unmarried and led a chaste and honourable life." The pursuer had no separate advice in regard to this document, and says that she was only imperfectly acquainted with its contents. I am not disposed to accept the latter statement, as she admittedly received a duplicate of the minute of agreement, and had thus ample opportunities of considering its terms. But I think it is very likely that she did not then know that she had a legal right to obtain a declarator of marriage against Glass, and that she accepted the provision in ignorance of her legal rights. It is a somewhat curious fact that even after this deed was executed Glass wrote to the pursuer more than one letter in which he continued to address her as Mrs Glass, and in which he shews himself anxious that she should return to him. It is obvious, however, that even if the deed had been executed in full knowledge of the legal rights of parties, it could have no effect in dissolving a marriage which had already been constituted, as nothing but a decree of Court can terminate even a marriage that has been irregularly entered into. The same observation applies to the settlement which the pursuer made some years later, after Glass had stopped her allowance because of a suspicion which I am satisfied was unfounded—that she had misconducted herself with another man. The pursuer employed an advocate in Aberdeen to take proceedings against Glass; but unfortunately she did not inform him of the letters which she had received during her cohabitation with Glass, and which evidenced the relation upon which she was living with him. Mr Butchart accordingly seems to have assumed that the minute of agreement contained a correct narrative of the facts, and, on this assumption, to have advised the pursuer to settle her claims for a slump sum which Glass was willing to pay her. When the money she then received—and in respect of which she on 19th August 1895 discharged all claims competent to her under the agreement—became exhausted, the pursuer consulted a Mr Scott, solicitor in Aberdeen, and handed to him the letters on which so much reliance is placed in the present case. Mr Scott then wrote a letter in which he maintained, on her behalf, the position that she was a married woman, and entitled to be alimented by her husband. But, unfortunately for the pursuer, Scott became bankrupt and shortly afterwards died, and her claim was not prosecuted, partly because the evidence on which she relied remained in his hands, and partly from lack of funds. From 1896 onwards the pursuer has supported herself in various situations without making any claim against Glass.

The above circumstances might have been of great importance if the evidence as to a marriage having been entered into had been less clear and definite. As matters stand, however, I am quite satisfied that they are not sufficient to prevent the pursuer's right to have her marriage now declared. As, however, parties informed me that in the event of my being of opinion that the pursuer was entitled to the declarator which she seeks, various deeds will require to be executed to carry out the settlement already referred to, I shall not meantime sign a formal interlocutor embodying the result at which I have arrived.—20*th December* 1907.

Local Government—Licensing—Clerk of the Peace—Fees—Liability of Magistrates—Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903 (3 Edw. VII. cap. 35)—Table of Fees—Table Under Act of Sederunt, 7th July 1904, is Inclusive of All Business under Licensing Act 1903—Table Under Act of Sederunt, 24th November 1905, Applies to Judicial Business but Not to Licensing under Act of 1903.

This was an action by the "Clerk to the Justices of the Peace within the County of the City of Dundee" against the Lord Provost and Magistrates of that City for an account amounting to £271, 8s 1d. The account consisted of outlays incurred by the pursuer and fees alleged to be due to him as Clerk of the Peace for work done between 1st November 1905 and 1st November 1906.

The items of the account were claimed under the authority of sect. 8 (4) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903, which provides: ". . . It shall be the duty of the Town Council of such Royal or Parliamentary Burgh to defray any necessary expenses in respect of proceedings of the Licensing Court or Court of Appeal . . . . " and an Act of Sederunt of 24th November 1905. That Act of Sederunt is passed under sect. 27 (3) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903, which authorises regulation of the fees payable to the Clerk of the Peace by Act of Sederunt " . . . . for anything done under this Act or otherwise," and the preamble is as follows :—

"The Lords of Council and Session, considering that by the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903, 3 Edward 7th (cap. 25, sect. 27, subsect. 3), it is provided that 'It shall be lawful for the Court of Session, on the application of the Lord Advocate, from time to time, by Act of Sederunt, to prescribe a table or tables of fees payable to a Sheriff-Clerk or Town-Clerk for anything done under this Act, and of fees payable to a Clerk of the Peace for anything done under this Act, or otherwise; and any table so prescribed shall have full force and effect notwithstanding any general or special provision contained in this or any other Act; and thereafter no such clerk as aforesaid shall demand or receive any greater or additional fee or remuneration for anything so done than is authorised in such table.' And considering that an application has been made to the said Lords by the Lord Advocate in terms of said Act; and considering that on 7th July 1904 an Act of Sederunt was enacted by the said Lords intituled 'Act of Sederunt for regulating the fees payable under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903 to Sheriff-Clerks, Town-Clerks, and Clerks of the Peace,' which prescribed, inter alia, that the Clerks of the Peace were entitled to charge certain fees for work done under the said Act; and further, considering it is expedient to prescribe, in terms of said Act, a table of fees for work done by the Clerks of the Peace otherwise than under said Act; therefore the said Lords do enact and declare that from and after the date hereof in addition to the fees prescribed in the said Act of Sederunt applicable to the said Clerks of the Peace, the Clerks of the Peace shall be entitled to charge the fees specified in the table annexed hereto until the same shall be altered in terms of law. Provided always that nothing herein contained shall affect any arrangement or agreement between a Clerk of the Peace holding office at the date hereof and a County Council or Town Council of a County of a City whereby the said Clerk of the Peace is paid a salary or higher fees in lieu of the fees prescribed in Part II. of the table annexed hereto."

The table of fees annexed to the Act of Sederunt is divided into two parts: I. Fees for business done under various special statutes other than the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903. II. Fees payable for " general business."

The defenders disputed their liability for the account, in the first place on the ground that the pursuer had contracted impliedly to do the work of Clerk of the Peace at a fixed salary of £26, 5s. per annum, which were the terms enjoyed by his predecessors in office.

They did not, however, press this defence, but maintained that Part II. of the table of fees in the Act of Sederunt of 24th November 1905 had no reference to judicial business of any kind, or to any licensing business, and that all fees payable to the Clerk for the latter were ruled by an Act of Sederunt of 7th July 1904, and were payable by parties applying to him in his official capacity. The same applied to fees payable under Part I. of the table of fees, and the only fees for which the defenders could be held liable were those chargeable under Part II. for non-judicial business and excluding all licensing business.

The Lord Ordinary held that the "general business" referred to in Part II. of the table of fees did not exclude judicial business, but that all business under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903 was excluded. He therefore held that the pursuer was entitled to charge fees against the defenders for their judicial business other than applications for liquor licenses under the Act of 1903, and also for general business connected with licensing if not done under that Act, but with the exception in both cases of items in Part II., Head 2, of the table of fees under the Act of Sederunt of 24th November 1905, viz. attendance at meetings of quarter sessions or special general sessions, or meetings of committees for dispatching administrative business (£1, 10s. 6d.). This the Lord Ordinary held could not refer to meetings for judicial business.

The Lord Ordinary therefore, with these findings, remitted to the Auditor of the Court of Session to tax and report.

Lord Guthrie.—It is admitted that the pursuer's account must be remitted for audit, and I propose to send it to the Auditor of the Court of Session for audit and report. Apart from matter of audit, however, certain questions have been argued before me, on which it is proper that findings should now be pronounced. These questions are of general importance.

The pursuer avers in Cond. 4: "The amount of the account is £271, 8s. 1d., and the various items thereof are chargeable against the defenders either under Part II. of the Act of Sederunt of 1905, or under sect. 8, subsect. (4), of the Licensing Act 1903." The defenders admit liability for any items in the account chargeable under Part II. of the Act of Sederunt of 1905; they deny liability for any charges made by the pursuer in connection with his actings under or in consequence of the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903. They say that the only charges exigible under that Act are those specified in the Act of Sederunt of 7th July 1904, following on that statute, which admittedly fall to be paid by individuals directly concerned in the working of the Act, and not by the employers of the Clerks of the Peace.

The first question, then, is: 1. Is the pursuer entitled to make any charges against the defenders under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903, other than the charges, if any, specified in Part II. of the Act of Sederunt of 24th November 1905?

Under sect. 8 (4) of the Licensing (Scotland) Act of 1903 it is provided that "it shall be the duty of the Town Council of such Royal or Parliamentary Burgh to provide accommodation for such meetings" (of the Licensing Court), "and otherwise defray any necessary expenses in connection with proceedings of the Licensing Court or Court of Appeal; and save as otherwise already chargeable against any burgh rate, to charge the same against the burgh general or police assessment."

Under sect. 27 (3) of the same Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903 provision is made for the passing of Acts of Sederunt. The terms of that subsection require attention, and will be quoted later.

In accordance with the provision just mentioned two Acts of Sederunt were passed, the first dated 7th July 1904, and the second 24th November 1905. The authority for and the scope of these Acts of Sederunt is thus stated in the preamble to the Act of Sederunt of 24th November 1905. [His Lordship then read the preamble to the latter Act, which is quoted above.]

The result is, in my opinion, that these two Acts of Sederunt, in the absence of any such "arrangement or agreement" as is referred to in the preamble of the 1905 Act of Sederunt, contain an exhaustive and inclusive enumeration of the pursuer's whole emoluments as Clerk to the Justices of Peace for the County of the City of Dundee, whether payable by applicants or by employers. The Court has treated the words "or otherwise" in the Licensing Act of 1903 as meant to include "fees for work done by the Clerks of the Peace otherwise than under said Act," and I see no reason to doubt that these fees, partly payable by applicants and partly by employers, were meant to be exhaustive, it being open, I presume, to public authorities and Clerks of the Peace to compound for all fees payable by the former for an annual salary.

2. Is the pursuer, under all or any of the heads of Part II. of the Act of Sederunt of 1905, entitled to charge (a) for judicial general business, or (b) for general business under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903, or (c) for licensing general business other than under the said Act?

Part II. is headed "Fees payable to the Clerks of Peace by the County Councils, or the Town Councils of Counties of Cities, for General Business."

It is said by the defenders that "general business" is synonymous with administrative or ministerial business, and excludes judicial business. This seems an impossible reading, in view of subsection 1, "Framing Circulars calling meetings of Quarter Sessions," etc. Quarter Sessions act judicially as well as ministerially. See, for example, Muckersie, 1874, 2 R. (J.C.) 12. I read "general" business as in contrast to the special matters dealt with under Part I., which are naturally paid for by the persons immediately concerned.

Then the defenders maintain that no charges in connection with liquor licences can be made by the pursuer against them under Part II. of the 1905 Act of Sederunt. I think the defenders are right. The Act of Sederunt of 1904 seems to me designed to contain an exhaustive enumeration of the charges under the consolidating Act of 1903, the table of fees in the subsequent Act of Sederunt of 1905 being, in the words of the preamble to that Act, "For work done by the Clerks of the Peace otherwise than under said Act."

But there is one of the heads of Part II. which requires separate consideration—Head 2—which runs as follows:—"2. Attendance at any meeting of Quarter Sessions, or Special General Sessions, or any meeting of Committee of the Justices when met for the purpose of despatching administrative business, except the disposal of applications for licences, £1, 10s. 6d."

Under Head 2 it appears to me that meetings for judicial business cannot fairly be included; and further, that the word "licences" must be read with reference to the preamble of the Act and the general heading immediately following the preamble, as well as with reference to the limited use of the word licence in Part I. of the Act, and therefore must include liquor licences.

It is said that the word "administrative" is not identical with ministerial, but is meant to include judicial. This appears to me to be contrary to the ordinary use, both popular and technical, of the word. As to the word "licences," that is as appropriate to an application for permission to deal in drink as to sell any other controlled commodity, and whatever may have been the intention of the framers of the table appended to the Act, I see no reason to restrict its generality.

The question remains whether under the words "Committees of Justices" in Head 1 can be brought Justice of Peace, Small Debt and Criminal Courts. These words must receive some meaning. There does not appear to be any statutory power in Justices to act by Committees. The words are difficult of construction, but, on the whole, it appears to me that the Act of Sederunt must be read in reference to the well-known practice of justices of the peace to arrange for a rota of their members to attend the different civil and criminal courts held throughout the year. These are de facto, although not de jure, committees.

The result is that I shall find (1) that the pursuer is not entitled to make any charges against the defenders for work done under the Licensing Act of 1903; (2) that he is entitled to charge the defenders for general business done in connection with their Justice of Peace, Small Debt and Criminal Courts, other than items falling under Head 2 of Part II. of the Act of Sederunt of 1905; (3) that he is entitled to charge the defenders for general business done in connection with licensing, other than licensing under the Licensing (Scotland) Act 1903, with the exception of items falling under Head 2 of Part II. of the Act of Sederunt of 1905.

With these findings, I shall remit to the Auditor of the Court of Session for audit and report.—30*th December* 1907.

EXPENSES—ABANDONMENT—ACTION ABANDONED BEFORE RECORD CLOSED — DEFENDER FOUND ENTITLED TO EXPENSES OF COMMISSION ALREADY TAKEN AND EXECUTED BY HIM.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Guthrie.

Burn Murdoch's Trustees v. Thomson's Trustees.

This was a declarator of right of way, in which the defenders, before the closing of the record, but after lodging defences, obtained a commission to take the evidence of aged witnesses whose testimony was important, if not essential to the defence. After this evidence had been taken, and without closing the record, the pursuers abandoned their case by minute of abandonment. They admitted that they were liable to the defender in expenses, but took objection to paying the expense of the defenders' commission, which they said was unnecessarily hurried. Had they been able to precognosce these witnesses before the commission was granted, they would have abandoned their case and the commission would have been unnecessary (Napier v. Campbell, 1843, 5 D. 858; Maclaine v. Cooper, 1846, 8 D. 429). They therefore asked the Lord Ordinary, in remitting the defenders' account of expenses to the Auditor for taxation, to make a finding that the defenders were not entitled to the expenses of the commission. The defenders claimed that they were entitled to the expenses of the commission. They were entitled to preserve the evidence of these aged witnesses, which might have been lost at any moment by death. The cases referred to were cases of witnesses who afterwards appeared at the trial. Even in such a case the Court had complete discretion to award the expenses if there was reasonable apprehension that the evidence would not be available at the trial (Couper v. Cullen, 1874, 1 R. 1101).

The Lord Ordinary held that it was perfectly proper to take the evidence, and that the expense was therefore properly incurred. He therefore, in respect of the minute of abandonment, ordained the defenders to lodge an account of their expenses, and remitted, in the usual form, to the Auditor to tax and report. —7th January 1908.

II. Expenses—Special Case—Question of Intestate Succession—Circumstances Where Unsuccessful Party to Special Case Found Liable in Expenses.

Special Case.

This was a special case presented for the purpose of settling questions which had arisen with reference to the estate of the late John Logan. The executors of John Logan were the first parties to the special case.

The case stated:—

1. Mr John Logan, solicitor and town clerk, Wishaw, died . . . . on 24th June 1906. He . . . . died unmarried and intestate.

2. Mr Logan was, at his death, possessed of both heritable and moveable estate, the heritable estate being worth about £4000, and the moveable about £10,000.

3. Mr Logan was predeceased by both his father and his mother. He never had a brother, but he had two sisters both older than he was. Both of the deceased's sisters predeceased him leaving issue. The second party, Andrew M'Lennan, is the only child of the deceased's older sister, and the third party is one of two children of the deceased's younger sister, the only other child being . . . . John Logan Smith.

The second party contends that he is entitled (1), as representing his mother, to one-half of the deceased's heritable estate; and also (2) as one of the next of kin of the said John Logan, to one-third of his moveable estate without collating the said share of heritage. The third party contends that the second party has no claim to any share of the moveable estate unless he collates therewith his said share of heritage.

The Questions of Law were as follows:—

1. Is the second party entitled to one-half of the heritable estate, and one-third of the moveable estate?
2. Must he collate his share of heritage as a condition of receiving a share of the moveable estate?

Argued for the Second Party: Collation was the price which the heir in heritage had to pay for the right to share in the moveable estate. In the case of a single heir the moveable estate was not part of his portio legitima, and if he wished to share in the moveable estate he must purchase the right. The portio legitima of heirs portioners included the moveable as well as the heritable estate, and therefore they did not require to purchase, and the doctrine of collation did not apply to them (Ersk., III. 9, 3; II. Bank. p. 385). The children of sisters were heirs portioners (Stair, III. 5, 11). Balfour v. Scott (1787, M. 2379) was distinguishable. The heir in heritage there succeeded under a destination which called the eldest heir portioner to the exclusion of the others. The persons with whom she was called on to collate were persons with whom the heritage had never been divided. The expressions in Bell (Prin., sect. 1911) and in Anstruther v. Anstruther, 1836, 14 S. 272 at p. 282, applied only to the class of case of which Balfour v. Scott (cit.) was an example. In Turner v. Cooper (1869, 8 M. 222) the point now taken was not argued, and the case should be reconsidered. Counsel also referred to Gilmour v. Gilmour, 13th December 1809, F.C.

Counsel for the third party were not called on.

The Court answered the first question in the negative, and the second question in the affirmative.

Lord Ardwall.—My Lords, we had a very able and ingenious argument from Mr Hamilton in this case on behalf of the second party; but having considered all that he has submitted to us, I do not think that the questions here put are difficult of solution. On the contrary, I think, both on principle and authority, it is clear that we must answer the first question in the negative, and the second question in the affirmative.

Mr John Logan, who was a solicitor and town clerk of Wishaw, died intestate on 24th June 1906, and at the date of his death his heirs in heritage were his nephews, Andrew M'Lennan, the second party to this case, and John Logan Smith, and his next of kin were these two nephews and his niece, who is the third party in this case, daughter of Mrs Smith.

Now, in that position of matters, I think it is clear that the ordinary rule of collation must apply—namely, that although the heritage of a person who has died intestate goes to his heir, and the moveables to his next of kin, the heir, if he is one of the next of kin, may throw the heritage to which he succeeds as heir into the common stock, and insist upon receiving an equal share of the composite estate, comprising both heritage and moveables; but if he does not choose to collate, he has no right to take any part of the moveable estate. That is the undoubted rule where there is only one heir, and I am unable to see how, in principle, it matters in the very least that, instead of there being only one heir in heritage, there are two or more persons who are entitled to that character, and, as such, entitled to take shares of the heritage of a deceased person.

Mr Hamilton's argument was founded on the position of the mothers of the second and third parties, his contention being that as they—had they survived their brother, the intestate—would have been entitled to share equally both the heritage and the moveables, their descendants per stirpes were in a similar position as regarded heritage, and that consequently the rule above referred to did not apply. I cannot accept this argument. The reason why the rule does not apply, and never can apply, to the case of heirs portioners who are also next of kin, is because they are all heirs in heritage and are also the only heirs in moveables, and there is no person with whom they can collate. They possess the characters of heirs at law and next of kin in their own persons. Therefore there is no room for the application of the law of collation at all. But a different state of matters exists in the present case, for while two of the next of kin are the intestate's heirs in heritage, they are not his only next of kin, because the third party also possesses that character. Accordingly, if the second party desires to share the moveable estate of the deceased with the next of kin, he must, in conformity with the said rule, collate his share of the heritage.

The question raised in this case is, I think, decided by authority. In the first place, there is the case of Anstruther, 14 Shaw, p. 282, where in the course of a long opinion of high authority, delivered as it was by the Lord President and Lords Balgray, Gillies, Mackenzie, Corehouse, and Fullerton, certain propositions were laid down with regard to the persons who were entitled or bound to collate; and the third and fourth propositions were these: "3. In the case of heirs portioners being themselves exclusively next of kin, there cannot be collation, for they are all heirs, and all executors. 4. Heirs portioners being in the same degree of kindred with others not heirs portioners, the former, claiming a share of the moveables, are bound to collate with the latter." Now it seems to me that this fourth proposition applies directly to the present case.

But the matter does not rest there; for in the case of Turner v. Cooper and Others, reported in 8 Macpherson, p. 222, Lord President Inglis says this—it was a case under the Moveable Succession Act 1855—"If the statute does not apply to the case, it seems to me that all the difficulty raised by this special case is removed. In that event the common law says quite unmistakeably that the heirs in heritage, whether the heir be a single heir, or whether they be heirs portioners, cannot take a share of the moveable estate along with the other next of kin without collating the heritage. I do not think it is suggested that that rule does not apply equally to heirs portioners, as to a single heir; and here we have Mrs Turner, Mr Robert Couper, and Mr Thomas Macdonald, taking as the three heirs portioners of the intestate, and not offering to collate. The consequence is, I think, we must answer the first question in the negative." The first question put in that case was whether Mrs Turner, although one of the three heirs portioners, and taking a third of the heritable estate, was also entitled, as one of the next of kin, to a share of the residue of the moveable estate?

It appears to me that the above opinion precisely covers the case we have here. But Mr Hamilton, with some ingenuity, tried to get round it by saying that, while it was not suggested in that case that the rule does not apply equally to heirs portioners as to a single heir, it is suggested by him now for the decision of the Court. But I think the phraseology of the Lord President's opinion goes to shew that not only was the suggestion not made, but that he would have been very much surprised if it had been made. At all events, I think that the decision is a distinct authority for the proposition that whether there is only a single heir in heritage or whether there are heirs portioners, the rule applies that they can only share in the moveable estate of a deceased intestate on the condition of collation in every case where there are other persons possessing the character of next of kin.

The Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Low concurred.

Counsel for the third party moved for expenses against the second party. He stated that the second party had refused to agree to a proposal that the whole expenses should come out of the estate.

Counsel for the second party did not admit the statement, and moved that the whole expenses should come out of the estate.

SUCCESSION — MUTUAL SETTLEMENT — REVOCATION—SETTLEMENT BY HUSBAND AFTER WIFE'S DEATH BEARING TO REVOKE MUTUAL SETTLEMENT—CIRCUMSTANCES IN WHICH HELD THAT PROVISIONS OF MUTUAL SETTLEMENT PACTIONAL AND IRREVOCABLE.

This was an action of multiplepoinding to which the parties were (1) the trustees acting under the trust disposition and settlement of the deceased Rev. Matthew Crawford, dated 9th December 1902, with relative codicil dated 25th May 1904, and also under the mutual trust disposition and settlement of the said Matthew Crawford and his wife, pursuers and real raisers; (2) Miss Janet Crawford Black and Elizabeth Bennet Black, claimants; and (3) the Rev. Charles M'Crie and others, as representing the United Free Church of Scotland, claimants.

The facts of the case appear from the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

Outer House. Lord Dundas.

Crawford's Trustees v. United Free Church of Scotland.

The Lord Ordinary issued the following interlocutor:—"Finds that upon a sound construction of the trust disposition and settlement executed by the deceased Rev. Matthew Crawford and Mrs Janet Crawford, dated 22nd August 1894, Mr Crawford had no power, after his wife's death, gratuitously to revoke or alter the provisions contained in said trust disposition and settlement, and that the trust disposition and settlement dated 9th December 1902 is inept and ineffectual. . . . ."

Lord Dundas.—The question raised in this multiplepoinding is whether or not the now deceased Rev. Matthew Crawford had power to revoke in whole or in part a trust disposition and settlement executed by him and his wife, who predeceased him, dated 22nd August 1894, and with relative codicil dated 15th October 1896, recorded in the Sheriff Court Books of Lanarkshire 20th January 1897. Mrs Crawford died on 4th December 1896. Mr Crawford died on 17th February 1905. He left a trust disposition and settlement, dated 9th December 1902, and relative codicil, dated 25th May 1904. By the said settlement, Mr Crawford professed to "revoke and recal all previous settlements made by me, including the mutual settlement made by me and my late wife Janet Drife or Crawford."

By the said mutual settlement, the spouses, "for the purpose of settling our affairs and providing for the disposal of our means and estate after our decease," assigned, disponed, and conveyed to and in favour of the survivor of them all and sundry the whole means and estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, of whatever nature or denomination or wheresoever situated which should belong and be owing and indebted to them respectively at the time of their death; "and on the death of the longest liver of us, we dispone, convey and make over all and sundry the whole means and estate of which we may die possessed" to trustees named. The trust purposes, after provision for payment of debts and expenses, were (second), that the trustees should hold and apply the whole free residue and remainder of the said estate, and should pay the free income and revenue therefrom to Mrs Black, therein designed, to be expended by her towards the education and upbringing of her daughters, Janet and Elizabeth, until they respectively attained the age of twenty-one years; (third), on the youngest of said children attaining majority, Mr and Mrs Crawford directed their trustees to divide the fee or capital of their said means and estate equally among the said children of Mrs Black, share and share alike, the lawful issue of a predeceasing child being entitled to take their parent's share; (fourth), in the event of the death of said children before the period of division, the trustees were directed to pay the free income and produce of said means and estate to Mrs Black, and upon her death to pay the residue of the trusters' said means and estate to the treasurer for the time being of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland for behoof of objects specifically described. The following clause occurs later: "And we reserve our respective liferents of the means and estate above conveyed, with power to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents at pleasure." By the said codicil, dated 15th October 1896, the said spouses, "in terms of the powers reserved to us in the foregoing settlement," cancelled the appointment of one of their trustees, and named another in his stead, and made certain specific bequests of moveables.

By his said trust disposition and settlement, dated in 1902, Mr Crawford assigned and disponed to trustees (who are the same gentlemen as the trustees surviving and acting under the settlement of 1894) the whole means and estate of whatever kind which should belong and be indebted and owing to him at the time of his death, for the purposes therein set forth. By the third purpose, the trustees were directed to hold for behoof of the said Janet and Elizabeth Black the sum of £800, which should be paid to them in equal portions on the youngest of them attaining majority; and by the fourth purpose, the trustees were directed to pay over the whole residue and remainder of the testator's estate to the treasurer for the time being of the United Free Church of Scotland, to be devoted to objects described in the settlement. As already stated, the testator further revoked and recalled all previous settlements made by him, including the said mutual settlement. By the said codicil, dated 25th May 1904, Mr Crawford revoked and recalled the provisions in his settlement of 1902 in favour of Janet and Elizabeth Black, and in lieu thereof directed his trustees to hold for behoof of these ladies the sum of £150 each.

The question in the present competition arises between the Misses Black, on the one hand, and the official representatives of the United Free Church, on the other hand. It appears that Mrs Black, the mother of Janet and Elizabeth Black, was the only niece of Mrs Crawford, and her sole next of kin and heir in heritage. The net estate, as at Mr Crawford's death, is stated to amount to over £2100. The claimants are not at one as to how much of this sum represents the estate of Mrs Crawford at her death. For the Misses Black it is maintained that Mrs Crawford's estate amounted to £1196, 12s. 3d.; and this sum appears in the confirmation of her executors, No. 14 of process. The United Free Church, on the other hand, maintain that only £200 or thereby of the said sum truly belonged to Mrs Crawford; that the greater part of the items entered in the said confirmation "was money which belonged to her husband, and was invested by him in her name"; and that "this money, in any view, constituted a donatio inter virum et uxorem, and was impliedly revoked by Mr Crawford's said settlement." I am not satisfied that these averments are sufficiently specific to be remitted to probation; but for reasons which I shall presently state I do not think that I require to determine that question.

The cardinal matter, in a case of this kind, is to arrive at the intention of the parties, as it may be ascertained upon a just construction of the language of the instrument under consideration. Where there is a mutual settlement, under which each party gives and receives onerous consideration, the deed usually becomes irrevocable after the death of the predeceasor. And, though the survivor may be fiar, and in a position to dispose of the estate inter vivos, it may yet be the result of the settlement that what he leaves at his death goes, as matter of contract, to the beneficiaries mutually named therein. One must always have regard to the language and presumed intention of the deed as a whole; and it is important to notice, inter alia, what the parties say as to this matter of revocation. Upon consideration of the trust disposition executed by Mr and Mrs Crawford, I am of opinion that the surviving husband had no power to revoke or alter its provisions, as, by his own later settlement, he professed to do. The terms of the instrument of 1894 are, to my mind, clearly pactional and contractual. The estates of the spouses are massed and given to the survivor of them; and on his or her death, to trustees for purposes designed by them both. The parties reserve "power to alter, innovate, or revoke these presents at pleasure." I read these words, in conjunction with the language of the deed as a whole, as importing a power of joint revocation. It was argued that the words just quoted are immediately preceded by a reservation of "our respective liferents of the means and estate hereby conveyed"; and that the word "respective" must be used to import a power to the survivor to revoke the settlement. I cannot accept the suggested construction. The reservation of the liferents appears to be a not uncommon clause of style, and I suppose was introduced as such; but the introduction of the word "respective" is not, in my opinion, strong enough per se to overcome the presumption that a provision stipulated in the settlement by the predeceasing spouse on behalf of her relatives is not revocable after her death by the husband, who had the use and enjoyment of the massed estate during his survivorship. Nor do I think that, even assuming (as was argued to me on behalf of the Church) that the wife's estate amounted only to £200 or thereby, the character of the settlement, as a mutual and onerous one, would be impaired or destroyed. I observe that in the case of Wood, 1823, 2 S. 549, the wife's separated estate was only £100, while the joint estate at the date of her predecease amounted to £1650—more than sixteen times the value of her original estate. Yet her husband, having survived her and remarried, was not permitted by the Court to defeat (by a postnuptial marriage contract) the rights of his first wife's successors under the mutual settlement. In Corrance's Trs., 1903, 5 F. 777, a husband was held not entitled to revoke, by mortis causa deed, provisions made in a prior mutual settlement between him and his wife, who had predeceased him, although it appears from the report that she had no separate estate of her own. In the present case there is no need to push the doctrine of mutual consideration so far; for Mrs Crawford's estate amounted, even at the lowest estimate, to the not unsubstantial sum of £200. The position of Mr Crawford, after his wife's death, was, I take it, that he could use and consume, during his lifetime, the capital of the joint estate; but that, in so far as extant at his death, it was subject to the trust purposes of the mutual settlement, which were not liable to defeat by any mortis causa disposition on his part.

I was favoured at the discussion in the Procedure Roll with a copious reference to authorities. Some of these require, I think, a certain amount of notice. The case of Davidson's Trs., 1870, 8 M. 807, was strongly relied upon by counsel for the Church; but it does not, in my judgment, support his argument. There was there a mutual settlement by spouses, conferring upon the survivor right to possess and inherit all the property that might belong to them at the death of the predeceaser; and providing that, on the death of the survivor, the residue of all that was left should go to the daughter of the wife by a former marriage and her daughter. These ladies survived the husband, but predeceased the wife. The rubric bears that it was held that the provision in their favour was a mere substitution, which was effectually defeated by a testament executed by the widow; and it was questioned by the Court whether their death in her lifetime did not of itself evacuate the substitution. It may be noted that there was, in that case, no machinery by way of a trust, as there is in the present case. But it is, I think, enough to observe that the true ratio decidendi (or at all events, a sufficient one) seems to be that particularly expressed by Lord Deas (p. 810) when he says: "If it appears that the burden or condition sought to be enforced against the survivor was stipulated for by the predeceaser himself, either absolutely or in the event of survivance, that will generally be a case for giving effect to the burden or condition. But here there is no such mutuality. The only burden or condition stipulated for is one which must be presumed to have been stipulated for by the wife in favour of certain of her own relations, and which it would be unreasonable to suppose she meant to be compulsory on herself, if she was the survivor, so that she could bequeath nothing, even to her own relations, with the exception of the two named in the mutual will. The question is really one of intention, and I cannot hold that such was the intention of the parties. I give no opinion as to what might have been the result had the husband been the survivor." I think the case of Craich's Trs., 1870, 8 M. 898, more nearly resembles the present than that of Davidson. Wood's case (already referred to—which was quoted with approval, but distinguished in Davidson's case) and Corrance's Trs. (above cited) are also cases where the joint estate was given to the survivor, as here. In Corrance's Trs. I observe that the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) said (at p. 781) in his judgment, which was adhered to by the Second Division: "The important consideration, I think, is that these provisions conferred benefits (benefits defeasible no doubt by inter vivos deed, but yet otherwise, if I am right, indefeasible), not upon the wife herself, but upon third parties who are her relatives, and I see no sufficient grounds, nor do I think there is any authority, for extending the doctrine of the revocability of donations between spouses to provisions of that description. The cases of Kidd v. Kidd, 2 M. 227, and Kerr, 11 M. 780, seem to me to be sufficient to support this conclusion." I may also notice Gentles, 1826, 4 S. 749, a case of post-nuptial marriage contract, referred to by Lord Deas in Davidson (sup. cit.), as useful and instructive. It may be proper to subjoin a note of other cases cited during the discussion, though I do not think it necessary to refer specially to any of them: Hogg, 1863, 1 M. 647; Lang, 1867, 5 M. 789; Melville, 1879, 6 R. 1286; Beattie's Tr., 1884, 11 R. 846; Nicoll's Exr., 1887, 14 R. 384; Kyd (Kay's Tr.), 1892, 19 R. 1071; Robertson, 1900, 2 F. 1097; Denholm's Trs., 1907, S.C. 61, and later 29th Nov. 1907, 15 S.L.T., 589; Denyssen, 1872, L.P. 4 Priv. Co. 236; Dufaur, 1769, 1 Dick. 219.

For the reasons which I have now stated, I think that Mr Crawford had no power, after his wife's death, to revoke the mutual settlement, and that the claim for the United Free Church is ill-founded and ought to be repelled. But, while I agree generally with the argument presented by counsel for the Misses Black, I do not see my way to sustaining their claim "to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio." The ladies are stated to be 19 and 17 years of age respectively. Under the mutual settlement it appears that they have no right to claim any part of the capital estate until the younger of them has attained majority. Till that event the trustees are directed, as already mentioned, to pay the free income and revenue to Mrs Black, to be expended by her towards the education and upbringing of her daughters. I understand that Mrs Black is not at present in a position to attend to such matters; but that fact cannot, in my judgment, warrant a present payment of the capital to her daughters, before any part of it is, by the terms of the settlement, payable to, or indeed vested in them. It appears to me that the correct procedure, if my opinion upon the merits of the case is well founded, would be that the trustees under the mutual settlement should lodge a claim to hold and administer the whole fund for the purposes of their trust. This has, I think, been the usual and proper practice in such cases, at all events since the decision in Hall's Trs., 1892, 19 R. 567.

I propose at this stage to pronounce findings embodying the opinion which I have expressed, and to grant leave to reclaim.—19*th December* 1907.

279. Conolly v. North British Railway Company.

Expenses — Jury Trial — Verdict in Favour of Pursuer Set Aside as Contrary to Evidence — New Trial Resulting in Verdict for Pursuer—Second Verdict Not Set Aside — Pursuer Found Entitled to Expenses, Except Expenses of First Trial—Held Pursuer Not Entitled to Expenses of Opposing Rule which Resulted in First Verdict Being Set Aside.

Note of Objections to Auditor's Report.

Thomas Conolly, labourer, Springburn, Glasgow, brought an action of damages for personal injury against the North British Railway Company.

Issues were adjusted, and on 21st July 1906 the jury returned a verdict in favour of the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £160.

On the motion of the defenders the Court allowed a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence.

On 30th May 1907 the jury returned a verdict for the pursuer, and assessed the damages at £75.

The defenders having obtained a rule on the pursuer to shew cause why the verdict should not be set aside, the Court on 20th December 1907 refused the rule; of consent applied the verdict; and found the pursuer "entitled to expenses, except the expenses of the first trial."

On taxation, the Auditor allowed the pursuer the expenses of opposing the rule which resulted in the verdict in the first trial being set aside.

The defenders presented a note of objections to the Auditor's report, in which they objected to the allowance of these expenses.

The defenders cited Earl of Fife v. Duff, 1827, 5 S. 524, N.E. 492.

The Court sustained the objection.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—My Lords, I think these expenses (except, of course, the expenses which Mr Dickson has given up in connection with procognitions) should not be allowed. These are expenses connected with the first trial, and although the word trial expresses generally the idea of going to a verdict, and getting the verdict of a jury, we all know that a verdict has no weight whatever except in so far as it is applied by the Court, the Court having power, if they see fit, not to apply it on certain grounds, they having a discretion to judge whether the jury have gone so far wrong in their verdict, either in fact or law, that a new trial ought to be granted on the ground that the verdict was either contrary to evidence or contrary to law. I take that to be a part of the proceedings of the first trial; and until that has been done, nothing effective has been done in the original trial at all. To say that these expenses, which resulted in the pursuer being compelled to enter upon a new trial, are expenses connected with the new trial, seems to me to be out of the question. They are expenses connected with the trial in which the verdict was bad and had to be set aside, and the party is not allowed the expenses of that trial; and my own opinion, apart from authority, would be that he is not entitled to the expenses of getting that abortive trial set aside. But I hold that this view is strongly confirmed by the case quoted to us of the Earl of Fife v. Duff.

Lord Low.—I have great doubts in this case, but I think it seems to have been decided in the Earl of Fife v. Duff that the expenses of discussing a rule for a new trial are part of the expenses of the trial to which it relates. That being so, I do not think it would be expedient to disturb a decision upon a question of this sort pronounced so long ago. Therefore I agree in the result which your Lordship proposes.

Lord Ardwall.—I have no doubt about this matter. I am of opinion that the expenses connected with the setting aside of the verdict in the first trial which has been allowed to the pursuer by the Auditor, were really part of the expenses of the first trial. The proceedings in connection with the first trial never came to anything; the verdict was set aside, and a new trial was granted. When the Court finds a party entitled or not entitled to certain expenses, that is not necessarily confined to the expenses of the specific piece of procedure mentioned in the finding, but includes expenses properly connected with such piece of procedure. When the Court says a party is to be entitled to the expenses of the first trial or is not to be entitled to the expenses of the first trial, these expenses consist not merely of the expenses of the proceedings before the judge at the trial, but of everything properly connected with the first trial, including the expenses of the discussion in this Court in obtaining a new trial. That view is entirely in consonance with what was decided in the case of the Earl of Fife, 5 S. 492, which has been quoted to us. That was a very clear case of this point coming up for decision, because there were in that case two jury trials which, in consequence of the judgment of the House of Lords, were held to be absolutely useless; and one of the parties got expenses of these trials, but no other expenses. Therefore it is a direct decision as to what falls and what does not fall within the expenses of a particular jury trial. On these grounds I am clearly of opinion that the judgment proposed by your Lordships is the right one.—15*th January* 1908.

280. M'Callum v. North British Railway Company.

Reparation — Negligence — Railway — Crowd on Platform — Pursuer Injured Through Rush of Crowd — Absence of Officials — Crowd Attempting to Enter Train a Considerable Time Before Starting Time — Circumstances Where Held Railway Company Not Proved to be in Fault.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of the Lothians and Peebles at Edinburgh.

This was an action of damages for personal injury brought by Mrs Isabella Yates or M'Callum, wife of Alexander M'Callum, miner, Broxburn, against the North British Railway Company in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh.

The facts of the case were found as follows by the Sheriff-Substitute (whose interlocutor was affirmed by the Court).

Finds in fact—(1) That on 1st September 1906 the pursuer, her husband, and three children left Broxburn in the afternoon to proceed to Edinburgh, where they did some shopping; that in the evening they proceeded to the Waverley Station in order to return to Broxburn by the train leaving Edinburgh at 8.38 p.m.; that on arrival at the gate at the end of the platform their tickets were checked by an official stationed there. (2) That the platform, No, 12, from which the Broxburn train started, is a wooden platform, with a concrete margin of 2 feet 9 inches in breadth, and is capable of holding about 2000 persons; that there is a dock on each side for trains, and the Broxburn train was in the dock on the left-hand side of the platform. (3) That on entering the platform and proceeding to the train, the pursuer and her husband found all the third-class carriages filled, but they were told to go in front as more carriages were to be added on. (4) That pursuer went to the front, and waited at the point of the platform where the incoming carriages would likely be stopped; that at this place there was a hoist for goods which contracted the space for passengers. (5) That there were a few passengers already waiting for the carriages, but the arrival of more increased the crowd to about 200 persons; the crowd was orderly, consisting mainly of working people who had been in town shopping with their families. (6) That the pursuer, who had a child in her arms, stood on the wooden part of the platform, within the concrete margin; she was in front of the crowd with no one between her and the place to which the carriages were to be shunted; the platform at this part was well lighted with four powerful electric lamps. (7) That when the carriages were being shunted into the dock, the crowd pressed forward; the pursuer did not attempt to get into the train, but was forced up against the carriages by the pressure from behind, and was thrown down and received severe bruises about the legs and right thigh. (8) That the Company provided two men to check the tickets, two inspectors, porters and policeman, who were sufficient to regulate any crowd that was on the platform at the time. (9) That there was no neglect of any duty cast on the railway company under these circumstances, and the damage that the pursuer sustained was due to the heedlessness of the crowd, and not in consequence of any negligence on the part of the defenders.

2nd Div.
M'Callum v. North British Railway Company.

On 22nd March 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute (Gardner Millar) assoilzied the defenders.

He added the following note:

Note.—There was a little difficulty in connection with the proof in this case, as the railway company did not receive immediate notice of the accident, and their servants were not informed of the accident until some time after the date on which it is said to have occurred, with the result that it was with some difficulty that they could recal the precise circumstances in connection with the departure of the train upon this occasion. [The Sheriff-Substitute narrated the facts to the effect set forth in the findings in fact, supra.]

In these circumstances the pursuer alleges three grounds of liability as against the railway company—(First) That the platform was overcrowded; (Second) that it was insufficiently lighted; and (Third) that there were no officials present to regulate the crowd, and that if there had been, an accident would not have happened.

With regard to the first ground of action I think it is proved that, taking the space where the pursuer was standing with her husband, there was room, taking both sides of the platform and allowing 5 feet for each person, for 500 persons to stand, and taking the whole of the platform from end to end there was standing room for nearly 2000 persons. In these circumstances I think it impossible to say that the platform was overcrowded when there were only 200, or at most 230, persons there. Accordingly the first ground of action seems to me not to be proven.

With regard to the question of lighting, although several of the pursuer's witnesses speak about this part of the platform being dark on the night in question, I think it is clearly proven, from the evidence of George Porteous and Charles Wallick, that the platform was lighted in the ordinary manner on the night in question. They speak not only from their recollection but from reports which are entered in their books, and if anything had gone wrong upon that night they were bound to know from these entries. Now it is admitted that the lamps in the neighbourhood of the hoist are powerful lamps, and if they are burning, the platform is exceedingly well lit. In my view, therefore, the second ground of action must be held to be disproved.

The third ground, and more difficult one, is that the pursuer avers that there were no railway officials present at the time. Undoubtedly, at the gate there were two officials to check the tickets, and, in their immediate neighbourhood, several railway policemen, whose duty it was to regulate any crowd. On the platform there was the guard of the train, and in the neighbourhood there were two inspectors, Ogg and Mein, and also a foreman porter and policeman, whose duty it was to patrol the platform. None of these officials seem to me to recollect the occasion in question very clearly, but I think that is accounted for by the fact that a considerable time elapsed before this matter was brought to their notice, and on the occasion in question there does not seem to have been anything to call their attention to the circumstances, either in the demeanour or size of the crowd or by their observing any accident at this place. The crowd admittedly was of quiet respectable working people, who had been in town doing shopping and were returning in the evening. It is not averred that there was any brawling, or fighting, or riotous conduct of any kind. At the same time I think it proved that no one, when the carriages were shunted into the station, called out to the crowd to stand back, but I can scarcely think that, taking a crowd of that kind, the railway officials were bound to assume that their conduct would be anything but quiet and orderly. If a crowd of that character suddenly presses forward and an accident results, I do not think that the railway company can be held liable merely because there was no official present to call upon the crowd to stand back. Moreover, the pursuer's evidence is to the effect that even if there had been a call to stand back, the pressure upon those next the carriages was such as to make it impossible for them to obey the call.

In these circumstances the law applicable to the case rests upon negligence being proved on the part of the railway company. They certainly do not insure passengers who enter their premises against accident, and in the event of any accident occurring, before they can be held liable the pursuer must prove that there had been a neglect of a duty cast upon them under the circumstances, and that that neglect was the cause of the accident which had occurred. The cases I was referred to, so far as the Scotch Courts are concerned, were: (first) the case of M'Gregor v. Glasgow District Subway Company, 1901, 3 F. 1131. That was the case of an intending passenger from a station of the Glasgow District Subway, who had been injured through being caught between the station platform and an incoming train. He averred that the trains of the company consisted of two carriages, each with a single entrance door, that only persons holding tickets were admitted to the platform, that on the day in question, owing to a breakdown, the trains were running at intervals of fifteen minutes instead of the advertised time of three minutes, with the result that a larger number of intending passengers than usual came to the station before the train arrived, that on the train entering the station, and while it was still in motion, the crowd concentrated at the point where one of the entrance doors would come to a stop, with the result that the pursuer was pressed against the moving train, and being caught between it and the platform received the injuries on account of which he sued. The pursuer there appealed for jury trial from the Sheriff Court, and parties were heard upon the relevancy, and the Court, with great difficulty, held the action relevant. Lord Young said: "I think that it is impossible to say that within the averments here the pursuer could not establish a case of fault against the defenders." Lord Trayner said: "I have great doubt as to the relevancy of the pursuer's averments, but I do not dissent." Lord Moncreiff says: "I say no more than that I think the pursuer is entitled to an issue," and the Lord Justice-Clerk: "I have had great doubt, but I cannot say that the pursuer's averments are irrelevant." Now that case seems to me to be much stronger than the present one, and if the Court there had so much doubt, I think their judgment tells against the pursuer's case here. The second case, that of Fraser v. Caledonian Railway Company, 1902, 5 F. 41, was an action of damages for personal injury against a railway company. The pursuer averred that the defenders were in fault in respect that they knowingly, and without taking any steps to prevent it, permitted a greater crowd of passengers, of whom the pursuer was one, to congregate in a station than its platforms could accommodate, and had failed to provide a sufficient staff of servants to cope with the crowd, and that in consequence, by the pressure of the crowd, the pursuer had been carried along and hurled from the platform on to the railroad and injured. The Lord Justice-Clerk says: "The pursuer avers that the servants of the company allowed the station to become so overcrowded as to be dangerous, and took no steps to prevent danger from this cause. The averments are certainly somewhat meagre, but I have come to be of opinion that the case cannot be satisfactorily decided without the facts being first ascertained." Lord Trayner says: "I think, under the pursuer's averments, she may be able to establish fault against the defenders, involving liability, and I cannot say, especially looking to the state of the authorities on the subject, that the case as presented is one that cannot be made the subject of enquiry." These are the only reported Scotch cases to which I was referred, but there is an unreported case which was decided by the First Division, on Saturday, 5th July 1902. I was supplied with copies of the judgment in that case, from which it appears that the pursuer was one of a company of 930 young men, who went down to the station in order to proceed to a football match, and that there were on the platform seven railway servants to regulate this large crowd, and as the result of the crowd at the station he was pressed up against the train and was injured. The jury had found the defenders liable and had assessed the damages at £50, but the Court, on a motion for a new trial on the ground that there was no evidence to support the verdict, granted the new trial unanimously.

The cases to which I was referred in England were—(1st) Hogan v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 1873, 28 L.T. 271. In this case the female plaintiff was one of a crowd of passengers assembled at the defendants' railway station. The crowd, caused by special excursion traffic, of which the defendants had previous notice, had been allowed to enter the station and to disperse over the platform at will. No precautions were taken to regulate its movements. On the approach of a train the plaintiff was, through pressure caused by the swaying of the crowd, thrust off the platform and hurt. Baron Martin, who presided at the trial, non-suited the plaintiff, on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants. On appeal, the Court of Appeal recalled the judgment and held that the case should have been allowed to go to the jury. It was decided that the question of negligence or no negligence was one for the jury, and not for the presiding judge. But in deciding the case, Mr Justice Keating at page 273 says: "I quite agree that it would be monstrous to expect the company to guard against the pressure of an inconsiderate crowd, and that if the accident did arise from the natural impulse of the crowd, then the defendants cannot be held liable, but it was for the jury to judge of the character of the crowd"; and Mr Justice Grove, who went mainly on the ground that there had been an unlocked gate with no attendant at it to prevent the influx of passengers, says: "I am far from saying that the jury ought to have found for the plaintiff; the only question for us is whether they might have done so." The other cases in England do not raise the question directly. Sturges v. Great Western Railway Company, 1892, 56 J.P. 278, was the case of a passenger in a crowd tripping over a box containing signal levers, which projected about two inches above the level of the platform, and the Court held there that, although L. C. J. Coleridge directed a non-suit, nevertheless the question of negligence ought to have been left to the jury. The case of Welfare v. London and Brighton Railway Company, 1869, L.R. 4 Q.B. 693, was a case of a man being injured by the fall of a plank and a piece of zinc from the roof of the station. There the judge non-suited the plaintiff, and the Court of Appeal held that there was no evidence to go to the jury. The case of the Metropolitan Railway Company v. Jackson, 1877, 3 App. Cas. 193, was the case of a man whose thumb was crushed by the door of a carriage being hastily slammed to by a porter as the plaintiff had risen to protest against the influx of passengers after the carriage was crowded. The judgment mainly goes upon the question whether the question of negligence is to be left to the jury, or whether there is a duty upon the judge to decide whether, in the circumstances, the proof showed negligence at all, but in the course of his judgment, Lord Blackburn says: "My Lords, in all cases of damages for a personal injury against railway companies, the plaintiff has to prove, first, that there was, on the part of the defendants, a neglect of that duty cast upon them under the circumstances; and second, that the damage he has sustained was the consequence of that neglect of duty. A third question, whether the plaintiff is himself to blame, comes more properly by way of defence." The case of Shepherd v. Midland Railway Company, 1872, 25 L.T. 879, was the case of ice an inch thick allowed to remain upon a platform, with the result that a passenger stepping upon it slipped and fell, and was severely injured, and the Court held there that the defendants were guilty of actionable negligence in allowing the ice to remain upon the platform.

There is a case in Ireland, Cannon v. Midland Great Western Railway (Ireland) Company 1879, 6 L.R. (Irish) 199. That was the case of a harvester pushed off a platform by a sudden inrush of people on the platform already filled by a disorderly crowd. The railway company were found not liable, and it was there decided that a railway company is not bound to provide a staff sufficient to cope with the force and violence of a lawless crowd rushing through a station.

Looking at all these judgments, it seems to me that no sufficient case has been made out against the present defenders. It can scarcely be said, because there was not an official to call out "stand back," when the carriages were shunted into the platform, to a group of persons who were all orderly and quiet at the time, that therefore they are guilty of such negligence as to make them liable for the sudden rush of the crowd towards the carriages. In the whole circumstances, therefore, I am of opinion that the defenders are entitled to be assoilzied, with expenses.

The pursuer appealed.

The following authorities were cited:—Macgregor v. Glasgow District Subway Co., 1901, 3 F. 1131; Fraser v. Caledonian Railway Co., 1902, 5 F. 41; Scott's Trs. v. Moss, 1889, 17 R. 32; Hogan v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 1873, 28 L.T. 271.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—My Lords, I do not think that any sufficient ground has been shewn for interfering with the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor here. It is quite certain that it is the duty of the railway company to provide as best it can, and in a reasonable way, for the safety of persons assembled on the platform and wishing to get into a train. It is quite certain also that in fulfilling that duty in a reasonable sense they cannot always be able to control the crowd on the platform. They cannot always, in a large and busy station, be at every spot where a number of people may congregate. Something must be left in these circumstances to the reasonable discretion of the people who are going to get into the train. I am sorrry to say that very often that reasonable and moderate discretion is not exercised. Particularly it is not exercised by men: if it were exercised by men there would be no difficulty with women at all. Of course it is very natural that people who have been in Edinburgh all day on an excursion, and who desire to catch the 8.38 train back, should be anxious, and take precautions not to be left behind. A practised traveller would have no difficulty about that, because he would insist on being provided with a seat. Still, it is a natural impulse, which is not sufficiently resisted by some people, to rush at the train if they think there is a crowd who will be able to get in in front of them. Here it is alleged that there was a crowd of two hundred people on the platform. I cannot say that I think that was a great or a dangerous crowd; nor can I say that at the time it was assembled there, which was a very considerable time before the train was to start, it was the absolute duty of the railway company necessarily to find officials to be at that train. These officials were probably just as much wanted at that moment at some other train which had to start earlier. If they were engaged at their ordinary work in examining trains which were leaving, or just about to leave, the station, they could not possibly give the attention which they might have given on an ordinary occasion, to a train which was only being made up and was not to start for some time; the two things would have to be worked out to the best of their ability. But it does not seem to me that this train was neglected. The train was a train of six carriages waiting for passengers, and according to practice, the day being a Saturday, three carriages from a train arriving about eight o'clock were put on to the front of the train, because on Saturdays there would be more people to be carried than on ordinary week-days. When these three carriages were put on that was simply making up the train to what it was to be when it came to start some twenty minutes afterwards. Apparently there was a rush made for the train when the three carriages were put on, and this lady seems to have been run up against a carriage and was to some extent injured. I am unable to say that I can find in this evidence proof that the railway company were at fault in not having prevented that. I think the Sheriff-Substitute has considered the case with great care, and has given a very moderate and ample statement of the case. Upon the whole matter I do not see that we would be justified in holding that he was wrong in the decision to which he came, and I think his judgment ought to be affirmed.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that fault is proved on the part of the defenders. It seems to me that this was no unusual occasion, and they had no reason to anticipate that there would be any great crowd or any unusual danger to passengers; and it is perfectly plain that there was the ordinary and usual number of officials to look after the safety of passengers connected with this particular train. The accident which the pursuer sustained seems to have been a pure accident for which the defenders are in no way responsible.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree. The question is whether fault has been proved against the railway company. It appears to me that it is plain upon the evidence that the cause of the accident was the heedlessness and selfishness of the crowd of people, or of individuals composing that crowd, who made a rush for the three empty carriages which were in course of being added to the Bathgate train on the night in question. There was no necessity for such a rush at the time, nor was it to be expected, for some twenty minutes had to elapse before the train was timed to start; and as no complaint was made at the time it is impossible for the railway company to prove by their inspectors where they were at the particular moment of the accident. I agree with the Sheriff that it is proved that there was a sufficient staff for all ordinary purposes. Further, it is, I think, proved that the railway company did not allow an unreasonable number of people to get on to this platform; they had taken the very proper precaution of allowing nobody to go on to it except through the gates, where persons were stationed to check the tickets and to prevent too many people getting on to the platform. I accordingly hold that the pursuer has failed to prove that the accident complained of was due to the fault of the defenders.—14*th January* 1908.

CONTRACT—PENALTY OR LIQUIDATE DAMAGES—DENTIST'S ASSISTANT—AGREEMENT NOT TO SET UP IN SAME TOWN AS PRINCIPAL—FIXED SUM FOR "INDEMNITY"—RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

The pursuer was a dentist in Edinburgh, and engaged the defender as his assistant at a fixed salary of £4 per week, with certain commissions in addition. The contract between the parties was embodied in a minute of agreement containing the following clause: "Should the second party (defender) at any time thereafter start business as a dental surgeon in Edinburgh, he shall be bound to pay the first party (pursuer) an indemnity of £250." The defender remained in the pursuer's service for more than four years, and then proceeded to set up as a dentist in a street in Edinburgh close to that in which the pursuer did business.

The pursuer brought this action to recover the £250 "indemnity" agreed upon in the contract. The defender denied liability (1) because the contract was contrary to public policy, being in restraint of trade and therefore unenforceable (Nordenfeldt v. Maxim Nordenfeldt Ltd., 1894, L.R. A.C. 535); (2) because the sum sued for was of the nature of a penalty and therefore irrecoverable, except in so far as the pursuer could prove actual damage from defender's actings (Craig v. M'Beath, 1863, 1 M. 1020; Forrest v. Barr & Henderson, 1869, 8 M. 187; Robertson v. Driver's Trs., 1881, 8 R. 555; Wallis v. Smith, 1882, 21 Ch. Div. 243). The defender further argued that if the sum of £250 was due by him to the pursuer under the contract he was entitled to set off against it a sum due to him by the pursuer under the same contract in name of commissions. The defender had raised a counter-action against the pursuer for payment of the said commissions, and therefore claimed to retain the sum, if any, due by him to the pursuer in his own hands until the sum due to him in the counter-action was determined.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Guthrie. Page v. Sherratt.

The pursuer maintained that the stipulation in the contract barring the defender from practising in Edinburgh was reasonable and enforceable (Ballachulish Slate Quarries Ltd. v. Grant, 1903, 5 F. 1105, 11 S.L.T. 149). The sum sued for was not of the nature of a penalty but was "liquidate damages," and enforceable as such, or the contract was one to pay a sum certain on the occurrence of an uncertain event which had happened, and was therefore enforceable (Commercial Bank of Scotland v. Beal, 1890, 18 R. 80). The defender's claim to commissions was illiquid and therefore could not be set off against pursuer's claim for liquidate damage (Ross v. Ross, 1895, 22 R. 461).

The Lord Ordinary held that the sum sued for was not a penalty but "liquidate damages," and therefore recoverable. He did not hold that the defender was entitled to retain, but gave decree for the sum sued for, subject to deduction of the amount admitted to be due by him to the defender in the counter-action and lodged in Court by the pursuer.

Lord Guthrie.—The defender maintains that the stipulation founded on by the pursuer for payment of "an indemnity of £250 sterling" is in the nature of a penalty, and cannot be recovered, so far as exceeding the damage arising from the defender's actings, which damage the defender avers does not exceed £100. The pursuer claims the indemnity as liquidate damages. If that is the true nature of the indemnity, then the pursuer is entitled to decree, because it is admitted that the contingency in which the indemnity was to become payable has occurred, and it is not alleged that the amount of the indemnity is unconscionable.

The question is one of intention. I am of opinion that the circumstances and the terms of the stipulation sufficiently shew that the parties intended the sum named in Article 3 of the agreement between them to be liquidate damages and not penalty. I proceed upon (first) the term "indemnity," which I take as equivalent to a sum of damages; (second), the reasonableness of a rough and ready sum being fixed, looking to the impossibility of estimating exactly the loss, direct and indirect; and (third), the moderate amount, £250, not much more than one year of the pursuer's salary at £4 a week.

On the assumption that the sum named is truly of the nature of penalty, the defender invited me to express an opinion, so far as the facts are before me, of the probable loss to the pursuer, on the assumption that the defender is a capable operator and personally acceptable to the patients, and keeping in view the defender's lengthened and close connection with the pursuer and his patients. In this view the sum of £250 appears to me a moderate calculation of what the pursuer, continuing to practise in Hope Street, Edinburgh, will probably lose by the defender setting up in Castle Terrace, Edinburgh.

I therefore grant decree as craved, under deduction of the sum of £104, 7s. 9d. deposited by the pursuer in the action against him at the instance of the defender. That is to say, I grant decree in this action for £145, 12s. 3d., with expenses.—27*th December* 1907.

PROCESS — PROOF — LEADING — MONEYLENDERS ACT 1900 (63 & 64 VICT. CAP. 51), SECT. 1—EXCESSIVE INTEREST — ACTION BY MONEYLENDER TO RECOVER DEBT AND INTEREST —DEFENDER ORDAINED TO LEAD.

This was an action by a moneylender for a sum of £67 contained in a promissory note. The defender admitted that he had signed the promissory note, but explained that it included interest at the rate of 40 per cent. on the original loan. He therefore asked the Court to reopen the transaction as being "harsh and unconscionable" within the meaning of the Moneylenders Act 1900.

The pursuer moved that the defender should be ordained to lead in the proof, as the onus lay upon him to shew that the interest charged was excessive, and the transaction harsh and unconscionable.

The defender maintained that the interest being shewn to be at the rate of 40 per cent. was prima facie excessive, and it therefore rested with the pursuer to shew cause why it should not be modified.

The Lord Ordinary ordained the defender to lead in the proof.

Lord Guthrie.—I think that both on the ground of convenience and upon the terms of the Act the defender should lead in this proof. Sect. 1 of the Moneylenders Act 1900 provides that where " . . . . there is evidence which satisfies the Court that the interest charged in respect of the sum lent is excessive or . . . . and that . . . . the transaction is harsh and unconscionable, ... the Court may reopen the transaction. . . . ." The Act thus lays the onus on the defender of shewing that the transaction should be opened up, and he must therefore lead in the proof. There will be no drawback or hardship to him in this course being followed.—14*th January* 1908.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—DIVORCE—EXPENSES —CASE SENT TO PROCEDURE ROLL ON PURSUER'S MOTION — INTERIM AWARD OF EXPENSES TO DEFENDER (WIFE).

This was an action of divorce in which the defender, the wife, admitted adultery but pleaded lenocinium. The pursuer moved the Lord Ordinary to send the case to the Procedure Roll in order to discuss the relevancy of certain averments by the defender. The defender asked for interim aliment and an interim award of expenses in order to meet the pursuer in the Procedure Roll, founding on the case of Johnston v. Johnston (1903, 5 F. 336, 10 S.L.T. 559), where an award was made to meet Inner House expenses. The pursuer maintained that interim expenses could only be granted in order to cover outlays incurred at a proof and should not be granted until the proof was ordered (Mitchell v. Mitchell, 1893, 1 S.L.T. 141). Aliment should be refused, because the defender was living with the co-defender. This was, however, denied by defender's counsel at the Bar.

The Lord Ordinary granted aliment and an interim award of expenses.

Lord Guthrie.—I think that in this case the ordinary rule should be followed, and that the defender must be put in funds to meet the pursuer's attack. The defence is founded upon the plea of lenocinium, and had the case gone straight to proof, the defender would have got an award of expenses as a matter of course. But the case has been sent to the Procedure Roll on the pursuer's motion in order to debate the relevancy of the defender's averments. The defender being thus taken to the Procedure Roll by the pursuer, cannot thereby be deprived of her right to get an interim award of expenses.

It is a case for a small award, and I shall grant £7. With regard to aliment, the defender says she has left the co-defender, and the pursuer does not deny the fact. There must be an award of interim aliment, which I grant at the rate of 10s. per week.—14*th January* 1908.

CAP. 101), SECT. 20—WILL CONTAINING APPOINTMENT OF EXECUTORS, BUT NO WORDS OF CONVEYANCE—DIRECTION THAT WHOLE ESTATE BE REALISED AND DIVIDED AMONG BENEFICIARIES ON DEATH OF LIFERENTER—TERMS OF WILL, WHICH HELD TO INCLUDE HERITABLE ESTATE.

Special Case.

The late Thomas Milne Copland died on 16th October 1905. He left a holograph will dated 13th April 1904, the material clauses of which were as follows:

26 Castlenau Mansions,
Barnes, Surrey, 13th April 1904.

I Thomas Milne Copland residing at above address hereby appoint as my executors my Brother in Law Joseph Calder, Farmer, Seaton of Usan, Montrose. . . . After paying all debts due by me at the time of my death I hereby instruct my Executors to divide the income of the balance half yearly between my sister Margaret Copland or Calder wife of the said Joseph Calder, and my brother John Copland residing at Scotston of Usan, Montrose. On the death of either my sister or brother the whole income to be paid to the survivor and on the death of the survivor the whole income to be paid to the said Joseph Calder during his life if he shall survive my sister and brother, and on his death or on the death of the survivor of my sister and brother if my said brother in law be dead, I wish my whole estate realised and equally divided between my cousins on my mother's side who shall be alive at the time of my death. . . .

The executors were the first parties to the case. The testator was survived by eight full first cousins on the mother's side, who were the second parties to the case, by thirteen first cousins once removed, who were the third parties, and six first cousins twice removed, who were the fourth parties, to the case. The fifth party was the heir at law of the testator.

2ND DIV.

Copland's Executor v. Milne and Others.

In addition to moveable estate amounting to about £3300 the testator had a personal right to a share (valued at under £100) of a small heritable property, a cottage in the parish of St Cyrus, Kincardineshire.

The following Questions of Law were, inter alia, stated:

1. Are the second parties alone entitled to the fee of the testator's moveable estate?
5. Are the terms of the testator's will habile to convey his heritage? Or,
6. Is the fifth party, as the testator's heir ab intestato, entitled to the heritable estate?

The second parties contended that the word cousins included only full first cousins, and that the will was habile to carry heritage. Accordingly they maintained that the first and fifth question should be answered in the affirmative, and the sixth question in the negative.

The third and fourth parties contended that the word cousins included more remote relations than full first cousins, and that the will was habile to convey heritage. Accordingly they maintained that the first question should be answered in the negative, the fifth in the affirmative, and the sixth in the negative.

The fifth party contended that the will was not habile to convey heritage. Accordingly he maintained that the fifth question should be answered in the negative, and the sixth in the affirmative.

The following authorities were cited:—On the question as to the meaning of the word cousins: By the second parties, Drylie's Factor v. Robertson, 1882, 9 R. 1178; Stoddart v. Nelson, 1855, 6 De G., M. and G. 68; Stevenson v. Abingdon, 1862, 31 Beav. 305; Burdey v. Burdey, 1863, 9 Jurist (N.S.) 96, 6 L.T. 573; Thompson v. Robinson, 1859, 27 Beav. 486; In re Blower's Trust, 1871, L.R. 6 Ch. 351; by the third and fourth parties, Williams on Executors, p. 864; Caldecott v. Harrison, 1840, 9 Sim 457. The Court answered the first and fifth questions in the affirmative, and the sixth question in the negative.

2nd Div.

Copland's Executor v. Milne and Others.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The first question raised in this case is as to the sense in which the testator used the word "cousins" in his will. Did he by "cousins on my mother's side" mean first cousins only? i.e. children of brothers or sisters of his mother, or did he also mean to include under the term everyone in any of the degrees of relationship to which the term is sometimes applied? e.g. first cousins once or twice removed, or second cousins. I have no doubt whatever that by "cousins" he meant only first cousins. That is the primary and normal use of the word, and the one in which it must be presumed a testator used it, if in fact he had first cousins, and if there is nothing else in his settlement to indicate that he meant to use it in a wider and looser sense. Such a wider use will generally be improbable, for in many cases, as here, the effect would be to multiply the number of recipients of the testator's bounty to a more or less indefinite extent.

The second question is whether the one-third share (valued at £100) of a small cottage in the parish of St Cyrus, Kincardineshire, is carried by the will. I have no doubt whatever that it is. One has only to read the will as a whole to see that the testator intended to deal with his whole estate. When he comes to the provision which deals with the ultimate division of the capital he uses the term "my whole estate," which I think is equivalent to my whole estate heritable and moveable, and he further directs the estate to be "realised," which seems to me a suitable enough word to describe the turning into money of his share of the cottage. If that was the testator's intention it ends the matter, for there is no doubt that the will is habile to carry heritage.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion. In the English cases which were quoted to us by Mr Munro it was held that when the word cousins is used in a will or deed it must be construed as meaning first cousins, unless there is something in the context to show that it is used in a different sense. These authorities seem to me to be practically conclusive of the present question, because there is no difference between the law of England and the law of Scotland in this matter, and the cases are of high authority, the leading case having been decided by so eminent a judge as Lord Cranworth.

Without authority I should have come to the same conclusion, not only because I think that the primary meaning of the word cousins is limited to first cousins, but because I think there are circumstances here which make it most improbable that the testator used the word to denote more remote relations than cousins-german.

The settlement was executed in April 1904. The testator died in October 1905. At his death he had eight first cousins alive. If first cousins alone are included, each beneficiary will receive a very substantial benefit. He had also no fewer than thirteen first cousins once removed and six first cousins twice removed, that is, nineteen cousins more remote than first cousins, so that, if all these cousins were included, this small estate would be divided among twenty-seven persons, making the benefit to each almost inappreciable. Again, the estate was to be realised and divided equally among the cousins. That is very intelligible if they are all in the same degree of relationship, but it is not so apposite where relations of different degrees are included. Therefore I have no doubt that the construction which I think to be sound in principle is also the construction which carries out the intention of the testator.

In the special case a question is stated as to whether the division is to be per capita or per stirpes. There can be no doubt that the division must be per capita, and indeed the contrary was not maintained.

On the question as to whether the heritable estate is included there is more room for difference of opinion. The question is one of intention, because the words of the will are quite sufficient to carry heritage, if it was intended that heritage should be carried. The will is very simple. The income of the whole estate is to be divided between the brother and the sister of the testator, and failing them, is to be paid to his brother-in-law, and on the termination of the liferents the whole estate is to be realised and divided. There can be no question that the testator intended to dispose of the whole estate which belonged to him at his death. There was no reason why this small heritable estate should be left out. The only circumstance which militates against that view is that the testator appointed the first parties executors but not trustees. There is some force in that consideration, but not, I think, enough to overcome the plain indications of intention to which I have alluded.

Lord Ardwall.—This case raises a question of some interest, because it is the first case in which the term "cousins" has come up for construction in the Courts of Scotland. But there have been quoted to us decisions in the Courts of England which I regard as founded on a correct view of the construction of the term. In conformity with these decisions, I am of opinion that the word "cousins," when occurring in a testamentary writing, ought to be held to signify "first cousins," unless there is something in the context of the deed or in the circumstances of the case to shew that it was intended to designate more remote relatives. The principle of construing the term cousins by reference to the context of the deed is obvious enough. The principle of construction by reference to the circumstances of the case may be illustrated by the case of a testator who has no first cousins but only more remote cousins, making bequests to his "cousins," when it would properly be held that he meant to designate cousins of such a degree as were actually in existence at the date of the deed. In the present case, as pointed out by my brother Lord Low, it would be out of the question to hold that the testator, who had eight first cousins, intended to divide his small estate among the whole body of his cousins of all degrees of relationship to the number of twenty-seven, with the result that the more remote relatives, by reason of their numbers, would carry off the bulk of the estate.

I accordingly am of opinion that prima facie the word "cousins" must be held to mean "first cousins," and that in the deed presently under consideration there is nothing to displace that meaning.

On the second question I have felt some difficulty, not because the will is not habile to convey heritage, but because I have difficulty in holding that heritable estate was in the contemplation of the testator when he made his will. The difficulty arises because executors only and not trustees are appointed, and because there are no words of conveyance of heritage. But I think it is settled that, if a testator's intention is plain, it must receive effect, notwithstanding technical difficulties. As to intention, when the testator says "I wish my whole estate to be realised and equally divided," I think that the Court are entitled to hold that by the words "my whole estate" the testator meant his whole estate heritable and moveable. That being so, when he directs that his whole estate shall be realised and divided, I think that may be viewed as a direct injunction to realise the whole estate without exception. The fact that the will contains a direction to realise, differentiates the present case from the case of Bell (1906, 14 S.L.T. p. 224), where there was no direction to realise and the trustees had no powers of sale. Here there is a direction to realise, which applies to the testator's "whole" estate. I think therefore, though with some hesitation, that the will may he held to dispose of the share of the insignificant heritable subject to which the testator had a personal right.—16*th January* 1908.

I. Slander—Vicarious Slander—Master and Servant—Libel by Servant of Company—Circumstances Where Held that the Managress of a Restaurant in the Service of a Restaurant Company Was Not Acting Within the Scope of her Employment in Slandering an Employee so as to Render the Company Liable in Damages—Question Whether a Master can be Held Liable for a Verbal Slander Uttered by his Servant.

II. Slander — Vicarious Slander — Law Agent—Held That a Client Would Not Be Liable for a Slander Uttered, Without Instructions, by his Law Agent.

III. Slander — Relevancy — Innuendo — Statements Which Were Held Not Capable of Bearing an Innuendo of Theft.

This was an action of damages for slander at the instance of Charles Gustave Nicklas, chef, against the New Popular Café Company Limited.

One of the slanderous statements on which the action was brought was alleged to have been uttered by Mrs Broughton, the manageress of the defenders' restaurant. The facts with reference to this part of the case are given in the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

The other slanderous statements were alleged to have been made by the defenders' law agents in a correspondence between them and the pursuer's law agent. The pursuer averred that the defenders' agents on 5th November 1907 wrote his agent as follows (Cond. 7): "Regarding the wages due to Mr Nicklas, it now appears that on his departure he removed from the café several knives, and probably a silver skewer belonging to the manageress, which he had no right to do. In these circumstances, we do not intend to pay the wages due to him until these are returned." The pursuer further averred that his agent having written to the defenders' agents that the articles removed from the café belonged to the pursuer, the defenders' agents on 8th November replied as follows (Cond. 9): "We duly received your letter of 6th inst. With reference to the articles detailed in the note annexed to your letter, we have no means of definitely saying that any of these articles are not Mr Nicklas' property. At the same time, the facts are as we have stated, namely, that a number of french knives and a silver skewer belonging to the manageress were seen in the kitchen before Mr

Outer House. Lord Mackenzie. Nicklas v. The New Popular Café Co. Ltd.

Nicklas left, and since his departure they are not to be found anywhere. Surely the presumption is obvious. . . . Under the circumstances, we must ask, before paying any wages to Nicklas, that he either returns or satisfactorily accounts for the disappearance of the said french knives and the silver skewer belonging to the manageress." The pursuer also averred that on 13th November the defenders' agents wrote to his agent (Cond. 10) that his dismissal "was due to his own fault; and his conduct in the café, at all events during the end of his employment, was such as to justify grave suspicions." In Cond. 12 it was averred that these statements "were intended to charge, and did charge, the pursuer with stealing several knives and a silver skewer from the defenders' café."

In the first of the proposed issues the question put was whether the words alleged to have been used by the manageress were uttered by her, and these were innuendoed as meaning that the pursuer was a thief and sold dripping belonging to the defenders and dishonestly appropriated the proceeds.

In the second of the proposed issues the question put was whether the defenders by their law agents wrote the letters of 5th, 8th and 13th November 1907, and whether the said letters falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer stole several knives from the defenders' café.

The Lord Ordinary dismissed the action with expenses.

Lord Mackenzie.—The question raised under the first issue proposed is whether the defenders are liable for a verbal slander, alleged to have been uttered by their manageress, acting within the scope of her employment and for the benefit of the defenders.

The pursuer was head chef in the defenders' café, the manageress being a Mrs Broughton. The pursuer sets out that he was under obligation to account for the proceeds of dripping sold, and that he duly did so; that on 25th October 1907 the manageress insisted that there must be fat, although she was aware it had been used for certain purposes in the café; that the underchef informed her there was none, as it had all been used for cooking; and that she then uttered the slander complained of to the underchef. The averment is: "She thereupon told him that he knew perfectly well where the fat was, and that the chef (meaning the pursuer) and he were in league together to dispose of it without her knowledge, and that she had never had to do with thieves before." The pursuer avers: "In making said statements, Mrs Broughton intended to charge, and did charge, the pursuer with being a thief, and with having sold dripping belonging to the defenders and dishonestly appropriated the proceeds, and they were so understood by those who heard them. Mrs Broughton was manageress of the defenders' café, and had full control over the pursuer and the other servants employed there, and in making said statements she was acting within the scope of her authority as manageress of the defenders and for their benefit. The said false charge was made recklessly and without any enquiry. She did not even ask the pursuer as to the dripping, or communicate with him regarding the matter at all."

It was maintained by the defenders, in the first place, that the words used were not slanderous. I am not able to take this view. In my opinion the expressions alleged to have been used will bear the innuendo put upon them.

It was next maintained that the defenders could not be made liable for verbal slander uttered by their servant. There has been no case in which an issue has been allowed in such circumstances, and I should certainly be slow to grant one. The law upon the matter appears to stand thus at present: In the Citizens Life Assurance Co. v. Brown [1904], A.C. 423, it was held (by the Privy Council) that a Corporation may be liable for a libel written by their servant in the course of his employment, though without authority express or implied. The principle is laid down by Willes, J., in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank, 1867, L.R. 2 Ex. 259, at p. 265: "The general rule is, that the master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of the service and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved."

The principle was applied in the case of Ellis v. National Free Labour Association, 1905, 7 F. 629, to the case of written slander. In Agnew v. British Legal Life Assurance Co., 1906, 8 F. 422, the question came up whether the same principle would be applied when the slander was not written, but spoken. The Lord Ordinary (Ardwall) expressed an opinion adverse to allowing such an issue except in special circumstances, and disallowed the issue, because no such circumstances were set forth. The First Division refused the issue, on the ground there was no slander. It was indicated that the questions raised by the Lord Ordinary in regard to the particular issue in question were of great difficulty. The Lord President pointed out that in the Citizens Life Assurance case what was complained of was a circular letter written on behalf of the Company, which was prima facie a Company act, while in Agnew's case it was a casual expression uttered, with a certain amount of heat and wrath, in the course of a call by the insurance agent on his sub-agent. Lord M'Laren expressed doubts whether the principle of the Citizens Life Assurance case should be safely extended to cases of verbal slander. Opinions adverse to the liability of a master for verbal slander uttered by a servant were expressed by Lord Kincairney in Eprile v. Caledonian Railway Co., 1898, 6 S.L.T. p. 65, and by Lord Young in Cameron v. Yeats, 1899, 1 F. 456. It does not seem to me necessary for the disposal of the present case to say that an employer can never be liable for a verbal slander uttered by a servant within the scope of his employment and for the employer's benefit. Even if the principle of the Citizens Life Assurance case could be extended so as to apply to verbal slander in certain cases, I think it is plain it could not cover such a case as the present. Adverting again to the opinion of Mr Justice Willis in Barwick, it is there pointed out that the reason why it is no answer to say that the master has not authorised the particular act complained of, is because he has put his agent in his place to do "that class of acts," and therefore must be answerable for the manner in which the agent has conducted himself. This was the reason why the Citizens Life Assurance were liable for the libel written by their superintendent. In the present case I cannot see how it can be said that the manageress was acting within the scope of her authority in using the language complained of. It was contended by the pursuer's counsel that this is a question for the jury and not for the Court. I do not think so. The pursuer is bound to set forth a prima facie case, which he has not done here. If this issue were allowed, it seems to me that in any establishment where the housekeeper has charge of the servants, then if she called the cook a thief, the master might be made liable in damages. There are several cases in which the principle enunciated in Barwick, and applied to libel in the Citizens Assurance case, has been given effect to. The latest is Mackenzie v. Cluny Hill Hydropathic Co. Ltd., 1907, 15 S.L.T. 518. None of them warrant such a conclusion as this.

I am of opinion the first issue should be disallowed.

The second issue is founded upon statements, alleged to be slanderous, contained in letters written by the defenders' law agents. As regards this issue I think, in the first place, that it would have been necessary, in order to make a relevant case, for the pursuer to have averred that the client instructed the agents to make the statements complained of (Crawford v. Adams, 1900, 2 F. 987). I do not think that the law agent is in the same position as the secretary or other servant of the Company. There is no such averment, and for this reason the averments on which the second issue is based are irrelevant.

Further, I am of opinion that the letters complained of, set out in Conds. 7 and 9, are not in themselves slanderous, and that they will not bear the innuendo set out in Cond. 12. The only reasonable construction to be put upon them is that the agents were charging the pursuer with having removed from the café, along with things which did belong to him, other things which did not. They refused to pay him his wages till he returned or satisfactorily accounted for the disappearance of them. The agents may have been quite wrong in supposing they could retain the pursuer's wages as against the articles in question, but I can find no charge of dishonesty in the letters. The letter set out in Cond. 10 does not appear to me to bear on this matter.

I am accordingly of opinion that the second issue should be disallowed also.

In the view I take it is unnecessary to go into the further questions argued as to whether either of the alleged slanders were privileged, and, if so, whether there is a sufficient averment of malice.

The action will be dismissed, with expenses.—18*th January* 1908.

FISHING — SALMON FISHINGS — MEDIUM FILUM — OPPOSITE RIPARIAN PROPRIETORS EACH HAVING RIGHT OF SALMON FISHING EX ADVERSO OF THEIR LANDS—OBSERVATIONS PER THE LORD PRESIDENT AS TO PRINCIPLES ON WHICH THE COURT WILL REGULATE SUCH COMPETING RIGHTS—DICTUM OF LORD COWAN IN EARL OF ZETLAND v. TENANT, 1873, 11 M. 469, APPROVED.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Argyllshire at Oban.

This was an action of interdict at the instance of Mrs Campbell of Dunstaffnage, proprietrix of certain lands situated upon the north bank of the river Awe and of the salmon fishings ex adverso of the said lands, against Mr Esdaile Campbell Muir, the opposite riparian proprietor of the solum and salmon fishing ex adverso thereof. The pursuer prayed the Court—

To interdict the defender and all others acting for him, or under his instructions, from trespassing or encroaching upon the fishing rights of the pursuer ex adverso of her lands and estate of Inverawe, and particularly that portion thereof situated in the Pass of Brander on the south-east of property there belonging to the Most Honourable Gavin, Marquess of Breadalbane, K.G., or otherwise from interfering with or annoying or molesting Sir Robert Usher, Baronet, of 37 Drumsheugh Gardens, Edinburgh, the present tenant of said fishings under the pursuer, in the exercise of his rights as such tenant; and to grant interim interdict.

1st Div.

Campbell v. Muir.

The pursuer's material averment was:

Cond. 3. On 6th August 1906, between the hours of eleven o'clock forenoon and twelve o'clock noon, while the said Sir Robert Usher was exercising his legal rights under said lease of fishing in the portion of said river let to him by the pursuer, the defender approached him in a small boat which he anchored almost in mid-stream and proceeded to cast his line in the direction of that of the said Sir Robert Usher, and at same time to address him in an offensive manner, with the result that the said Sir Robert Usher was by the illegal actions and conduct of the defender compelled to desist from the exercise of his legal right of fishing in said river.

The defender answered:

Ans. 3. Admitted that on 6th August 1906, between the hours stated, the said Sir Robert Usher was fishing from the bank at a point on the pursuer's said lands alleged by her to be situated on the river Awe and that the defender at a point lower down the river was fishing from a small boat anchored off his said lands of Ballimore and Ballibeg, and on his own side of the water. At this point the river is about fifty yards broad. The defender was fishing over the whole breadth of the river, as he and the pursuer and their respective tenants have been in use to do.

It was admitted that the river was about fifty yards broad at the point in question.

The parties' pleas were:—

For the Pursuer:

1. The defender having encroached on the pursuer's fishing rights in said river, and by his illegal actions prevented the pursuer's tenant from exercising his legal rights therein, the pursuer is entitled to interdict as craved, with expenses.

For the Defender:

2. The defender not having trespassed or encroached on the pursuer's fishing rights in the water of Awe, the action should be dismissed with expenses.

3. The defender being the owner of fishings in the water of Awe (up to the medium filum thereof) ex adverso of his lands, has a legal right to fish up to the medium filum at the place libelled, and is entitled to absolvitor with expenses.

The Sheriff-Substitute (MacLachlan) granted interim interdict. The defender appealed to the Sheriff-Principal, and lodged a reclaiming petition. The Sheriff-Principal (M'Clure) dismissed the appeal.

Note.—The claim of the appellant to fish beyond the medium filum of a wide river, such as the river Awe is at the place in question, is prima facie untenable (Milne v. Smith, 13 D. 112), and I have no hesitation in continuing the interim interdict. I note the subsidiary contention of the appellant that the river Awe does not take being until a point is reached some fifty yards seaward from the place where he spoiled the fishing of the respondent's tenant on 6th inst. The appellant may succeed in establishing this difficult proposition by proof, but, as a matter of interim regulation, the interdict pronounced by the Sheriff-Substitute does not go beyond the requirements of this case.

After proof the Sheriff-Substitute pronounced the following interlocutor:

Oban, 4th April 1907.—The Sheriff-Substitute having heard parties' procurators, and considered the closed record, with the proof, productions, and whole process, finds that the principal pursuer is proprietrix of the estate of Inverawe, and also of, inter alia, the salmon and other fishings in the river Awe ex adverso of that portion of her estate in the Pass of Brander, known as the lands of Branrie, which she had let, inter alia, to Sir Robert Usher, Baronet, of 37 Drumsheugh Gardens, Edinburgh, for the period from 1st July to 30th September 1906, both inclusive. Finds that on 6th August 1906, while the said Sir Robert Usher was fishing from the bank at a part of said river called the Brander Pool, let to him aforesaid, the defender approached in a boat which he had moored in mid-stream, or nearly so, and allowed to float down the river by lengthening or letting out the mooring rope, and when he came opposite to the place where the said Sir Robert Usher was fishing, interfered with him in such a manner as to make it impossible for him at the time to continue fishing there. Finds that the defender is proprietor of fishings on said river on the opposite side from those belonging to the principal pursuer, but that his actions on the occasion above mentioned were illegal and unwarrantable, and an encroachment on her rights of fishing as above mentioned. Therefore continues the interim interdict formerly granted, and declares the same perpetual.

Note.—This action between Mrs Campbell of Inverawe and Esdaile Campbell Muir of Inistrynich and Larach Bhain, two proprietors whose lands extend along the two opposite banks of the river Awe, and who have as pertinents of their lands the right of fishing in said river, arose out of the above mentioned incident of 6th August 1906, described in the evidence of Sir Robert Usher, and of Walter Macgregor, Mrs Campbell's gamekeeper, when Sir Robert, who was exercising his right of fishing as Mrs Campbell's tenant, was so rudely interfered with by the defender, whose conduct I am unable to justify on any ground. He maintains that there was an arrangement or understanding between the proprietors of the fishings on the river Awe that they could fish over the whole breadth of it, but there is no proof of such an arrangement; and if he had such a right, either by law or agreement, it must be limited by the condition that he did not act in æmulationem vicini (Stewart on the Right of Fishing, 2nd ed., p. 143). The Brander Pool, where the occurrence took place, is about 146 yards long and about 60 yards wide, and there was quite sufficient room there for more than one fisherman to enjoy the sport without interfering with one another; and when the defender saw Mrs Campbell's tenant fishing there he could easily have kept away from him, but his behaviour in interfering with him in this manner was not only ungentlemanly, as characterised by the witness Macgregor, but also illegal, and I have no hesitation in continuing the interim interdict, in so far as it prevents the defender from interfering with or molesting the pursuer or any of her tenants who may be fishing from her side of the river. If they cannot fish at the same time the only course would be to have some arrangement made, either by mutual agreement or by some competent authority, binding them to fish on separate days—a most inconvenient course, and surely unnecessary in a river the size of the Awe. The prayer of the petition, however, goes further, as it seeks an interdict against trespassing or encroaching upon the fishing rights of the pursuer ex adverso of her lands, and this involves my defining what these rights are—a question of heritable right of doubtful competency in this Court, as there is no evidence of the exact value of the subject-matter; but I am relieved from any questions of this kind from the admissions of the parties themselves. Mrs Campbell, for instance, says, "I understand I have only the right to fish to the middle of the river on my own side," and the defender in his Pleas (No. 3), says that he, "Being the owner of fishings in the water of Awe (up to the medium filum thereof) ex adverso of his lands, has a legal right to fish up to the medium filum at the place libelled." They have both, therefore, equal rights of fishing in the river Awe, and as a general rule the rights of each extend only to the middle of the river, but there may be some places where the river is so narrow or the water at times so low that the restriction to one-half the breadth would amount to a denial of the right of fishing altogether, and at these places it would be necessary that the right of fishing over the whole breadth be conceded, and there need not be much difficulty in making some regulations that would prevent fishers on either bank from interfering with each other; but at the part in dispute, where the river is sixty yards wide, there is no such necessity, and I think the law laid down in the case of Milne v. Smith, 23rd November 1850, 13 D. 112, cited by the Sheriff-Principal in his interlocutor of 27th August last, may be applied, so that each fisher may be restricted to his own half of the river. By fishing I would understand casting the line over the water, so that one is fishing wherever his line reaches, and I am unable to agree with the defender's contention, which I gather from his pleadings, that he has a right to fish over the whole surface of the river, and cast his line right to the other side provided he keeps himself to his own side, and fishes either standing on the bank or one of the platforms or jetties placed there for the convenience of anglers, or wading in the water, or, as in the present case, from a boat. As it would be almost impossible to mark down the exact line beyond which one may not cast, it may frequently happen that a good fisher would make his cast reach beyond the middle of the stream, but in that case I must hold that it is not done by any legal right, but only permitted by sufferance and the good-neighbourly feeling that ought to subsist between neighbouring proprietors, and I think there should be no reasonable objection, except that it might incommode someone fishing on the opposite side of the river, and I also think the defender is not likely ever to find himself restricted in his casting so long as he refrains from interfering with others who may have as good a right of fishing as he has himself. This right of fishing in the river Awe adds very much to the letting value of such an estate as Inverawe, but would be of little use if the owner were unable to guarantee her tenant against interference or molestation, and it is for this purpose that interdict is sought. I may observe that there is now no doubt as to the Brander Pool, the place in dispute, being part of the river Awe. This is admitted in the pleadings, and it is in evidence that the river, as distinct from the loch, begins at a place called Rudha-na-ha, about 100 or 120 yards further up than the Brander Pool

The Defender appealed to the First Division, and argued: The defender was acting within his rights in fishing in the manner complained of. His right of fishing was not limited by the medium filum of the stream; it was an absolute right of fishing in the stream, subject only to the right of another heritor to fish there also. Should either party desire further definition of the limits of their respective rights, the proper procedure was by way of application to the Court. The right of salmon fishing was an incorporeal right and quite independent of the lands from which it was exercised, whose boundary was the medium filum (Ashburton v. M'Kenzie, 1829, 7 S. 849; Earl of Zetland v. Tenant, 1873, 11 M. 469; Somerville v. Smith, 1859, 22 D. 79; Arthur v. Aird, 1907, S.C. 1170; Earl of Grey v. City of Perth, 1750, M. 12, 792; Milne v. Smith, 1850, 13 D. 112). The pursuer was not entitled to proceed by way of interdict. A single act of interference would not justify such an application. Further, the interdict craved was not sufficiently specific in its terms (Cathcart v. Sloss, 1864, 3 M. 76; Cairns v. Lee, 1892, 20 R. 6).

Argued for the Respondent: (1) The respondent was entitled to interdict, as the appellant had interfered with the respondent's tenant and prevented the exercise by him of his and of the respondent's legal rights. Whatever were the legal right of the appellant, he was not entitled to exercise it in æmulationem vicini. (2) The appellant had no right to cast his fly beyond the medium filum unless the narrowness of the stream made it impossible for him to exercise his right of fishing otherwise, and it was here admitted that such conditions did not exist here (Earl of Zetland, cit., per Lord Cowan at p. 474; Milne, cit., per Lord Medwyn at p. 121; Stewart on Fishings, sects. 142–143).

At the bar the respondent's counsel departed from the claim for interdict.

The Court recalled the interdict, and, quoad ultra, affirmed the findings of the Sheriff, and found the pursuer entitled to expenses.

The Lord President.—The view of the situation here taken by the Sheriff-Substitute seems to me to have been perfectly correct, and I have nothing to add to what he says in his note and what he expresses in his findings, where he pronounces findings as to the actual facts which happened. In that view it is perhaps unnecessary to say anything more. But as the case has been so carefully argued, and the question of the right of fishing beyond the medium filum has been raised, I should perhaps say something on the law of the subject. I do not think I can add anything to what was said by Lord Cowan in the case of the Earl of Zetland, in 11 Macpherson at p. 474, taken along with the comments thereon made by Lord Neaves at a subsequent period of the judgments. Lord Cowan says: "A good deal has been said about the medium filum of the stream. If there had been no possession at all and we came to consider how the different competing rights of heritors on the banks of the river, having each a right of salmon fishing ex adverso of their lands, were to be regulated, then indeed I think the Court have recognised the clear principles on which the right of fishings must be carried on. If the stream is broad enough to allow of a clear sweep of the nets without crossing the medium filum, each riparian proprietor must so exercise his right as to keep within the medium filum of the stream. But then, again, a different state of matters arises where the stream is not sufficiently broad to admit of this. The Court in such cases has found that some arrangement must be made for an alternate sweep of the nets from the different sides. In the case, however, where immemorial possession has been enjoyed, I cannot think that ascertainment of the medium filum is of any avail in determining such rights of fishing."

Campbell v. Muir.
The Lord President.

He is dealing there with fishing by means of net and cobble, but the same principles, I apprehend, apply equally to rod fishing. Now I agree with that exposition of the law. After all, a right of salmon fishing has nothing whatever to do with the medium filum, but it must be defined as to the place for its local exercise. When that is defined by immemorial practice the matter is settled thereby, but rights of fishing are not necessarily so defined, and it is by no means impossible, even at this day, to figure a case where there will be no such definition. Take, for example, the case of the Tummel. If the Falls of Tummel were blown up and salmon were thereby enabled to get to the upper reaches of the river, the Crown might, saving any fishing rights existing in the barony of Athole, grant rights of salmon fishing in the upper waters of the Tummel to the ex adverso riparian proprietors. If this were so, and the question of the limits of their rights were raised, I apprehend that they would fall to be determined on the principles laid down by Lord Cowan. In the particular portion of the Tummel to which I have referred the stream is so narrow that the method of regulation would have to be by the adoption of fishing on alternate days, or something of that sort.

But coming back to the facts of this case, the findings of the Sheriff shew no immemorial practice of exercising a right of fishing by means of anchoring a boat in the river and fishing from it in the way the defender here has done. I think it is also shewn that a perfectly reasonable way to exercise the rights of fishing here would be that each proprietor should remain on his own bank of the river. It may be that a good caster, such as Mr Muir seems to consider himself, might be able to cast across the river so that his fly would get beyond the medium filum. That is certainly a different thing from starting out in a boat and anchoring in the middle of the stream and then proceeding to fish over to the opposite bank. I come to the result embodied in the findings, that the defender was on the particular occasion acting in æmulationem vicini against his neighbour's right, and that that was a just ground for complaint.

Now, when the parties came into Court, I think the whole case might have taken a perfectly different turn if the defender had chosen to act up to the situation and had frankly said, "I agree I did what I see I ought not to have done, but this is not a case for interdict." I think the case would not have gone on if he had said so. There might have been a matter of expenses for bringing the process up to that early stage. He does not take that position, but the case goes to proof and the defender says he is absolutely entitled to do what he did, and so sibi imputet if he finds himself cast in the expenses. The interdict, I agree, cannot stand, because it was an interim interdict made perpetual in terms of an alternative conclusion, and that is sufficient to condemn it at once. At the same time I do not think there would be any difficulty in framing an interdict appropriate to the action out of the prayer. We have been relieved from that by the concession which has been made by Mr Fleming, that he does not press for the continuation of the interdict. I am for recalling the interdict, and, quoad ultra, affirming the findings of the Sheriff, and finding the pursuer entitled to expenses.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree, both upon the general law and upon the particular question which is raised in this case.

287. Havery v. Brownlee.

PARENT AND CHILD—ILLEGITIMATE CHILD—AFFILIATION AND ALIMENT—ADMISSION BY DEFENDER OF INTERCOURSE WITH PURSUER SUBSEQUENT TO ALLEGED DATE OF CONCEPTION—EVIDENCE ON A CONSIDERATION OF WHICH HELD PATERNITY NOT ESTABLISHED.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Roxburgh, Berwick and Selkirk at Selkirk.

Mary Wilhelmina Havery, dressmaker, Galashiels, brought an action of affiliation and aliment against Robert Brownlee, dyer, Galashiels, in the Sheriff Court of Roxburgh, Berwick and Selkirk at Selkirk.

The pursuer averred, inter alia, that the pursuer's and defender's families had long been on terms of intimacy, that about the month of February 1906 the defender began to pay particular attention to the pursuer, that he had sexual intercourse with her in the last week in March or the first week in April 1906, in a stove-house in Paton Street, Galashiels, belonging to the defender's father, and also on the road leading from Melrose to Selkirk near Abbotsford, and on Galahill, Galashiels, in the months of April, May and June 1906. The pursuer further averred that on 29th December 1906 she gave birth to a child of which defender was the father.

The defender denied the pursuer's averments under admission that he had connection with the pursuer on 26th May 1906 in the Melrose Road near Abbotsford.

Proof was allowed and led. The nature of the evidence sufficiently appears from the judgments of the Sheriff-Substitute and of the Lord Justice-Clerk.

On 29th April 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute (Smith) decerned against the defender in terms of the prayer of the petition.

He issued the following note:

Note.—The defender admits connection about two months subsequent to what would be presumably the date of conception. With such an admission proof of opportunity at a time which would account for paternity has been generally regarded as sufficient corroboration of the woman's evidence that connection actually took place. The nature of the opportunity and the whole circumstances must, of course, be taken into account. In this case, these, in my opinion, are such as to establish the pursuer's case.

I see no reason to doubt the evidence of the pursuer's sister, who impressed me as being a reliable witness. Her evidence is quite enough, along with the unchallenged facts, to shew opportunity of a special kind. The exact day when the pursuer and defender were alone in the stove-house is not fixed, but I think it established that it was not earlier than the beginning of March, and most probably nearer the end than the beginning. If connection took place in March at all it would be sufficiently within the time recognised by our Courts as the possible period of gestation. The testimony of the Haverys that they dried their clothes in the stove-house until April is not really contradicted by anyone but the defender. The Brownlees speak merely from hearsay, and from their own actings. The witness Seton, who undertook that duty for them, apparently knew nothing about the Haverys using the place at all. It would not readily occur to one that the weather would change so decidedly in March as to put it out of the question that reasonable people would continue to prefer to dry their clothes in the stove-house rather than in the open air. The Brownlees might quite well elect to make a change while other people might not.

There is no substance in the suggestion that the stove-house was a place where connection would have been impossible or even improbable. It might indeed have been an awkward place in which to commit a rape, but there is nothing said by the pursuer to indicate that her resistance was of a determined character.

The defender's account of his relations with the pursuer is not a convincing one. He was clearly on very friendly terms with the pursuer, helping her and her sister regularly with their weekly washing, yet, according to him, from the end of February to the 26th of May he never spoke to her except possibly in the most casual way, until the day he had connection with her.

There is no attempt to account for this renewal of friendship, and no circumstances adduced to explain how she was led to yield herself up to him so suddenly. But the case against the defender does not stop there; his conduct after the pursuer told him of her condition is not reasonably explicable, except in the view that he then accepted responsibility. He would have it believed that from the first he only accepted at most a conditional responsibility. He even goes the length of saying that he repudiated it altogether when first charged with it by the pursuer. Although he knew he had had connection with her four months previously, he says he told her he could not be the father. That must have meant that he then believed she was too far gone in pregnancy for the connection of 26th May to account for her condition. He indeed says that was his belief, and, although the pursuer told him she had been going with no other man who could have been the father, he was so satisfied that his belief was well founded, that he urged her to see a doctor for the purpose of ascertaining how far gone she was. Why he should expect her to help to prove her own statements false it is not easy to imagine, but the most extraordinary thing is that, notwithstanding his suspicions, and his anxiety to have them confirmed, he never mentioned them even to his own parents when he was tackled about the paternity. He says himself he has no doubt he led his father to believe he was the father of the child. This appears to me to be quite incredible. His whole conduct, up to the day he returned from his visit to Eskbank, is incompatible with the idea that he had any such doubts as he now says he had. His evidence strikes me as being just an attempt to make statements of what occurred at the time which will square with his present defence. I think he has only succeeded in shewing that his testimony is not worthy of credence. The pursuer's story, on the other hand, appears to me to be quite credible and consistent all through.

Regarding the interviews between the Haverys and the Brownlees, when the pursuer's condition was made known to them, I do not think it necessary to say much. Allowing for such minor discrepancies as to the terms of conversations as are not unusual between perfectly honest witnesses, I do not find any material conflict, and, taking it in the most favourable light for the defender, it does not help him.

The attempt to prove familiarities between Wintrup and the pursuer has admittedly completely failed.

The defender appealed.

The following authority was cited: M'Donald v. Glass, 1883, 11 R. 57.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute and assoilzied the defender.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—These cases are very trying, I must say, but I cannot see that in deciding them we are entitled to go contrary to the rules of evidence, under which it is necessary that the pursuer should have some reasonable and substantial corroboration of her evidence before she can be successful. No doubt, in many of these cases the defender in his conscience must know that a decision in his favour would be a wrong decision. With that we have nothing to do. Our business is to do justice by applying the rules of evidence to the evidence before us. In this particular case I look in vain for any reasonable and substantial corroboration of the evidence of the pursuer. It is true that the defender admits that he had connection with the pursuer about two months after the date on which she founds. That is a kind of admission which cuts both ways. In this case I think that it is rather in favour of the defender that he makes such an admission, because it is plain that the pursuer never could have proved the act of connection which the defender admits, and the admission also goes to explain what took place between the families when the matter of the defender's marriage to the pursuer was mooted. I quite agree that, where a defender admits an act of connection before the date on which the pursuer founds, she requires very little corroboration to bring home to him the act which she alleges. It is different when the admission refers to a date after the date on which the pursuer founds. In that case she requires to bring forward substantial corroboration of her evidence, and this, I think, the pursuer here has failed to do. There is no evidence of any previous familiarities between the parties, and I have difficulty in holding that the stovehouse in which the pursuer alleges the act of connection took place was a suspected place. Mr Brown founded on evidence to the effect that in September the pursuer told her sister about the connection which she alleges in the previous March. I think that that is not competent evidence, for it is evidence as to a statement made, as I gather it was made, outwith the presence of the defender, and later by several months than the date of the alleged occurrence. After what had happened between them, the defender, when he was told of the pursuer's condition, was at first not prepared to deny the paternity, and was willing to marry her. It was only on ascertaining that she was so far advanced in pregnancy that he repudiated the idea of marrying her, and denied the fact of paternity. On the whole matter, I think that there is not any sufficient corroboration of the pursuer's story, and consequently that she has failed to prove her case.

Lord Low.—I am of the same opinion.

Lord Ardwall.—I am also of the same opinion. —15*th January* 1908.

The facts of the case and the arguments of the parties sufficiently appear from the previous report.

The Court adhered.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I concur with the view at which the Lord Ordinary has arrived in this case. There was a recorded agreement entered into between the complainers and the respondent by which his compensation was fixed at 15s. 11d., and it is for that sum that the complainers have received a charge. Their ground of suspension is that the charger agreed at various times to accept, and did accept, a less amount, and this is not disputed. But the only recorded agreement is that for 15s. 11d., and the charger alleges that he is again totally incapacitated, and therefore unfitted to enforce the recorded agreement until it is either varied by the recording of another agreement, or by a decision in the tribunal appointed for varying or recording a payment fixed under the Statute.

The complainers seek to prove facts in regard to the alleged subsequent agreements, and the present condition of the charger. I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has rightly refused to allow such proof. The Act contemplates that such matters shall be disposed of in a summary manner by the statutory tribunal, and when an agreement has been recorded, variation of that agreement is not to be sought in a suspension in the Supreme Court, but in an application under the Act (Schedule II. sect. 8). If the complainers had grounds for rendering nugatory the power to charge on the recorded agreement, they should have taken the simple steps offered to them by the Act, by which, if they were right on the facts, they could have barred the charge of which they now complain. They were plainly the "party interested" in terms of the Schedule.

I am, therefore, for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord Low.—I have found the question raised in this unfortunate litigation to be attended with some difficulty, but in the end I have come to the conclusion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right.

On 4th February 1904 the respondent, while in the employment of the complainers, sustained a fracture of the right ankle, and the compensation payable to him was fixed by agreement at 15s. 11d. per week, being the statutory maximum. A memorandum of the agreement was duly recorded in July 1905. In September 1905 the respondent had sufficiently recovered to be able to do light work. He appears to have been very willing to do any work which he was capable of performing, and the complainers seem to have been equally willing to give him work according to his capacity. The respondent was accordingly regularly employed by the complainers and earned considerable wages between 26th September and 9th December 1905. During that period the respondent agreed to accept and the complainers agreed to pay, and did pay to him, in name of compensation, one-half of his nett loss—that is to say, one-half of the difference between the amount which he was then earning and the amount which he was earning at the time of the accident. Calculated upon that basis the compensation paid to the respondent was 7s. 9d. per week from 26th September to 21st October 1905, and 5s. per week from the latter date until 9th December 1905.

Towards the end of December a difference arose between the respondent (who was represented by his law-agent) and the complainers in regard to the amount of compensation to which the former was entitled. The complainers at first proposed to reduce the amount to 4s. 7d. per week, but they ultimately offered to continue the amount which had been paid up to 9th December, namely, 5s. per week. The respondent, however, although he still intimated his willingness to accept one-half of his nett loss, refused these offers—at first upon the ground that he was not able to work continuously even at light employment, and subsequently (in January 1906) upon the ground that the condition of his ankle had again totally incapacitated him. Both of these statements appear to have been supported by medical certificates which the respondent sent to the complainers.

In these circumstances, as the parties could not come to an agreement, the respondent, in March 1906, charged the complainers upon the registered agreement to make payment to him of 15s. 11d. per week from 10th January 1906, that being the date at which he alleges that he again became totally incapacitated.

The complainers seek to have the charge suspended, in the first place, upon the ground that the original agreement—that which was registered—was superseded by the agreements under which the respondent agreed to accept, and did accept, compensation at a reduced rate between 26th September and 9th December 1905. I am of opinion that that ground of suspension cannot be sustained. It is true that during that period the respondent agreed to accept, and did accept, a reduced amount of compensation proportionate to the wages which he was then earning, but there is nothing in such an agreement to imply, nor is there anything in the correspondence to suggest, that the respondent ever agreed that in the event of his again becoming totally incapacitated, or of his incapacity increasing, he should not be entitled to full compensation or to a larger amount than he had been receiving between September and December 1905, as the case might be.

The complainers further argued that as the respondent had only right to claim the maximum amount of compensation, if and so long as he was totally incapacitated, the suspension could not be disposed of without enquiry into the facts, seeing that they (the complainers) denied that the respondent had again become totally incapacitated. They also maintained that enquiry was competent because the respondent having chosen to appeal to the common law by giving a charge upon the decree implied in the registered agreement, could not object to any defence which the complainers might have to his claim, whether under the statute or otherwise, being dealt with in a suspension—that being the appropriate common law remedy when a charge for payment is given. I am of opinion that that view cannot be sustained. The Act makes it plain that such questions as are raised in this case (namely, in regard to the amount or duration of compensation) must be settled by arbitration under the statute, and not by way of action in the Courts of Law. The complainers had a remedy open to them under the statute, because when in the end of 1905 or the beginning of 1906 it became apparent that the amount to be paid to the respondent could not be settled by agreement, they might have applied for review of the weekly payments. The complainers argued that it was for the respondent to make such an application if he was not satisfied with their offer to continue payment at the rate which he had accepted between the 21st of October and the 9th of December 1905. I think that it would have been quite competent for the respondent to institute proceedings under this Act, but I do not think that he was bound to do so. He was, in my opinion, entitled to take his stand upon the recorded agreement, which, for the reasons which I have given, I cannot regard as having been superseded.

Lord Low.

No doubt the result of refusing the suspension will, I imagine, almost certainly be that the complainers will be compelled to pay to the respondent a great deal more than the amount which, if everything had been done in terms of the statute, he would have been entitled to demand. But that is a result which, I am afraid, the Court is powerless to prevent, because the question is not one of common law or of equity, but of statutory enactments. The statute has armed the respondent with a decree against the complainers for payment to him of a certain amount weekly, and the complainers have not adopted the statutory procedure by which their liability to pay that amount might have been ended or restricted. I therefore agree with your Lordship that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary must be affirmed.

Lord Ardwall.—The complainers in this case ask that a charge following upon a memorandum duly registered in the Sheriff Court at Dunfermline under the provisions of sect. 8 of the second schedule of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 should be suspended. Such a memorandum is declared by the same section, taken along with the interpretation clause, 14 (a) of the same schedule, to be enforceable as a Sheriff Court decree. There is nothing incompetent in raising such a suspension, and a suspension of a charge on a registered memorandum was granted in the case of Nimmo & Co. v. Fisher, 1907, S.C. 890. But such a suspension ought not readily to be entertained, and to justify its being granted, it ought to be shewn that without such suspension the complainer would suffer some manifest injustice; and further, that the end to be attained by such suspension could not be attained by proceedings under the said Act.

The facts in the present case are as follows: On 4th February 1904 the respondent, while in the course of his employment, met with an accident and claimed compensation. The parties agreed that the amount should be 15s. 11d. a week, which was the statutory maximum, and that amount was paid from 18th February 1904 till 26th September 1905. A memorandum of this agreement was recorded in terms of the Act in the Special Register of the Sheriff Court of Fife at Dunfermline. The complainers aver that the respondent having partially recovered and returned to work, the parties, on 23rd October 1905, by agreement varied the weekly payment to 7s. 9d. per week as from 26th September 1905, and that this agreement superseded the recorded agreement, and was acted on by the parties for the period between 26th September 1905 and 21st October. They further say that another agreement to vary was entered into on 6th November 1905, whereby the compensation was fixed at 5s. a week as from 21st October, and that this latest agreement was acted on for the period between 21st October and 9th December 1905. At that date the complainers proposed to reduce the compensation to 4s. 7d. a week, but the respondent declined to agree to this, and on 10th January 1906 he left their employment and intimated that he was totally incapacitated for any work whatever.

The complainers admit liability to pay compensation at the rate of 5s. a week from the 21st October 1905 till that rate shall be varied by agreement or review in terms of the Act. The respondent has charged them for payment at the rate of 15s. 11d. a week from and after 10th January 1906, in terms of the only registered agreement. The respondent took no steps of any kind between the cessation of payments on 9th December 1905 and the date of the charge on 8th March 1906. Accordingly, the complainers had plenty of time, if they so desired, either to record their alleged new agreement or to apply to the Sheriff for a variation of the rate of compensation set forth in the only recorded agreement. It cannot, therefore, be said that this suspension is rendered necessary by reason of any hurried action on the part of the respondent. The two grounds on which suspension is asked are, first, that the respondent had entered into an agreement in November 1905 to accept 5s. a week of compensation; and, second, that on 10th January 1906 he was not suffering from such incapacity as to entitle him to receive 15s. 11d. a week, being the amount fixed by the registered memorandum of agreement. The complainers' counsel asks for a proof of these two grounds. I entirely agree with what the Lord Ordinary says in his opinion, "that to allow a proof in this Court upon either of these heads would be to run plainly counter to the policy of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, which aims at providing summary and inexpensive methods of enquiry where parties do not agree on matters of fact." This being so, the next question is whether the complainers might have had the enquiries made and the remedies they seek granted by taking steps under the said Act. I have no doubt that they could.

In the first place, in respect that they alleged that there was a new agreement, they might have applied to have the memorandum of that agreement registered, and if that had been done it would then have lain upon the respondent, if he wished an increase of weekly compensation, to have applied to the Sheriff. If, on the other hand, the respondent had succeeded in convincing the sheriff-clerk or Sheriff that there was really no such agreement, or if the sheriff-clerk or Sheriff took the course suggested by Lord Salvesen in the case of Hughes, 1907, S.C. 607, and declined to order the memorandum to be recorded in respect that there was a bona fide dispute between the parties, then the course would have been clearly open to the complainers to apply for a diminution of the weekly payments under sect. 12 of Schedule I of the Act, which the Sheriff would have then heard and would have decided the question in terms of the Act. At one point in the course of the argument for the complainers the crux of the case seemed to be this, Which of the two parties —the respondent or the complainers—ought to have applied to the Sheriff in the circumstances which existed at 10th January 1906? It seems to me that the complainers were the proper parties to apply, because if the respondent had taken up the position (which he has now taken up) that he had entered into no new agreement in October or November 1905, the way was open to them at once to apply to the Sheriff for review of the compensation payable under the only recorded agreement.

I accordingly arrive at the conclusion that there was no good reason for the complainers adopting the method they have done to have the rate of compensation settled, and I think it would be intolerable in the administration of the Workmen's Compensation Act if it were to be held competent, by merely raising a suspension, to have such questions determined in the Court of Session instead of by the proceedings prescribed by the Act.

I may add that it appears to me from the correspondence which is produced and printed by the complainers, and which may be read along with the record, that there was not at any time an agreement in the proper sense of the word for a reduction of the compensation from 15s. 11d. What happened was, that the complainers provided work in the way of wood cutting for the respondent, whose true occupation was that of a miner, that he worked at cutting wood and in fact did everything he could to earn his wages, and that the arrangement was come to between the respondent and the complainers that as his wages rose his compensation should diminish to the effect of giving him 50 per cent. of the difference between the wage he was receiving from time to time and the amount of his former wages. The whole matter was accordingly left in a state of uncertainty, varying from time to time according as the respondent might be able for more or less work and earn more or less wages. This case differs entirely from the cases of Beath, 1903, 6 F. 168, and Nimmo v. Fisher, 1907, S.C. 890, in both of which the workman endeavoured to go back over a past period and to obtain more compensation than he could possibly be entitled to, on a sound construction of the Act, had the ordinary proceedings under the Act been adopted. In the present case all that the respondent gave a charge for was compensation at the rate fixed by the agreement from the time when the parties fell out, and if that was in the circumstances too high it was a very simple matter for the complainers to have gone before the Sheriff, as I have already explained, and got the rate varied, but this they failed to do.

On these grounds I think the note ought to be refused.—17*th January* 1908.

289. William Baird & Company Limited v. M'Whinnie.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1 (3), First Schedule, sects. 1 (b), 2 and 12, and Second Schedule, sects. 8 and 14 (b)—Duly Recorded Agreement Between Employer and Workman Fixing Weekly Payments — Workman Returning to Work With Same Employers But Earning Less Wages Than Prior to Accident — Charge by Workman on Recorded Agreement for Cumulo Amount of Weekly Payment Applicable to Period of Employment — Suspension of Charge — Offer by Employers to Pay Difference Between Wages Earned During Period of Employment and Wages Earned Prior to Accident — Charge Suspended.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie.

This was a note of suspension of a charge brought by William Baird & Co. Ltd., 168 West George Street, Glasgow, against John M'Whinnie, Charles Street, Kilsyth.

The following narrative is taken from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary:

The respondent is a miner who met with an accident to his eye on 29th March 1906 while in the employment of the complainers. He claimed compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, in respect of his total incapacity for work. On 12th April 1906 the parties agreed that the weekly amount of compensation, in respect of the respondent's total incapacity, was 14s. 5d. The respondent's average weekly earnings in the complainers' employment were 28s. 9⅜d. The sum of 14s. 5d. was the maximum rate under the statute for total incapacity.

The respondent was paid 14s. 5d. a week of compensation from 12th April to 29th May 1906. On 29th May he returned to work at a wage of 18s. 4d. a week, which he continued to earn till 12th July 1906. During this period he was paid 5s. 3d. a week as partial compensation. On 13th July 1906 he again became totally incapacitated, and his total incapacity continued till 13th September 1906. On 21st July 1906 an agreement was entered into between the parties, under which the respondent was again paid compensation at the maximum rate of 14s. 5d. a week. A memorandum of the agreement of 21st July 1906 was recorded in the terms of the Act. The agreement, which is produced, does not refer to the respondent's total incapacity, but in Answer 5 he admits that he received the payment of 14s. 5d. a week from 13th July to 13th September 1906, in respect of his total incapacity. On 13th September 1906 the respondent returned to work with the complainers. He continued to work from that date till 6th May 1907 at wages which averaged 23s. 2d. a week.

On 6th May 1907 the respondent charged the complainers on the memorandum of the agreement of 21st July 1906, to pay to him £35, 5s. 6d., being forty-two weeks' compensation at 14s. 5d. a week, from 21st July 1906 to 6th May 1907, under deduction of £6, 9s. 9d., being the amount received by him between 13th July and 13th September 1906. If the complainers pay the sum charged for, the respondent would receive, in respect of the period between 13th September 1906 and 6th May 1907, a sum considerably exceeding (the complainers say about 9s. a week) his average weekly earnings prior to the accident.

The complainers maintain that the respondent is only entitled to compensation from 13th September 1906 to 6th May 1907 at the rate of the full difference between the average of his actual weekly earnings during that period and the average of his weekly earnings prior to the accident. This, for the period between 13th September 1906 and 6th May 1907, amounts to £9, 10s. 3d., which complainers tender in the present suspension of the charge.

On 5th November 1907 the Lord Ordinary suspended the charge.

He issued the following note.

Lord Mackenzie [after stating the facts ut supra].—The complainers argued that the present case was ruled by the principles laid down in Beath & Keay v. Ness, 6 F. 168, followed in Nimmo & Co. Ltd. v. Fisher, 1907, S.C. 890, and I am of opinion that this argument is well founded. The respondent maintained that this was not so because, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, Schedule I, sect. (1) (b), compensation at the rate of 14s. 5d. a week might be awarded in respect not only of total, but also of partial incapacity. He accordingly maintained that an application must be made to have the agreement reviewed. I am unable, looking to what I consider to have been decided by these cases, to hold that the respondent can found upon the agreement of 21st July 1906 so as to enable him to recover a sum in excess of his average weekly earnings prior to the date of the accident. In the present case, either the respondent got wages on the implied agreement between him and the complainers that compensation at the rate of 14s. 5d. per week, the amount which had been fixed in respect of his total incapacity, was no longer due or claimable, because the total incapacity in respect of which this sum of compensation was due had ceased, and therefore the right to get, or obligation to pay, compensation at that rate had come to an end, or the payment of wages at the average rate of 23s. 2d. a week was, in the first place, to be held to the extent of 14s. 5d. of that sum as payment of the compensation, and the balance as the remuneration given for such service as the respondent, in his partially disabled condition, was able to render. In Nimmo's case the complainers tendered a sum which represented the full difference between the respondent's average earnings prior to the accident and his actual earnings for the period in question. The Court, in respect of his refusal to accept this offer, sustained the reasons of suspension, and suspended the charge simpliciter.

Accordingly, I am of opinion, in the present case, that there should be a finding that the compensation due to the respondent was payable only during his total incapacity; and further, in respect of his refusal to accept the complainers' offer of £9, 10s. 3d., that the reasons of suspension should be sustained and the charge suspended simpliciter, the complainers being found entitled to expenses.

The respondent reclaimed.

The following authorities were cited: Beath & Keay v. Ness, 1903, 6 F. 168; Nimmo & Co. Ltd. v. Fisher, 1907, S.C. 890; Geary v. William Dixon Ltd., 1902, 4 F. 1143; Parker v. William Dixon Ltd., 1902, 4 F. 1147; Clelland v. Singer Manufacturing Co., 1905, 7 F. 975; Williams v. The Ocean Coal Co. Ltd., 1907, 23 T.L.R. 584; Irons v. Davis & Timmins Ltd. [1899], 2 Q.B. 330.

The Court adhered.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The case of the respondent involves the somewhat startling proposition, that a workman who has been injured can be entitled under the Workmen's Compensation Act to receive compensation from his employer at a time when he is earning the full wages he received at the time of the accident—in other words, that he may be made better off pecuniarily from having had an accident than he could have been if no accident had happened, although it is the intention of the statute that the fullest pecuniary benefit he can take by it is one-half of his earnings.

Here the respondent was paid, after the accident, 14s. 5d. a week, which was the full amount he could properly demand under the Act. When he came back to work he earned 18s. 4d. a week, and received 5s. 3d. of compensation. He again became incapacitated and, by agreement, he again received full compensation, the agreement being recorded. Later he returned to work, and got 23s. 2d. a week.

He now proposes to charge the complainers for a sum of £35, 5s. 6d. If this sum were paid to him, then it is not disputed that he will have been paid in wages and compensation, for a period from 13th September 1906 till May 1907, a weekly sum much in excess of his full average wages prior to the accident.

I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding that the contention of the charger cannot be given effect to. It seems on the face of it to be contrary to reason and justice, and I also agree in thinking that the authority of the cases of Beath & Keay and Nimmo & Co. v. Fisher is conclusive against his contention.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the Court must hold that the right to compensation could only subsist while the injured workman was incapacitated from earning wages up to the amount of his previous weekly earnings, and that as he has refused to accept compensation offered him which would give him his just right under the statute, the judgment suspending the charge should be adhered to.

Lord Low concurred.

Lord Ardwall.—I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right, and ought to be affirmed.

I concur with the Lord Ordinary that the present case is ruled by the principles laid down in Beath & Keay v. Ness, 1903, 6 F. 168, and followed in Nimmo & Co. v. Fisher, 1907, S.C. 890.

In the present case, as in these cases, the respondent endeavours, by making use of the machinery of the Workmen's Compensation Act, aided by certain judicial decisions and dicta of not unquestionable authority, to obtain for the period between 13th September 1906 and 6th May 1907, payment of a sum per week which, added to his wages, would bring up his weekly emoluments to a sum considerably exceeding his average weekly earnings prior to the accident. In short, he is endeavouring, under cover of the machinery of the Act, to obtain, not compensation for his injury, but something considerably over and above the largest amount of compensation to which the general provisions of the Act entitle him. It is quite clear that this is contrary to the main purpose and object of the Act, and that accordingly the Court is entitled to interfere for the purpose of preventing an injustice to the complainers, and an abuse of the machinery of the Act.

In my opinion the Lord Ordinary has taken the proper course in suspending the charge simpliciter.

This case presents a complete contrast to that which immediately preceded it in to-day's roll. I think it unnecessary to go into more detail, as I think the whole case has been admirably dealt with by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion, with which I concur.—17*th January* 1908.

OUTER HOUSE.

(Lord Dundas.)

290. Wilsons' Trustees v. Brown's Executors.

PROPERTY—REAL BURDEN—CONSTITUTION—DISPOSITION OF MILL BY A TO B—OBLIGATION ON A AND HER "FORESAIDS" TO MAINTAIN MILL DAM—NO ANTECEDENT TO FORESAIDS—SUBSEQUENT DISPOSITION BY A TO C OF LANDS ON WHICH DAM SITUATED—HELD, AFTER A'S DEATH, THAT OBLIGATION TO MAINTAIN DAM TRANSMITTED AGAINST A'S PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES AND WAS NOT A REAL BURDEN ON SOLUM OF DAM.

In this case the trustees acting under the mutual trust disposition and settlement of Mr and Mrs Wilson, dated 1st March 1894, sued the executors nominated by, and acting under, the trust disposition and settlement of Miss Martha Brown of Lanfine and Waterhaughs, in the county of Ayr, dated 25th April 1890. The action concluded, inter alia, for declarator that the defenders, as executors foresaid, were bound to uphold and maintain in time coming the dam situated on the river Irvine at the Townhead of Newmilns, erected and used for the purpose of diverting water from the said river into the lade adjoining, for the supply of all and whole the Old Wool Mill at Townhead, Newmilns.

The facts of the case appear from the Lord Ordinary's Opinion.

The Lord Ordinary repelled, inter alia, the fifth plea in law for the defenders, and granted decree in terms of the declaratory conclusion of the summons.

Lord Dundas.—By disposition dated 3rd February 1880, and duly recorded in the Register of Sasines, the now deceased Miss Martha Brown, therein designed "of Lanfine and Waterhaughs in the county of Ayr, heritable proprietrix of the lands and others hereinafter disponed," in consideration of £500 paid to her by the now deceased James Wilson (whose trustees are the pursuers of this action), disponed to him and his heirs and assignees whomsoever, but always with and under the declarations and conditions thereinafter mentioned, inter alia, (Third) All and Whole the old wool mill at Townhead, Newmilns, with the ground upon which it was built, all as delineated and coloured red on the plan annexed to said disposition; "With right to the said James Wilson to use the water in the lade adjoining for the supply of the said mill; but declaring that he and his foresaids shall be bound to keep the said lade and sluices in good repair at their own cost and expense in all time coming; I and my foresaids being bound to uphold and maintain the dam in time coming as hitherto." The main question is whether or not the defenders, who are called as Miss Brown's executors, acting under her trust disposition and settlement and codicils, are bound, as such, in virtue of the clause just quoted, to uphold and maintain the said dam in time coming. The dam is situated on the river Irvine, at a considerable distance from the lands disponed by the deed which I have referred to. The defenders' first and principal answer is a denial of all liability. They explain (Ans. 4) that the import of the contract between the parties to the disposition was "that Miss Brown or her estate should be liable to uphold and maintain the dam only so long as she or her representatives, legal or testamentary, owned the lands abutting on or adjacent to the dam." They further state (Ans. 5) that Miss Brown had, before her death, sold her lands of Lanfine and Waterhaughs so far as lying on the north side of the river, and that the defenders, after her death, sold the remainder of said lands to Mr T. M. Mackinnon; that their conveyance to him embraced one-half of the solum of the said dam; that it bore to be under burden of all existing servitudes affecting the subjects disponed, however constituted, and whether shewn by the searches or not; and that "no portion of the lands contiguous either to the mill or to the dam now belongs to the defenders, and they have no right of access to said dam." The defenders plead, inter alia: "5. In respect that the defenders and their author have disponed all lands abutting on or adjacent to said dam to bona fide purchasers, and are not interesteed in any land in any way connected with said dam, the defenders, on a sound construction of the disposition dated 3rd February 1880, are entitled to decree of absolvitor." The defenders' counsel, while entirely disclaiming any argument based upon servitude—quia servitus in faciendo consistere nequit—maintained that the obligation to maintain the dam in all time was a real burden or condition which ran with and affected the lands now owned by Mr Mackinnon, or part thereof; and that they, as representing Miss Brown, were quit of any liability for maintenance, in respect of their conveyance to that gentleman. Mr Mackinnon is no party to this case; but I must consider the defenders' argument, as in a question between them and the pursuers. I am of opinion that the argument fails entirely. The peculiarity of the case is that the alleged burden or condition is not one imposed upon the disponee, or upon the lands conveyed to him, but upon the disponer and her "foresaids." It may be noted that this word has no antecedent in the disposition. But the defenders' counsel maintained that it must be held to signify Miss Brown's successor in her then remaining lands, or some part of them. Now, it is well established that "to constitute a real burden or condition. . . . which is effectual against singular successors, words must be used in the conveyance which clearly express or plainly imply that the subject itself is to be affected" (Tailors of Aberdeen, 1840, 1 Rob. App. 296, 306). What, then, are the subjects which are here said to be affected by the real burden or condition? I apprehend that the crispest answer for the defender to that question would be, "the solum of the dam." But I cannot find in the disposition any words which clearly express or plainly imply this. It seems plain that Miss Brown's designation as proprietrix of Lanfine and Waterhaughs imports per se no such implication. It is further to be observed that at the date of the disposition Miss Brown was owner of only one-half of the solum of the dam, the other one-half having been disponed by her at some earlier date to a third party. The defenders must, therefore, as it appears to me, if they are to make good the contention with which I am now dealing, establish that Miss Brown's undertaking "to uphold and maintain the dam in time coming as hitherto" constitutes a real burden or condition, binding upon her and her singular successors, as owners of one-half of the solum of the dam, for the maintenance of the whole dam for all time. This would, in my judgment, be an extravagant construction of the language of the disposition, and one which the Court must decline to put upon it. I do not leave out of account (what was pressed upon my attention) that in the leading case to which I have referred it was laid down that "if the condition is one usually attaching to the lands in a feudal or burgage holding,—in particular, if it has a tractus futuri temporis, or is of a continuous nature, which cannot be performed and so extinguished by one act of the disponee or his heir, words less clear and specific will suffice to create it than when the burden appears to be of a personal nature; for example, the payment of a sum of money once for all in terms of a family settlement" (1 Rob. App. at p. 308). But, assuming in the defenders' favour that the upkeep of this dam falls within the class of conditions contemplated by the quotation, I think their argument is no whit advanced; for the plain reason that there are in this disposition no words which can, in my judgment, be held, upon any feasible construction, to imply that the solum of the dam, or part of it, or any land abutting on or adjacent to it, were intended to be made, or were made, subject to the real condition of perpetual upkeep of the dam. For these reasons I am unable to hold that the defenders got quit of the obligation undertaken by Miss Brown by force of their conveyance to Mr Mackinnon; and I think that, as now representing her, they are bound to implement it. . . .—20*th December* 1907.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY.

(The Lord Justice-General, The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords M'Laren, Kinnear, Stormonth-Darling, Low, Pearson, and Ardwall.)

291. Graham v. Hart.

Justiciary Cases—Bribery—Prevention of Corruption Act 1906 (6 Edw. VII. cap. 34), sect. 1—"Agent"—Held that a Police Constable was the Agent of the Chief Constable in the Sense of the Act.

Stated Case.

This was an appeal by stated case from a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire at Glasgow (Fyfe) convicting the appellant of an offence against sect. 1 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906. The complaint was in the following terms:—

"That on 10th April 1907, in Main Street, Maryhill, Glasgow, while Albert Carson, Police Constable in the Maryhill district of the Glasgow Police, was, in the execution of his duty, acting for his employer, J. V. Stevenson, Chief Constable, Glasgow, to prevent or detect the commission of, and to obtain evidence in regard to, offences against the Street Betting Act 1906, and, in particular, was engaged watching the actings of John Graham, 207 Main Street aforesaid, who was suspected of committing offences against said Act; Mary Graham, 207 Main Street aforesaid, mother of the said John Graham, did corruptly give £2, 5s. of money to the said Albert Carson as an inducement, or reward or bribe, to neglect his duty, and to forbear from watching the said John Graham as aforesaid, and to ignore or suppress any evidence which he might obtain or have obtained against him, and to refrain from reporting the same to his employer, contrary to the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906, sect. 1, whereby the said Mary Graham is liable to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding four months, or to a fine not exceeding £50, or to both such imprisonment and such fine. May it therefore please your Lordship to grant warrant to cite the said Mary Graham to appear before you, to answer to this complaint, and thereafter to convict her of the offence charged, and to adjudge her to suffer the penalties provided by said Acts."

The stated case set forth the facts as follows:—

At the first calling of this case on 4th May 1907, the agent for the appellant objected to the relevancy of the complaint in respect that the complaint did not set forth facts and circumstances from which an offence within the meaning of the statute libelled could be inferred; that, in particular, the relation of principal and agent does not subsist between the Chief Constable of Glasgow and the Police Constable referred to.

I repelled said objection, and the appellant thereupon pleaded not guilty.

The diet was adjourned till 22nd May 1907.

At the hearing of the case on said last-mentioned date the facts which were admitted or proved were:—

1. That the authority vested with the appointment of a Chief Constable for the city of Glasgow is a committee of Magistrates of the city, together with the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, and the cost of maintaining the police force, including the Chief Constable's salary, is defrayed partly out of money raised from police rates and partly by Government grant.

2. That this body met on 2nd April 1902 to appoint a Chief Constable in room of Mr John Boyd resigned.

3. That at that meeting, Mr James Verdier Stevenson was, as the minute of meeting bears, appointed Chief Constable, "the said James Verdier Stevenson to hold office during the pleasure of the Magistrates' Committee and the Sheriff of Lanarkshire, subject to the provisions of the Glasgow Police Acts, 1866 to 1901, and the Police (Scotland) Act 1890."

4. That the Chief Constable receives payment of his salary from the Police Treasurer of the Glasgow Corporation.

5. That the Chief Constable has power which he exercises without consultation with any one to appoint constables to hold office during his pleasure, and has power also to dismiss constables without consulting anyone.

6. That the wages of constables are entered in a pay sheet which is certified by the Chief Constable.

7. That the actual disbursement for said wages is then made by the said Police Treasurer.

8. That Albert Carson is a Glasgow constable appointed by the Chief Constable who preceded Mr Stevenson, and he is paid in the manner described.

9. That when a constable has been appointed by the Chief Constable he, before entering upon duty, makes and signs before a Magistrate a declaration that he "will faithfully and without fear or favour discharge the office of Police Constable of the City of Glasgow, and will obey all lawful orders by the Lord Provost and Magistrates and the officers placed over me, and will attend to all rules and regulations of the force."

10. That Constable Albert Carson had duly made and subscribed this declaration on 9th September 1901.

11. That the Chief Constable is assisted in the discharge of his duties by various subordinate officers, including district superintendents, inspectors and constables.

12. That it is not the practice for the Chief Constable to give direct instructions to the constables (who number over 1500), but instructions as to their duty are conveyed to the men through the district superintendents or inspectors.

13. That on 10th April 1907 Constable Carson was attached to the Maryhill police district of the city.

High Court of Justiciary

Graham v. Hart.

14. That on that particular day he did not receive any specific instruction from any one as to the duty he was on that day to discharge.

15. That shortly before that day, however, he had received instructions through the district inspector to watch for possible betting offences in the district, and, in particular, to observe the movements of a family named Graham, who reside in the district, and who were suspected by the police of conducting illegal betting transactions.

16. That one of the members of this family is named John Graham.

17. That shortly before 10th April Constable Carson had made a report to the Maryhill district inspector in regard to this John Graham.

18. That on said 10th April Constable Carson and another constable were on plain clothes duty in Bridge Street, Maryhill, when they met and had some slight conversation with John Graham.

19. That later in the evening, as they passed over a railway bridge, the appellant, Mrs Mary Graham (who is the mother of John Graham), was standing on the bridge.

20. That she waved the constables to come over to her, and on their doing so she said, "Are you fireproof?"

21. That she then put two sovereigns and five shillings of silver into Carson's hand, remarking, "That is one for each of you and something to get a drink to save you from breaking it. John would have given it to you, but he was frightened."

22. That she then walked away.

23. That Constable Carson regarded this as an attempt to bribe him to refrain from observing the movements of John Graham or reporting upon them.

24. That Constable Carson took the money to the Police Office and reported the incident.

I held in law, in respect the Chief Constable is entrusted with the duty of detecting crime and exercises his office through the district constables, that Constable Carson, being on 10th April engaged on police duty, was "acting for" the Chief Constable, and therefore, in the sense of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906, was an agent.

In respect of the evidence adduced I convicted the appellant of the contravention charged and imposed a penalty of £10, and in default of payment thereof, within fourteen days from said date, I adjudged her to be imprisoned for the period of ten days from the date of her imprisonment.

The questions of law for the opinion of the Court were:—

1. Was Constable Albert Carson, on 10th April 1907, an agent in the sense of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906?
2. Do the facts support the conviction?

Sect. 1 of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906 provides, inter alia, as follows:—

I. (1) . . . . If any person corruptly gives or agrees to give or offers any gift or consideration to any agent as an inducement or reward for doing or forbearing to do or for having after the passing of this Act done or forborne to do any act in relation to his principal's affairs or business or for shewing or forbearing to shew favour or disfavour to any person in relation to his principal's affairs or business . . . . he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour and shall be liable on conviction on indictment to imprisonment with or without hard labour for a term not exceeding two years or to a fine not exceeding five hundred pounds or to both such imprisonment and such fine, or on summary conviction to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding four months or to a fine not exceeding fifty pounds or to both such imprisonment and such fine.

(2) For the purposes of this Act the expression "consideration" includes valuable consideration of any kind; the expression "agent" includes any person employed by or acting for another; and the expression "principal" includes an employer.

(3) A person serving under the Crown or under any corporation or any municipal, borough, county or district council, or any board of guardians is an agent within the meaning of this Act.

Argued for Appellant: The Act did not apply to this type of offence. It was intended to apply to cases where at common law an indictment could not be brought for bribery, viz. in the case of matters occurring in private life. An indictment in the case of bribery affecting the administration of justice could always be brought at common law, and that was the appropriate method of prosecuting for such a crime as was averred here, not under this statute (Hume, I. 408; H.M. Advocate v. Dick, 1901, 3 F. (J.) 59, per Lord Young at 64). Such a case as this might also be dealt with under the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. cap. 69), sect. 1 (2). That was the only Act under which bribery of a police constable could be indicted. He did not come within the persons to whom the present statute was applicable. The words "principal" and "agent" in the Act must be read according to their ordinary meanings, except in so far as these were expressly modified or extended by the interpretation clause. The words "employed by" referred to paid agents; the words "acting for" brought within the Act a gratuitous agent or mandatory. What had led to the passing of the Act was corruption in mercantile dealings, and it was intended to apply to corruption in such dealings, not to the class of matters referred to in this complaint. The Crown and corporations were included because they were the greatest mercantile bodies in the country. The Sheriff-Substitute had read the words "acting for" in sub-section (2) as equivalent to "under the orders of." A police constable was no doubt under the orders of the chief constable; but he no more "acted for" him than an under-servant "acted for" a manager who was placed over him. Both "acted for" their common employer, and for him alone. What the Act presumed was that the agent should be acting in the business or affairs of his employer. The words "principal's affairs or business" implied mercantile dealings. It was service in the way of transactions which was referred to. But the business of the police constable was not that of the chief constable, but that of the community. The words required that the affairs should be such as the principal was personally interested in. The business of the Crown meant the private, not the public, business engaged in. Similarly the business of the corporation meant its trading affairs or the business of management, not the general interests of the community at large. In truth a police constable had no true "principal" in the sense of the Act. It had been decided that he was not the servant of a superintendent of police (Bain v. Burnet, 1857, 19 D. 405, per Lord Neaves at 407), or the police commissioners of a burgh (Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow, 1891, 18 R. 825), or the standing joint committee of a county (Girdwood v. Standing Joint Committee of the County of Midlothian, 1894, 22 R. 11, per Lord Kincairney at 13). Counsel referred to the Glasgow Police Act 1866 (29 & 30 Vict. cap. cclvxxiii.), sect. 71 (as to the appointment and dismissal of the Chief Constable by the magistrates' committee and Sheriff), sect. 74 (as to the appointment of constables by the Chief Constable), sect. 77 (as to suspension and dismissal of constables by the Chief Constable), sect. 78 (as to dismissal of superior officers by the magistrates), sect. 83 (as to the duties of Chief Constables and constables with reference to the prevention and detection of offences and the preservation of order). A constable might be drafted into a district where the Chief Constable had no duty or jurisdiction. It could not be said powers were delegated by the Chief Constable, because, in such a case, the Chief Constable had no powers which he could delegate. Delegation of powers, which was essential to the relation between principal and agent, was therefore out of the question as between a Chief Constable and the constables over whom he was placed. Counsel offered no separate argument on the second question of law.

Argued for Respondent: The fact that the present offence could be prosecuted at common law did not go any length to shew that the complaint was irrelevant under this statute. It was rather a reason for giving effect to this Act according to its expression. The passing of this Act might be advisable, if not absolutely necessary; because there had been no prosecution for two centuries for bribing a public officer not to do his duty. It was at least doubtful if this offence could be prosecuted under the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889. But if it could, that again was no answer to a prosecution under this Act. There was nothing in the Act to indicate that it was intended to be confined in its scope to mercantile agencies. Counsel founded particularly on sections Nos. 5, 9, 12 and 15 of the stated case as shewing that the constable was acting for the Chief Constable. The Chief Constable had powers of appointment and dismissal and of issuing orders which the constable was bound to obey. It was no straining of words to speak of the Chief Constable and constable as employer and employee. It was not necessary in this case to decide whether the relation of master and servant existed between the Chief Constable and constables under him; the relation of principal and agent did exist. The business of the Chief Constable was to do the very things which the constable was doing (Glasgow Police Act 1866, sect. 83). In doing the work of prevention and detection of penal offences he was assisted by his subordinates, to whom he delegated part of the duties. Such subordinates were then his agents. An agent might yet be a principal to a sub-agent; so it was no answer to say that the Chief Constable was the agent of the community. The affairs might be those of the agent as well as those of the principal; and they were none the less the affairs of the Chief Constable because they were also the interests of the community. The words "employed by" in subsect. (2) of sect. 1 were used in the sense of "engaged by." The word "appoint" in sect. 74 of the Glasgow Police Act 1866 was used as equivalent to "employ"; and sect. 87, which required constables to obey the orders of the Chief Constable, used the words "acting under" the Chief Constable in the sense of "employed by." As to a constable not being the servant of the Chief Constable, there was not unanimity in the decisions; and the view taken of the relation under the old Glasgow Police Act (6 & 7 Vict. cap. xcix.) was consistent with the opposite view (Melvin v. Wilson, 1847, 9 D. 1129, per Lord Jeffrey at 1136–7). And there were other indications of opinion inconsistent with the appellant's contention (Young v. Magistrates of Glasgow, supra, per Lord Adam at 829; Brown v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1907, S.C. 256, per Lord M'Laren at 266). In Brown v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, supra, there was nothing to indicate that the Court did not consider this as an ordinary contract of service. The second question was one of fact.

The Court answered the first question in the case in the affirmative, and dismissed the appeal.

Lord Stormonth-Darling [read by the Lord Justice-General].—The facts of this case, as stated by the Sheriff-Substitute, are that Albert Carson, a police constable in Glasgow, was on 10th April 1907 engaged in the execution of his duty in Main Street, Maryhill, and in particular was watching the actings of a certain John Graham, who was suspected of committing offences under the Street Betting Act 1906, when John Graham's mother accosted Carson, and put two sovereigns and five shillings into his hand, making at the same time a remark which referred to her son John, and which led the constable to conclude that the act was an attempt to bribe him to refrain from observing the movements of John Graham, or reporting upon them. The constable accordingly took the money to the police office, and reported the incident.

High Court of Justiciary

Graham v. Hart.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.

A complaint was then brought against Mary Graham in which the constable was described as "acting for his employer J. V. Stevenson, Chief Constable, Glasgow," and the accused was charged with a contravention of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906, section 1. An objection to the relevancy was taken on her behalf, to the effect that "the relation of principal and agent does not subsist between the Chief Constable of Glasgow and the police constable referred to." The Sheriff-Substitute repelled the objection, and after an adjournment of the diet to 22nd May, the trial proceeded. The result was that the learned Sheriff convicted the accused of the contravention charged, and imposed a penalty of £10. The Sheriff narrates the facts, and tells us that he held in law "in respect the Chief Constable is entrusted with the duty of detecting crime, and exercises his office through the district constables, that Constable Carson, being on 10th April engaged on police duty, was acting for the Chief Constable, and therefore, in the sense of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906, was an agent." The only question of law which the Sheriff propounds for our opinion (the second question being merely on the facts) is this: "Was Constable Albert Carson, on 10th April 1907, an agent in the sense of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906?"

I have no hesitation in answering that question in the affirmative, which is only another way of saying that I think the learned Sheriff was right in his finding in law.

It seems to me very little to the purpose to point to the native vigour of the common law of Scotland, and say that an offence such as that of which the Sheriff has convicted Mary Graham would have been cognisable at common law. So it would (see Hume, I. 408). But if a statute which is entitled "An Act for the better prevention of corruption" covers the case, why should it not be brought into use? Equally little to the purpose is it to say that this Act was mainly intended to prevent commercial corruption by striking at secret commissions in private life. If this Act was intended to be so limited, it would have been expressly restricted to such cases, instead of which subsection 3 of section 1 conclusively shews that the Act was intended to strike at persons serving under the Crown or under any Corporation or local Board. This it does by sweeping in all such persons under the generic name of agent, just as "agent" is defined in the immediately preceding paragraph as "any person employed by or acting for another," and "principal" is defined as including an "employer." At all points, therefore, these definitions seem to me to meet the case in hand. Mr Stevenson, the Chief Constable, was rightly described in the complaint as Carson's employer, for the holder of the office of Chief Constable appointed him under section 74 of the Glasgow Police Act 1866, and had, under section 77 of the same Act, the absolute power of suspending or dismissing him. Similarly Carson answers the description of a person "employed by or acting for" Mr Stevenson, because the work which he was doing at the time when the offence was committed was work which by section 83 of the same Act was made part of the "duty of the Chief Constable and of the Superintendents, Lieutenants, and Constables acting under or appointed by him." When we are in the region of definition, I should like to say that the reference in section 1 of the statute when it deals with a bribe given or offered to an agent as being "in relation to his principal's affairs or business" does not seem to me to create any difficulty, for this bribe was offered to the constable as an inducement or reward for forbearing to do an act in relation to the Chief Constable's affairs or business, i.e. forbearing to do a duty which was equally the Chief Constable's and his own.

I may add that if the Act of 1906 covers the case I think it quite idle to argue that another Act—the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act 1889—might also be made to cover the case. Perhaps it might. But why should the fact of there being two or more statutes applicable to the offence, disable the public prosecutor from making his election under which of them he is to bring a prosecution, any more than the existence of a rule of the common law to which he might resort if he chose? I may also add that I am quite at a loss to see what bearing decisions in the civil court as to the liability of public officials for the wrongous acts of constables can have on the construction of a statute dealing with a criminal offence.

The Lord Justice-General.—I concur in that opinion.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The contention of the appellant in this case as stated at the bar is based upon the view that the words of the statute, "affairs or business," must relate to mercantile affairs, and cannot be applied to employment for state or municipal duties, in which no question of business in the ordinary sense is involved. I am quite unable to accept any such view of the statute for the prevention of corruption which was passed in 1906. That view is completely excluded by the 3rd subsection of section 1, by which it is provided that "a person serving under the Crown, or under any corporation, or any municipal, borough, county, or district council, or any board of guardians, is an agent within the meaning of this Act."

A police constable is therefore plainly in the position of a person to whom the Act may apply, and the sole question here, therefore, is whether the complaint correctly describes the agency. Is the police constable correctly described as being the agent of the Chief Constable, under whom he was serving at the time? Now the position of the Chief Constable is this, that he has delegated to him the power and duty of selecting and appointing all constables, that he has power to suspend or dismiss all ordinary constables, such as the constable whom it was attempted to bribe in this case, that the magistrates cannot interfere with him as regards engagement or suspension or dismissal, and that he, being entrusted with the police duties falling on the municipal authority, and having engaged constables to carry out his duties of keeping order and dealing with crime, is in the active exercise of these powers, through them. The constable in doing his duties on his beat is doing so because he is employed to do so by the Chief Constable, and is responsible to him to do these duties faithfully, and to resist all attempts to seduce him into doing things contrary to his duty. I cannot doubt that the magistrate was entitled to hold, on the facts which he found proved, that in law the constable was "acting for the Chief Constable, and therefore, in the sense of the Prevention of Corruption Act 1906, was an agent."

I agree entirely with the opinion of Lord Stormonth-Darling, and do not think it necessary to say more.

Lord M'Laren.—I agree in Lord Stormonth-Darling's opinion.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree in the opinions which have been delivered.

Lord Low.—I am in the same position.

Lord Ardwall.—I also agree in Lord Stormonth-Darling's opinion.

It was intimated that Lord Pearson, who was present at the hearing but absent at the advising, concurred in the opinion of Lord Stormonth-Darling.—17*th January* 1908.

M'Creadie v. Thomson.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 968; and supra, p. 216.)

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the previous reports and the Lord Ordinary's note. After a proof the Lord Ordinary assessed the damages at £22, 17s. 2d., and restricted the pursuer's expenses to one-third taxed expenses since the date of the return of the process to the Outer House.

Lord Johnston.—It falls to me now to dispose of this case on the merits, it having been determined on reclaiming note to the Second Division, affirming my previous judgment, that action lay against the defender, the pursuer's averment that in his capacity as magistrate he had acted ultra vires in pronouncing sentence upon her being relevant, that he was not protected by privilege, and that it was not necessary to establish malice.

At the outset I would desire to express the utmost sympathy for the defender. He had only two days before been elected chief magistrate of the burgh of Wishaw, and had taken his seat on the Bench for the first time, when the pursuer was brought before him. It is apparent that he was actuated by the most honourable desire to do his duty in the position in which he had been placed, and he has been the accidental victim of an irregular practice of his predecessors, and I think of the carelessness of the Court officials. But, notwithstanding, he committed a mistake which led to the unjustifiable imprisonment of the pursuer, and to her lying in prison for twelve of the fourteen days of her sentence before she was liberated. The only question which I have now to decide is, I think, whether the surrounding circumstances form a defence to the claim which would otherwise subsist for wrongous imprisonment.

The circumstances of the case are, that on Saturday night 10th November 1906, about 8.30 p.m., the pursuer, in a state of intoxication, was being led home by her husband through Cambusnethan Street, Wishaw, her husband having had drink also, but not being so intoxicated as the pursuer. The pursuer, though a married woman, is of the prostitute class; she had had some words with a man unknown, who had accosted and was following her, and she was yelling at the top of her voice, cursing and swearing and shouting at him most obscene remarks. The party were being followed by a large crowd, when the police took her in custody, and sent her husband home. She remained in custody till Monday morning the 12th November, when she was brought up before the defender, charged with a contravention of sect. 380 (10) of the Burgh Police Act.

That subsection provides that every person who "commits a nuisance or uses any obscene, abusive, or indecent language to the annoyance of any person" shall be liable to a penalty of 40s. But by sects. 487 and 501 of the same Act it is provided that a magistrate may sentence any person found liable in a pecuniary penalty to imprisonment until the same is paid, the period of imprisonment corresponding to the fine of 40s. being limited to one month. In the case in question, therefore, the primary penalty was necessarily a fine, and imprisonment could only be awarded failing payment and during the non-payment.

The judicial establishment of the Burgh Police Court at Wishaw was at the date of the Court in question a Magistrate or Magistrates on the Bench, the Town-Clerk, who is also Clerk of Court, sitting with the Magistrates as a quasi assessor, his Depute sitting as acting Clerk of Court, the Public Prosecutor or Burgh Procurator-Fiscal, and the Inspector of Police acting as sort of Police Clerk. There had for many years prior to the occasion in question existed a most improper practice in the Burgh Court at Wishaw, that complaints were read out to the accused, not by the Clerk of Court, but by the Inspector of Police or Police Clerk, and a further practice, which I believe is more or less common elsewhere owing to press of business, but not any more really defensible, that this official only reads the manuscript detail of the charge, and not the conclusion indicating the statutory offence and resulting penalty. It is to this practice that the defender's mistake was primarily attributable. But unfortunately the Town-Clerk and Magistrates' Assessor was himself new to the office, having only been appointed six weeks before, and this being only his second Court, and he, when he heard the sentence pronounced, failed in his duty to keep the Magistrate right. Further, the then Procurator-Fiscal (for he has since retired), on whom in a secondary degree lay the same duty, depones that he did not hear the sentence, he being somewhat deaf, and so equally failed in his duty, and did not draw the Magistrate's attention to the mistake he was making.

It must, moreover, be admitted that there was considerable justification for the Magistrate's belief, that he was dealing with a common law charge of breach of the peace, which he explains led him to the mistake which he made. In the first place, the species facti as set forth in the complaint No. 42 of process, and still more as disclosed in the more detailed police information No. 41 of process, would have justified a charge of breach of the peace, quite as much as the actual charge of using obscene language, so much so that the police clerk, when filling in the scroll charge book, entered the case at first as one of breach of the peace, and only altered it to one of using obscene language in contravention of the statute, when he came to fill in the detention book and make up his police information. At the same time, the true nature of the charge would have at once appeared had the Magistrate himself read the complaint, or the whole of the police information. I should say that the police clerk gave a very proper and intelligible reason for changing the nature of the charge, but unfortunately he introduced into the police information a further quite intelligible but misleading statement which tended largely to confirm the Magistrate's mistake. At the close of the information he added, "This woman was convicted and fined 10s. a week ago for a similar offence in Main Street, Wishaw," and noted in red ink under the name of the accused, "Wishaw Court, B. of P., 1st November 1906, 10s. 6d. or 7 days," thus bringing breach of the peace prominently before the reader.

So standing matters, the complaint was, along with a dozen others, laid before the Magistrate in the Magistrate's private room, before the sitting of the Court, in ordinary course, for his signature to the warrant for apprehension, and when the case was called, and the complaint, so far as read, was read, the accused pled guilty, and the defender, in respect of her judicial confession, sentenced her to fourteen days' imprisonment. The plea and the sentence were filled in by the Depute Clerk of Court, who also failed to draw the Magistrate's attention to the mistake, and at the close of the Court and before leaving the Bench the defender signed both plea and sentence, along with a bunch of others comprising the Court work of the day, and finally filled in the sentence in the Magistrates' Court-book. According to usage this book was ready prepared for him with the name of the accused, the character of the offence stated as "Con. Pol. Act," but the Procurator-Fiscal merely read out to him the sentences, and in this case the defender simply inserted in the proper column "fourteen days," without taking further notice of the entry. The purpose of this book is a record of the Court business, but in particular a check on the Procurator-Fiscal in collecting fines.

On the same day, 12th November, the pursuer was taken to Duke Street Prison, Glasgow, to serve her period of fourteen days' imprisonment, without objection by her or on her behalf. On the following Monday, 19th November, the pursuer's husband, knowing nothing of the error which had been committed, which is not at all surprising, as neither he nor she could be expected to know the details of the Burgh Police Act, called on Mr Cameron, law agent, Motherwell, with a view to trying to get his wife out of prison. He gave Mr Cameron no clue to the illegality of the sentence, of which he was quite unaware, but Mr Cameron undertook to make enquiry and see what he could do. He first obtained a copy of the local newspaper of Wednesday, 14th November, No. 51 of process, from which he found that the pursuer had been charged with using indecent language, had pleaded guilty, and had been sentenced to fourteen days' imprisonment. And on looking up the statute he saw that there was reason to suspect that an irregularity had been committed. Accordingly, on the 22nd or 23rd of November, he went to Wishaw, having, I think, again seen pursuer's husband, obtained a perusal of the complaint and brought to the knowledge of the officials that a mistake had been committed, when it was arranged, with the sanction of the defender, that a letter should be written by the Town Clerk, as Clerk of Court, to the prison officials at Glasgow, requesting that the pursuer might be liberated. In reply the prison authorities intimated that they were powerless to act without a Bill of Suspension and Liberation, and accordingly Mr Cameron was obliged to instruct his Edinburgh correspondent, Mr Robertson, S.S.C., and such Bill was presented accordingly. Interim liberation was granted, and the pursuer was liberated ad interim on Saturday, 24th November, two days before the expiry of her sentence, and in due course, there being no opposition, the Bill of Suspension was passed, with seven guineas of modified expenses.

I am bound to say that there is no foundation at all for the imputation, I think unfortunately made, that Mr Cameron was intervening at his own hand and in order to make business. He acted on employment, and acted properly and successfully. But I cannot equally approve the preposterous action of damages for £1000, even though subsequently restricted to £250, raised in the name of the woman M'Creadie. Nevertheless, while her character as an habitual offender, and the circumstances in which on the occasion in question she was brought before the Court may affect the question of damages, she is entitled to have her liberty protected, and the defender's action must be regarded irrespective of these considerations.

I understand it to be laid down by the Second Division of the Court (15 S.L.T. 215), following Lord Pitmilly in, I think, the case of Strachan v. Stoddart (1828), 7 S. 4, that when a person is taken into custody on a grossly illegal and irregular warrant, he is entitled to claim damages from the judge, if an inferior judge, pronouncing it, and that it is no answer for the judge to say that it was pronounced in error. The Court, however, guard themselves, also following Lord Pitmilly, from being supposed to determine that any culpa levissima would warrant damages against such judge. I find it, however, very difficult to draw the distinction. It has been said by judges of the highest authority that gross negligence is just negligence with a vituperative adjective added, and I think that it may equally well be said that culpa levissima is just culpa with an apologetic adjective added. It is true that in the present case, from an extrinsic point of view, the defender's error was of the most venial description, for, as I have pointed out, he was the victim of the irregular practice of his predecessors and of the negligence of others. But in my opinion his error must be judged of per se, and if it imports culpa there is no question of degree. So judging of it I cannot but regard the pronouncing a sentence of imprisonment, for which there was no legal warrant, as an illegality and irregularity, which amounts to culpa, and involves liability to make reparation, where the illegal sentence has been followed by imprisonment, and has, therefore, resulted in illegal interference with the liberty of the subject.

It remains, therefore, to determine the amount of damages to which the pursuer is entitled. I cannot help regretting that some small tender was not made. But the defender has thought proper to maintain the defences, which have already been disposed of in the procedure roll, and finally, and probably with reason, to clear himself of the imputation of oppression, to go to proof on the merits, and I must therefore proceed to assess damages.

That with such a personal record, the pursuer should be entitled to substantial damages for her twelve days' incarceration is out of the question, and I think I do her ample justice in giving her 5s. a day, or £3, for the personal indignity and discomfort of her compulsory confinement, and I think that I ought to add the amount of the expenses (agreed on to save taxation at £19, 17s. 2d.) involved in obtaining her liberation over and above the modified sum of £7, 7s. allowed by the High Court of Justiciary. It was contended that it was against principle and practice to give as damages or part of damages the extra-judicial costs of any proceedings not recovered in those proceedings (Laing v. Watson (1791), 3 Pat. App. 219; M'Dowall v. Stewart (1871), 10 Macp. 193; Cockburn v. Edwards (1881), L.R. 18 Ch. D. 449). It is true that the Court exercises a greater supervision over the expenses of litigation, and that the amount of expenses are taxed under the Court's direction, on the footing that only the necessaries of litigation are to be charged against the opposite party, and its luxuries disallowed. But I cannot think that I should apply that principle in a case which was not one of proper litigation. The pursuer here could not have effected the liberation to which she was entitled, without the assistance of the agent, to whom her husband appealed, and his Edinburgh correspondent. It is notorious that the modified allowance in use to be given in suspensions and appeals in the High Court of Justiciary is not based on any taxation. And I cannot think that there would be any propriety in leaving the pursuer to pay such a substantial part of the expense of correcting, so far as was possible, the defender's mistake, or, as in this case, in leaving her without the means of satisfying her just demands. I shall therefore give decree in the pursuer's favour for a total sum of £22, 17s. 2d., and she must have expenses of process; but as I consider the action should not have been countenanced, I think that these should be modified. Including the Inner House expenses already awarded, I think that she should have expenses in full to the date when the case returned to the Outer House, but that the expense since that date should be modified to one-third the taxed amount.—13*th December* 1907.

Shipping Law—Collision—Duty where Risk of Collision—Departure from Collision Regulations—Reverse Speed—Construction of Rule to Reverse Speed as Applied to Turbine Steamers—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Articles 18, 19, 21, and 23—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. cap. 60), sect. 418.

The pursuers, as owners of the s.s. "Kintyre," raised this action for £10,000 damages for the loss of their vessel through a collision with the "Maori," a new steamer built by the defenders.

The opinion of the Lord Ordinary sufficiently reports the case:—

Lord Salvesen.—The collision which has given rise to this action occurred on 18th September 1907, a little to the south-west of Wemyss Point, in the Firth of Clyde. It took place in broad daylight, when the weather was clear and the sea smooth, so that there can be no doubt that it was the result of negligence on the part of those in charge of one or other or both of the vessels which collided.

The way the collision happened was as follows:—The "Maori," a new steamer built by the defenders, was in course of having her speed trials on the forenoon of the day in question, and for that purpose had proceeded down the Clyde to run the measured mile at the place eastward of the Skelmorlie buoy which has been appropriated for that purpose. She is a turbine steamer of the most modern type, and furnished with five engines and three propellers. The centre engine is driven by steam at high pressure supplied from the main steam pipe, and the other two engines, on the starboard and port sides respectively, are low-pressure engines, which utilise the steam after it has performed its function in the centre engine. She develops her highest speed of 20½ knots per hour when the three engines are working ahead. When it is desired to reverse, steam is shut off from the centre engine and diverted to each of two engines situated on the port and starboard sides respectively, and connected with the side propellers. The centre engine cannot be reversed; but if it is desired to reverse either of the side propellers, the centre engine must be stopped when all three engines are used.

On the day in question the "Maori" was manned by a crew of riggers and engineers supplied from the defenders' shipbuilding yard. Most of the riggers had been at sea at some period of their lives, and they were under the command of a pilot named Jackson, who was for many years connected with the Allan Line, and, after retiring from the sea, had obtained a license to pilot vessels on the Clyde. He was the person regularly employed by the defenders to take command of their vessels when undergoing their speed trials, and he had successfully performed his duty as such in connection with about twenty-four steamers of the turbine type built by them. He was thus a person of competent skill, with special experience of running the measured mile with turbine steamers, and it is doubtful whether any other pilot could have been got with the same experience of this new type of vessel.

Shortly before the collision the "Maori" had run the mile first southwards and then northwards, at a speed of about 15½ knots through the water. The tide was ebbing, and her actual speed against the tide did not exceed 14 knots. After completing the double run Jackson's intention was to bring the "Maori" round in a circle, so as to resume the run on the measured mile at a gradually increasing speed. In order to bring the vessel round for the second pair of runs it was necessary for her to take a sweep outwards into the channel so that she might complete the circle without requiring to slacken speed; and Jackson says that he had landmarks by which he was accustomed to steer in order to enable him to navigate the vessel in the way desired. His practice was to set a course from the north end of the measured mile to a point on the opposite shore in the neighbourhood of the curling pond marked on the charts. As soon as he had proceeded on this course to get a view of Ardgowan House, he had reached a point in the channel sufficiently far from the east shore to enable him to bring his vessel round on a hard-a-port helm, without the risk of approaching the land too closely.

At the time when he reached this point, Jackson observed the pursuers' steamer "Kintyre," a screw steamer of much smaller size, approaching from the northward, at a distance of from three-quarters of a mile to a mile. The "Kintyre" had set her course from a point about half a mile off the Cloch Lighthouse, so as to pass the Skelmorlie buoy a short distance on the west side. The "Kintyre" was proceeding at full speed, and, with the ebb tide in her favour, was passing over the ground at the rate of about 14 knots an hour. It is common ground that, at the distance of from three-quarters of a mile to a mile, while the "Maori" had the "Kintyre" on her starboard bow, and the "Kintyre" had the "Maori" on her port bow, one short blast was sounded from the "Maori's" whistle, indicating that she was directing her course to starboard; and I hold it proved that, at the same time, the helm of the "Maori" was put hard a-port. At that moment it was the duty of those in charge of the "Maori," under article 19 of the Regulations for preventing collision at sea, to get out of the way of the "Kintyre"; and it was the duty of the "Kintyre," under article 21, to keep her course and speed, unless the circumstances were such as to make departure from the rule necessary.

[Said articles are in the following terms :—

Article 19. When two steam vessels are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

Article 21. Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed.]

The case for the "Kintyre" is that, when the "Maori's" first whistle was sounded, she was on the point of crossing ahead of the "Kintyre's" course, and that there was not sufficient time then for the "Maori" to clear the other vessel. The "Kintyre" accordingly replied to the signal by two short blasts, indicating that she was directing her course to port, and immediately starboarded her helm. The "Maori" replied by a single blast; and the "Kintyre" repeated her former signal, and continued on her starboard helm. They then continued to approach each other on converging curves, with the result that, within two and a half minutes of the first signal having been given, they collided —the "Maori's" stem striking the "Kintyre" at an acute angle on the starboard quarter, and cutting into her a considerable distance. The vessels remained together for a little while—sufficient to enable the crew of the "Kintyre," with the exception of the master and engineer, to climb on board the "Maori." The vessels then separated—the "Kintyre" proceeding in a southerly direction for two or three hundred yards, until she sank. The master of the "Kintyre" was picked up by a boat belonging to another steamer, but, unfortunately, the engineer was drowned. The position of the wreck of the "Kintyre" is now marked upon the charts, so that there is practically no doubt as to the place where the collision happened.

The only facts in controversy are (1st) whether the "Kintyre" sounded a single blast immediately after the single blast of the "Maori," and (2nd) whether the "Maori" actually crossed the "Kintyre's" original course. The crew of the "Kintyre" all swear that no such blast was sounded from their vessel, and they are corroborated in this by a number of outside witnesses. On the other hand, the pilot, the steersman, and another rigger on board the "Maori" say that they distinctly heard a single blast before the two blasts were sounded; and Mr Ward, one of the partners of the defenders who was beside the pilot, says that he saw the steam rising from the "Kintyre," indicating that her whistle had been blown, although, owing to the noise made by the "Maori's" whistle, he did not hear any sound. In my opinion it is not proved that the "Kintyre" did sound this signal, but the evidence of those on board the "Maori" may be explained by the expectation which they naturally entertained that the "Kintyre" would answer their signal of one short blast by also signalling that she was directing her course to starboard; and it is possible that before the two blasts admittedly given were sounded, some steam may have been emitted without producing any actual sound. In my opinion, however, it is entirely immaterial whether such a blast were sounded or not, because there is no suggestion that any different course would have been taken by the "Maori"; and the double blast was admittedly given within a few seconds thereafter.

As regards the second point, I am satisfied that the "Maori" did not in fact cross the course on which the "Kintyre" was proceeding. The belief that she did so on the part of the pursuers' witnesses is easily explained by the fact that whenever they altered the course of the "Kintyre" to port, and the helm took effect, the "Maori" would get upon the starboard side of the "Kintyre." Much reliance has been placed by the pursuers on the evidence of a man Carsewell, who was in command of a ketch which was then proceeding up the Clyde a little to the northward, and who says that the "Maori" came between his vessel and the Skelmorlie buoy. As to whether the "Maori" was actually across a line drawn from the Cloch Lighthouse to a point a little west of the Skelmorlie buoy is, however, not established by his evidence, unless it be assumed that the ketch was approximately on the same line as that upon which the "Kintyre" had passed. If, as I believe, the ketch was considerably inshore of the "Kintyre's" course, the "Maori" would obstruct the view of the Skelmorlie buoy to Carsewell's eye without actually having crossed to the westward of it.

These being the facts, it is plain that the master of the "Kintyre" was in breach of Article 21, under which it was his duty to keep his course and speed. He was, therefore, in fault unless it can be shewn that the manœuvre of the "Maori" was commenced when the vessels were so close that, if the "Kintyre" had kept her course and speed, a collision would have been inevitable. In my opinion this has not been proved. On the contrary, I think there was ample time and room for the "Maori" to go round on her hard-a-port helm, and to have passed the "Kintyre" port to port at a safe distance if the "Kintyre" had simply kept her course. Even if the vessels had been approaching each other end on, or nearly end on, it would have taken at least a minute and a half or two minutes before they would have come into contact; and with three-quarters of a mile and that space of time in which to clear each other, I see no room to doubt that the "Maori" would have successfully executed the manœuvre which she intended. Whenever the "Kintyre," however, also directed her course to port, and continued—as she did—at full speed, she took the very surest means of preventing the "Maori" from keeping clear of her.

It was strongly urged by the pursuers that the fact that the "Kintyre" ported her helm was a piece of real evidence, indicating that the two vessels had already approached dangerously near, as otherwise the act of the master of the "Kintyre" was that of a madman. I am not much moved by this argument, because it too frequently happens that, at a critical moment, people in command of ships do lose their heads; and it may also be that those in charge of the "Kintyre" thought that there might be a risk in crossing ahead of a City Liner which was astern of her and a little on the starboard side. Be this as it may, I am quite satisfied that the master of the "Kintyre" committed a grave error of judgment when he took upon himself to disregard the rule, instead of relying on the "Maori" taking the necessary steps to keep clear of him. If he really thought that the vessels had approached dangerously near, his proper course was to have stopped and reversed his engines; instead of which he proceeded at full speed until the moment when the collision occurred.

It does not follow, however, that the "Maori" may not also be to blame for the collision; and the pursuers' counsel contended that, at all events, whenever the second signal of the "Kintyre" had been sounded, it ought to have been plain to Jackson that there was imminent risk of collision; and that it was his duty to have at once reversed the engines. What Jackson did was to order the starboard engine to be reversed, which involved the stopping of the centre engine, leaving the port engine to continue working ahead. He justifies this manœuvre on the ground that he would thereby bring his vessel round more smartly on the port helm, while at the same time greatly reducing her speed; and, in my opinion, this was the most seamanlike thing to do in the emergency which was created by the "Kintyre." Jackson was not bound to anticipate that the "Kintyre" would continue going full speed ahead, and if, even at that time, the "Kintyre" had reversed her engines, I think the collision might have been avoided. On the other hand, if the alternative suggestion of the pursuer had been adopted, the "Maori" would have gone on a flatter curve, and would in all probability have struck the "Kintyre" earlier, and at a broader angle, and that whether the "Kintyre" continued at full speed, or, as might reasonably have been expected, had stopped and reversed when a collision appeared to be imminent. The mode in which the vessels admittedly came together shews that a comparatively short space of time—probably less than a quarter of a minute—would have been sufficient to have brought the "Maori" round so as to entirely avoid the curve that the "Kintyre" was making. I do not think the exact speed at which the "Maori" was going, at the time of the collision, is really of much importance on this question of fault. Two witnesses say that the starboard engine had been reversed for a minute and a half before the collision; a third, that it had been going astern for half a minute only. If the latter be the true view, I think it obvious that the "Maori" must have been going a good deal faster than five knots an hour. In these questions of time, however, it is difficult for observers to make any reliable estimate. My own belief, from what admittedly took place prior to the orders being given to the engineers, is that the "Maori's" starboard engine cannot have been going astern for as much as a minute, and, if so, she must have had considerable way on at the moment of impact.

Even on this footing the "Maori" might be held to blame, if it were clear that she had infringed Art. 23, which is in these terms: "Every steam vessel, which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel, shall, on approaching her, if necessary slacken her speed or stop and reverse." The peculiarity of this case is that the "Maori" did both slacken her speed, and did reverse in the sense that she reversed her starboard propeller; but, undoubtedly, she did not "reverse" in the full sense of that word by reversing her port propellor as well.

This is the first case as far as I know in which Art. 23 has had to be applied to a turbine steamer; but such a steamer does not essentially differ from vessels with twin screws which were capable of revolving in opposite directions which have long been in use. I think, therefore, that the word "reverse" must be taken to refer to the whole engines of the vessel which are capable of being reversed. On the other hand, the fact that a steamer is furnished with engines which are capable of moving in opposite directions is one which may be of the greatest materiality, as applied to the circumstances preceding a collision, for it provides her with the means of altering her course much more rapidly than where any one propeller has to be relied upon.

Art. 23, which is said to have been infringed by the "Maori," has been made the subject of construction in the recent case of Windram v. Robertson, 1905, 7 F. 665. According to that decision the rule is not imperative, but, if it applies, the person who is charged with infringing it requires "to shew, not only that he did what he thought was best, but what every seaman would think was best, for the purpose of avoiding a collision," and this involves that the onus is upon him. In the case of Windram there was no doubt as to the applicability of the rule, because it is the duty of every steam vessel to keep out of the way of a sailing ship. But the duty of a steamer to keep out of the way of another depends, according to Art. 18, upon whether she has the other vessel on her starboard bow.

When two steam vessels are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to avoid risk of collision, each shall alter her course to starboard, so that each may pass on the port side of the other.]

Now, before there could be any question of the rule applying, it was the "Kintyre" and and not the "Maori" which was in this position; for her action in porting her helm whenever it took effect brought the "Maori" on her starboard bow. And it was the "Kintyre" accordingly whose duty it was to keep out of the way of the "Maori" when the relative positions of the vessels had thus altered. Even if it were otherwise, I think the defenders here have satisfied the onus that was put upon them. Although the pursuers examined an expert, they did not put a single question to him on this subject; and it may therefore be assumed that he would not have supported the very definite case made on record. On the other hand, the expert examined for the defenders was clearly of opinion that the master of the "Maori" adopted the best means, in the circumstances, of preventing or minimising the risks of collision, and I think I am entitled to accept his uncontradicted testimony on this point. I shall accordingly pronounce a finding to the effect that the "Kintyre" was alone to blame for the collision. In ordinary course I should have followed this up by assoilzieing the defenders; but as parties have agreed by minute to any damages due to the "Maori" being assessed in the present proceedings, after the question of fault has been finally determined, I shall do nothing further.—18*th December* 1907.

294. Macduff v. Spence's Trustees.

Succession — Trust — Uncertainty — Direction to Trustees to Apply Interest of Residue "or so much of Said Interest . . . . as They May Deem Expedient" to Local Charitable Purposes Held Void from Uncertainty.

The facts of the case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary held the bequest void from uncertainty.

Lord Johnston.—By her settlement, dated 11th May 1906, the late Miss Caroline Jane Spence, of 32 Albyn Place, Aberdeen, as regards the residue of her estate, appointed her trustees "to hold, settle and secure the same in their own names, and to apply the interest or annual proceeds thereof, or so much of said interest or annual proceeds thereof as they may deem expedient, towards such charitable purposes within the city or county of Aberdeen as my trustees shall think fit, full discretionary power being hereby conferred on my trustees as to the selection of the said charitable purposes above referred to, and I appoint that the capital of the residue of my said estates shall be called 'Miss Caroline Jane Spence's Fund.'"

It is admitted that, but for the words which I have underlined, this would be a good bequest for behoof of such Aberdeen and Aberdeenshire charities as the trustees of the testatrix might select. But it is maintained that the introduction of these words vitiates the bequest by creating uncertainty, not in the object, but in the subject of the bequest. It is with regret that I come to the conclusion that this contention must prevail.

The trustees, in answer to my question what did the words underlined import, gave three alleged possible explanations.

First. A direction to the trustees to apply the whole income in charity, but with a discretion to distribute among different charities.

Second. A direction to the trustees to apply the whole income in charity, but with a discretion as to distributing the whole income within the year of its accruing, anything left over being merely carried forward into the next year.

Third. A direction to apply the whole or such part of the income as they deemed expedient in charity, their discretion to be exercised within the year, and such part as they did not so apply falling into intestacy.

The only one of these suggested constructions which I think it is really necessary to consider is the first, and I would gladly give effect to it if I thought the words used would bear it. But I cannot do so without substituting for the actual words used certain perfectly different words, having a meaning which the words used can by no natural construction bear. I am practically asked to read the words "or so much of said interest or annual proceeds thereof as they may deem expedient" as equivalent to "in such proportions as they may deem expedient." In the first place, it is impossible in this manner to get rid of the disjunctive "or," which makes it clear that the testator had in mind two different and alternative subjects of the bequest, viz., the interest or annual proceeds of her residue, and so much of said interest or annual proceeds as the trustees might deem expedient. And in the second place, even if that initial difficulty could be got rid of, it would, I think, be impossible, in the collocation in which they occur, to paraphrase the words used in the manner suggested.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Johnston.

Macduff v. Spence's Trustees.

If, then, the words must bear their natural meaning in the collocation in which they are found, it follows that the testator has given a discretion to her trustees not merely, as she expressly states, "as to the selection of the said charitable purposes above referred to," but as to what part of her estate shall be given in charity, and what part shall fall into intestacy or remain with the heir and executor, for the pursuer happens to fill both positions. Such discretion I do not think that the testatrix could legally and competently confer upon her trustees.

There can be no doubt of the law that, in order to disinherit either heir or executor, the testator must by his settlement substitute somebody else, whether a person or a class of persons, to take the beneficial interest in his estate (M'Caig v. University of Glasgow, 1907, S.C. 231). There is here no question as to the certainty of the class of person or objects meant to be benefited, for it has been accepted since the case of Crichton v. Grierson, 1828, 3 W. & S. 329, that the term "charitable purposes" was sufficiently descriptive of a particular class of objects. The real import of that judgment is that a description which is not in itself really "particular" shall, out of favour to charity, be deemed to be "particular," and that has been the law of Scotland since its date. But then, in the present case, what portion of the residue, or income of residue, is given to this particular purpose? That the testatrix has not defined, but has left to her trustees. They may give all, or some, or none. That is an invocation of the alienum arbitrium which the law does not countenance. It has gone no further in that direction than to say that where the truster defines particular objects, he may leave it to the discretion of others to distribute his estate among those objects (Hill v. Burns, 1826, 2 W. & S. 80).

It will not support such a bequest that the trustees may apply the whole income to charity. The question is not whether the trustees may so apply it, but whether they are bound so to apply it. Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 1804, 9 Ves. 399. How can it be maintained that so far as they choose to apply the income in charity the bequest is good, and only so far as they fail so to apply it the income falls into intestacy. If that argument were good, pari ratione, the bequests in Blair v. Duncan (1901), 4 F. (H.L.) 1, Grimond, (1905), 7 Fr. (H.L.) 90, and similar cases must have been sustained instead of being found invalid.

As I think that the testatrix has left it in the discretion of her trustees how far her heir and executrix was to be disinherited, and as I think that she could not competently leave such discretion to her trustees, I am brought to the conclusion that this bequest is void.

In these cases there is always an appeal to the principle of the benignant interpretation of charitable bequests. I had to consider the extent to which that principle has ever actually been carried in the recent case of Hay's Trustees v. Baillie, 15 S.L.T. 494. I find that it has led to fixing that "charitable" is a sufficiently particular definition of a purpose to receive effect, Crichton v. Grierson, supra, and to the acceptance as sufficient of a very sketchy description of the actual charitable purpose contemplated, leaving to the Court to fill in the details, as in the Morgan Hospital case (1857), 19 D. 918, 3 Macq. 134. But I cannot find that it has been successfully applied to any other or wider extent or effect, and certainly not for the justification of the substitution for words actually used, of words having a totally different meaning, in order to give effect to the indication of a general charitable intention.

I shall therefore grant decree in terms of the first conclusion of the summons, and I think that the expenses of the case so far should come out of the estate. Quoad ultra, I shall continue the case, and grant leave to reclaim.—18*th December* 1907.

PATENT—ACTION FOR INFRINGEMENT—VALIDITY OF PATENT—FIRST AND TRUE INVENTOR—ANTICIPATION—CLAIMS—SUBSIDIARY CLAIM—INVENTION HELD TO BE TOO BROADLY CLAIMED.

This was an action of suspension and interdict brought by Lord Kelvin, F. W. Clark, and Kelvin & James White Ltd., against Whyte, Thomson &

Co. in respect of an alleged infringement of a patent.

The Opinion of the Lord Ordinary sufficiently reports this case.

The Lord Ordinary refused the prayer of the note, with expenses.

Lord Salvesen.—This is an action for infringement of a patent granted to the complainers for "improvements in the mariners' compass," and is directed against a firm of nautical instrument makers in Glasgow. Interdict is resisted on the ground that the patent is invalid, and also separately that there has been no infringement.

A grant of letters patent was applied for on 10th October 1902, when a provisional specification was lodged, and on 10th July following a complete specification was deposited, and was accepted on 1st October. In the application the complainer Clark, who is a director of the limited company and foreman in the wood department of their business, is stated to be the first and true inventor of the invention for which the letters patent were sought; and it is a somewhat curious fact that although this application was founded on by the respondents, the complainers up to the morning of the proof persisted in a statement that Lord Kelvin and Mr Clark were the first and true inventors. An amendment, however, was then made, which brought the complainers' position on record into harmony with the application.

The respondents' first ground of challenge is that Mr Clark was not the first and true inventor; but that James Spiers, who in 1901 and 1902 was foreman engineer in the scientific instrument department of Kelvin and James White Limited, devised the arrangement afterwards patented by the complainers. That is a question of fact on which both parties have led evidence, which I shall now proceed to consider.

The leading witness examined for the complainers was Mr Clark himself. His evidence is to the effect that he had been associated with Lord Kelvin in previous experiments with a view to improvements in compass suspensions; that he continued these experiments, and that as the result he invented the appliance which was afterwards patented; that the details were worked out by workmen in the service of the complainers, and that Spiers did the principal metal work, but entirely under his instructions. In cross-examination, when asked when he first instructed Spiers to do anything in connection with this new suspension, he answered, "I am not going to hold myself to dates, but as near as I can recollect it was in the beginning of 1902. I do not remember just what my instructions would be, because the whole thing went through a development. I tried one thing and another, and in different ways. (Q.) Is your evidence that you cannot state what bit of instructions you gave to Mr Spiers about the matter? (A.) No, I cannot give the instructions; the thing worked up and developed slowly in exactly the same way as any other work of that kind was done at the place." In further cross-examination he admits that Mr Spiers made numerous suggestions; but he affirms positively that it was he himself who suggested all the features of the device afterwards patented. Mr Clark is so far corroborated by the witnesses Kean, Potter, Linton, and Baird, all of whom were in the service of the complainers' firm at the time, and who say that they knew that Clark was engaged upon the experiments in question, and understood that he had invented the patent, and never heard of any claim being made by Mr Spiers to be the sole or the joint inventor until after the present action had been raised.

On the other hand, Spiers, for the respondents, deponed that he had had long experience of the work of manufacturing Lord Kelvin's compass bowls; that in 1899, after a conversation with Clark about the plunger suspension, the patent for which belonged to the complainers but had not long to run, Clark suggested that it would be a good thing if a new suspension could be devised, and that Spiers from that time onwards devoted a good deal of attention to this problem, and that the idea of using horizontal springs under tension was suggested to his mind by his having seen them applied to six-inch compasses for torpedo boats. He discussed the various ideas which occurred to him with Mr Clark, and they tried experiments together; and the ultimate invention was the result of their joint discussions and experiments. He says further, that when he heard that the patent had been taken out in the name of Clark, he spoke to him on the subject, and was informed that he was personally to get no benefit from the invention; and that it was necessary that the patent should be taken out in the name of a member of the firm as well as of the firm. Mr Spiers is corroborated on the point that about the time of the invention he complained that his name was not included in the patent by Mr Ferguson, who was manager of the electrical department of the complainers' business, and who also says that Spiers was a great deal engaged about 1902 with experiments in connection with nautical instruments.

I am not prepared to hold that this evidence is sufficient to rebut the presumption which exists in favour of the person who makes the application for and obtains a grant of letters patent in his own name. The onus of proof is admittedly on the respondents; and in order to satisfy that onus I must reject the evidence of Mr Clark and accept that of Mr Spiers. I cannot say that the evidence of Mr Clark was altogether satisfactory, as I would have expected the inventor to have been able to give some indication of how the ideas embodied in his invention came to be gradually evolved. At the same time, it may be that in the patent for a new combination of existing mechanical contrivances the patented appliance may merely be the result of a series of experiments without there being any connected train of thought leading up to the invention; and I have come without difficulty to the conclusion that the respondents' evidence is not sufficient to displace that of the complainers, strengthened as it is by the legal presumption I have referred to. This is all the more the case when the alleged joint inventor is never known to have made any complaint to his employers on the subject of his name being omitted from the patent; or even so far as appears to have mentioned the matter except in a casual conversation to a friend.

The second ground of attack is disconformity between the complete and provisional specifications. In the provisional specification the method of obtaining the improved suspension is thus described: "We take four spiral springs of the necessary strength for the weight of the compass bowl and form them into two sets by connecting each pair by a diamond-shaped piece of brass; the outer ends of the springs are attached to bolts which pass through the flanges of the brackets. By drawing the bolts through the flanges and screwing the nuts against the outer sides of the bracket flanges we get the necessary strain on the springs." In an earlier passage in the same provisional specification the patentees state that they attain the equal cushion-like resistance at which they aim by the lateral or torsional motion of tightened springs.

The form of compass suspension thus disclosed consists of two pairs of spiral springs in tension, the ends of which pass through holes in a diamond-shaped piece of brass, from the lower point of which is suspended a V-shaped hanger to carry the knife edge of the gimbal ring. The brackets in which the springs are fixed form the sides of a hood fixed on the binnacle flange, which serves the purpose of protecting the brackets from the weather.

By the time the final specification was lodged the inventors had developed their invention and had added links between the ends of the springs and the diamond-shaped piece of brass; and they also proposed to suspend the V-shaped hanger from the centre of the diamond-shaped piece of metal by one or more links. Accordingly when they come to describe in general terms how the object aimed at is effected, they say, "We attain this all-round equal cushion-like resistance by the lateral or torsional motion of tightened links and springs." Further, in both claims spiral springs and links arranged in pairs are referred to as part of the combination.

The evidence with regard to the practical effect of this variation in the mechanism is not entirely harmonious, but on the whole I prefer that adduced by the complainers. Their leading expert, Mr Dugald Clerk, while admitting that the insertion of links constitutes an improvement on the original mechanism, has no doubt that a suspension made according to the provisional specification would answer the purpose, and he thinks the addition of the links must be treated as a legitimate development of the invention for which the provisional specification was obtained, having in view the purpose of such a specification, which is merely to disclose generally the nature of the invention. I agree with this view. It has been held that a patentee who before filing his complete specification discovers an improvement on the mode which he has described in the provisional specification of carrying it into effect, is not merely entitled but bound to give the public in his complete specification the benefit of what he has so discovered (Woodward, per Cotton, L.J., 1887, 4 R.P.C. 175), and the same view was taken by Mr Justice Field in the case of Crampton, 1888, 5 R.P.C. 397. The only case that I was referred to by the respondents' counsel (that of the Castner Kellner Alkali Co. Ltd., 1900, 17 R.P.C. 593) appears to me to differ entirely on the facts. That was one of the few cases in which disconformity between the provisional and complete specifications has been held fatal to the validity of the patent; but the ground of judgment was that what was disclosed in the provisional as part of the invention was the use of a stationary mercury cathode, whereas in the final specification the invention for which protection was claimed was one which involved the use of a revolving mercury cathode. That was held by the House of Lords to be an invention not merely different from but "in its leading features at variance with the invention described in the provisional specification." In my opinion, that case has no application to the facts of the present. All the features of the invention as disclosed in the provisional specification are retained in the final, with the addition of a simple mechanical contrivance, the use of which merely constitutes an improvement.

The respondents further plead want of patentable subject-matter, on the ground of prior use, anticipation, lack of invention on the part of the grantees, and lack of utility. It will be convenient to consider these various heads of objection together.

Prior to the date of the letters patent in question there had been numerous devices for suspending the compass bowl so as to prevent movements of the ship from being communicated to the card. The problem became one of increasing difficulty as the speed of steam vessels increased and new methods of propulsion were causing a different class of vibratory movement which required to be provided against. The only devices, however, which have any bearing on the question of prior use and anticipation are conveniently collected in the sheet of drawings prepared by Mr Fitzpatrick; and in my opinion, Nos. 2, 3, 6 and 7 of these are alone of importance. In all these four forms of suspension spiral springs were used, although in the case of the James White Standard suspension the main support of the compass bowl was a vertical spiral spring, or in some cases a viscous fluid placed in an outer bowl, on which the inner compass bowl containing the card was supported. At the same time the spiral springs arranged in pairs round the James White Standard Suspension Compass to a certain extent supported the compass bowl, although their main function was to resist lateral movement. In both this form and that patented by Castle (No. 3) the spiral springs were under tension; and this form of suspension as actually used in practice is up to a certain point identical with the form patented by the complainers. The leading difference is that the tightened spiral springs in Castle's mechanism were connected by a piece of wire rope, to the centre of which was rigidly fixed the gimbal ring; whereas in the complainers' form the spiral springs are attached to the diamond-shaped piece of metal, from the lower end of which is freely suspended the carrier of the gimbal ring. In Dobbie's suspension (No. 6) the difference is that the spiral springs are not under tension and are vertical, so that they act as elastic beams. In the Hezzaneth (No. 7) the spiral springs used, although placed horizontally and attached to a shaped piece of metal performing practically the same function as in the complainers' invention, the springs were not under tension. Practically, therefore, all that the patentees here did was to combine the free suspension used by Dobbie with the spiral springs under tension employed for the same purpose by Castle. No one, however, had previously thought of combining these two; and as many minds were being directed towards the improvement of compass suspensions, I think it must be held that the new combination was not an obvious one, but involved a sufficient amount of invention to make it good subject-matter of a patent. Another way of putting the same thing is, that if spiral springs under tension had been substituted for the vertical springs used in Dobbie's, the result would just have been the complainers' patent. But the simplicity of an invention is no argument against its merit, for it is very often the most simple things that are the least obvious, although after they have been discovered it is matter of surprise that they had not been hit upon earlier. Further, it is not to be left out of view that, according to the evidence both of Clark and Spiers, the patented mechanism was not discovered until after there had been a long series of experiments by persons who were fully acquainted with the state of the art at the time.

An invention, however, which is ingenious and novel may, nevertheless, fail on the ground of want of utility; and the respondents have accordingly led a large body of evidence to the effect that the complainers' suspension is no better than, and in some respects is worse than, the suspensions previously in use. They say that Lord Kelvin's apparatus, which came to be known as the "Grummet Ring," and which was at one time protected by a patent long since expired, is much superior to the new invention of Mr Clark; that the latter has given rise to frequent complaints by those who used it, and has had to be modified so as to make it fit for use at all, and that, in point of fact, all the compasses now made by the complainers' firm, and professing to be made under the letters patent in question, are fitted with an additional gimbal ring not referred to in the specification at all, and which is said to be necessary in order that the patented device may be usefully employed on vessels of high speed. In my opinion, it is not necessary that I should decide, even if I were competent to do so, whether the grummet ring suspension or the complainers' latest is the most satisfactory. It is enough if the new suspension affords a useful choice to persons who require compasses (Welsbach Company, 1900, 17 R.C.P. 252). On this point the evidence seems to me to be quite conclusive. In the first place, a very large number of compasses made with the patented suspension have been sold. According to Mr Francis Clark's evidence, from two to three hundred were manufactured in 1904 and 1905, and with few exceptions these have all given satisfaction to the users. It is true that too much reliance cannot in this case be placed on the evidence derived from sales, because it is probable that any patent compass suspension associated with the name of Lord Kelvin would take the market. But several witnesses of practical experience testified that they preferred the complainers' patent suspension to all others, including the grummet ring; and the defects which were discovered, especially in relation to certain steamers belonging to the Peninsular and Oriental Company, may be explained on the footing of the idiosyncrasies of these vessels in the matter of vibration. This is borne out by the fact that the complaints were confined to vessels of a special type known as the "M" class. The circumstance that the additional gimbal ring, which was at first devised to obviate the movement of the compass card on board these vessels, is now used in connection with all the compasses manufactured by the complainers under the letters patent libelled, is explained by the fact that it is cheaper to adhere to one particular form of manufacture; and also, I think, because it was found that the suspension was rather more free than was desirable. I therefore repel the challenge of the patent on want of utility, a plea which was only put on record at a late stage.

It remains to consider whether the patent is invalid on account of (1) ambiguity in the specification and claims, and (2) failure to distinguish between what is old and what is claimed as new. I confess that on the latter head I have not experienced any difficulty, so far as the specification itself is concerned. But a serious difficulty does undoubtedly emerge when one is asked to construe the claims, and especially the second claim. It is matter of statutory enactment that a specification must end with a claim (sect. 5, subsect. 5, of the Patent Act 1883). This claim must contain a distinct statement of the invention; and I apprehend, if the claim is ambiguous or falls to be construed in a wider sense than the invention described warrants and so as to include prior inventions, the patent cannot stand.

Outer House. Lord Salvesen.

Lord Kelvin and Others v. Whyte, Thomson & Co.

As regards the first claim little need be said, because it is a claim for all the elements which make up the new combination. The spiral springs and links arranged in pairs and under tension; the hood which serves the double purpose of brackets to which the springs are fixed and of sheltering the contrivance, and the diamond-shaped piece of metal with its V-shaped hanger attached through the intermediary of links. This combination, although all its parts are old with the exception of the hood, which of itself would not I think have justified the grant of letters patent, was, as I have already held, a new, ingenious and useful combination, and therefore proper subject-matter of a grant.

The second claim, however, is in a different position. It may be assumed that the patentees intended to claim something more than was embraced in the first claim, with the view, no doubt, of more effectually protecting themselves against infringement. That is quite a legitimate thing to do; and I think that I am bound to construe the second claim benevolently, so as, if possible, to support the patent. It is at once obvious, however, that the claim is exceedingly ill-drawn. A description of the results obtained by means of the mechanism is introduced into the claim, although these are already fully explained in the specifications, both provisional and complete. Such a description is quite out of place in the claim. Omitting this, and reading the words at the end (which can have no relation to the description) as applying to the first sentence of the claim, I find that what the patentee claims is "the fixing of the suspension springs and links in a line parallel to the top of the compass bowl by such a method that the recoil of the springs is at right angles to the vertical motion of the compass bowl substantially as and for the purpose hereinbefore described and illustrated on the accompanying sheet of drawings." These latter words, I think, must be taken to refer only to the particular mechanism referred to in this claim, namely, the suspension springs and links, for there is no warrant for selecting one of the elements of the combination described in the first claim in preference to the others; and if all were held to be included, claim 2 would just be a repetition in very badly chosen language of claim 1. If I am right in this, then I think that upon the evidence led by the complainers themselves their claim is too wide. I do not attach much importance to the fact that the recoil of the springs is never at right angles to the vertical motion of the compass bowl (although the claim distinctly states that it will be at right angles), because I think it is legitimate, as Mr Dugald Clerk does, to read in the word "practically" as qualifying "at right angles." But even so, the language of the claim applies exactly to the prior invention of Castle. The fair result of Mr Clerk's cross-examination is that the first sentence of the second claim does not differentiate the invention from that of Castle, and is broad enough to include it. If the claim had been for a combination of the use of spiral springs under tension with the free suspension obtained by the diamond-shaped piece of metal with its links and hanger, I should have thought that that would have been a good claim. But I cannot see how that combination can be extracted from the language used by the patentee in his second claim. It may be worth while noticing, in addition, that whereas in the first claim the patentee claims the "suspending" of the compass bowl, in the second claim, for some inscrutable reason, he claims "the fixing of the suspension spring and links," although there is absolutely nothing novel in the method of fixing. Curiously enough, there is no mention of the springs being under tension at all, although that is insisted in in the first claim and may conceivably be read in from the general reference to the description in the specification. In this latter connection it is not unimportant to notice that the Hezzaneth suspension also exactly answers the description in the second claim if the element of the springs being under tension is left out of account, for the attachment there to the shaped piece of metal is a link attachment, although there are no intermediary links such as those described in the complainers' specification. I feel myself accordingly driven to the conclusion that the complainers' patent is invalid as it stands, although it may well be that it may be validated by a disclaimer or other amendment.

In this view it is unnecessary to consider whether, assuming that the patent were valid, the respondents' mechanism would constitute an infringement. As to this I am disposed to agree with Professor Hudson Beare that there is just as much ingenuity displayed by the respondents in inventing their form of suspension as was displayed by Mr Clark in inventing the complainers'. That, however, is not a consideration that is by any means conclusive. The microphone invented by Professor Hughes had not been thought of by Edison when he invented the telephone; and yet it was held that an application of Professor Hughes' discovery to a telephone transmitter was nevertheless an infringement of the Edison patent. If I could have read the patent here as claiming a method of suspension consisting of the use of spiral springs under tension combined with free suspension, I might have reached the conclusion that the respondents' appliance constituted an infringement; but that again would have depended on the exact language used. I fully accept the evidence for the respondents that the springs they use are arranged radially, and must be so arranged in order to comply with their invention; and that being so arranged there is interaction amongst the springs, which has a tendency to take up the vibration of the ship and prevent its being transmitted to the compass card. Nevertheless, for practical purposes each group of springs may be treated as equivalent to one spring; and so treated, the recoil of the springs may be described as practically at right angles to the vertical motion of the compass bowl. If therefore the complainers could have claimed their patent as a pioneer patent, the respondents might have come within its scope as having used what were practically mechanical equivalents for the devices described by the patentee. But no such claim could possibly be made; and I think it is only fair that a patentee who claims protection for what is merely a new arrangement of old mechanical devices should be compelled as a condition of that protection to state in unambiguous terms what it is exactly that he claims, so that other manufacturers or inventors may avoid infringement.—19*th December* 1907.

Process — Printing — Failure to Lodge Prints—Action Dismissed in Terms of Act of Sederunt 2nd November 1872, sect. 5—Circumstances in which Interlocutor Dismissing Action was Recalled.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Dundas.

The Act of Sederunt 2nd November 1872 provides as follows:

1. [In certain circumstances] . . . . the Lord Ordinary shall pronounce an interlocutor dismissing the action and finding neither party entitled to expenses, and the said interlocutor shall not be recalled by the Lord Ordinary of consent, but may be recalled only on reclaiming note to the Inner House, upon such conditions as to expenses or otherwise as may be imposed by the Court or by the Lord Ordinary under remit.

5. Within four days from the date of the interlocutor closing the record, the agent for the pursuer, or for the party appointed to print the record, shall lodge with the clerk to the process two printed copies of the record as finally adjusted and closed . . . . ; and failing the said agent lodging such copies within the prescribed period, the clerk shall record such failure by a note on the interlocutor sheet . . . . ; and failing the two copies of the printed record being lodged as aforesaid, the cause shall be deleted from the debate or procedure roll, as the case may be, and shall be restored to the roll only on motion made to the Lord Ordinary by any party to the cause lodging the said two printed copies as aforesaid: Provided that if none of the parties to the cause move the Lord Ordinary to restore the same to the roll and lodge the two printed copies as aforesaid within twenty-one days of the date of the interlocutor closing the record, the Lord Ordinary shall pronounce an interlocutor dismissing the action, and finding neither party entitled to expenses, which shall not be recalled by the Lord Ordinary of consent, but may be recalled only in the manner and on the conditions foresaid.

On 20th November 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Lord Salvesen) closed the record in this action (which was of an ordinary petitory nature), and appointed the cause to be put to the Procedure Roll. The cause was thereafter transferred to Lord Dundas. On 9th December the Clerk of Court noted on the interlocutor sheet "Prints not lodged in terms of Act of Sederunt 2nd November 1872, and cause deleted from Procedure Roll." On 18th December the Lord Ordinary (Lord Dundas) pronounced the following interlocutor: "The Lord Ordinary, in respect that the parties have failed to comply with the provisions of section 5 of the Act of Sederunt of 2nd November 1872, dismisses the action; finds neither party entitled to expenses."

The pursuer reclaimed, and on the case being put out in the Single Bills, moved the Court to recal the said interlocutor and to remit to the Lord Ordinary to proceed in the action.

A correspondence between the parties' agents was produced and founded on, which shewed that the question of settlement was mooted on or about the day that the record was closed, but that nothing more was done in this matter. On 28th November the pursuer's agent sent to the defender's agent a proof print of the closed record asking that it might be returned with amendments in order that the rules of Court might be complied with. This request was repeated on 3rd, 7th, 11th and 18th December, but no amendments were sent. Prints of the closed record were tendered on 19th December, but were refused by the Clerk of Court.

the part of the pursuer, and the case was one where the Court should grant the motion. 297. Forrest's Trustees v. Merry & Cuninghame.

MINES AND MINERALS—AGREEMENT—CONSTRUCTION—LEASE OF MINERALS — MINERAL TENANTS ENTITLED UNDER LEASE TO SINK PITS FOR WINNING COAL FROM LANDS OTHER THAN THOSE OF LESSOR ON PAYMENT OF WAYLEAVE —AGREEMENT BINDING TENANTS TO RESTRICT OUTPUT FROM FIELDS OTHER THAN THOSE OF LESSOR TO FIXED QUANTITY AND TO PAY ADDITIONAL SUMS ON COAL WON IN EXCESS OF SAID QUANTITY—CIRCUMSTANCES IN WHICH TENANTS WERE HELD ENTITLED TO EXCEED LIMIT ON PAYMENT OF SUMS STIPULATED.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

In this action the trustees of the late John Clark Forrest of Auchinraith sought (1) declarator that Messrs Merry & Cuninghame, the mutual tenants in certain lands belonging to the trustees through which the tenants had the right of winning coal from the lands of neighbouring proprietors, were not entitled to win from said neighbouring lands more than a certain quantity of coal annually; and (2) interdict against the defenders from so winning more than the said quantity.

The facts of the case appear fully from the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary (Salvesen), which was in these terms:—

Lord Salvesen.—The late John Clark Forrest was proprietor of the estate of Auchinraith, a property which contains valuable seams of coal. It adjoins certain small properties called Birdfield, Springwell, part of Auchinraith and Aitkenfin; and since 1872 the coal in these adjoining lands along with the coal in Auchinraith has been let to the same tenants and wrought by pits in the lands of Auchinraith. The pursuers are the trustees of Mr Forrest, and now own the estate of Auchinraith; and the defenders are a limited company, who are the successors of the original tenants of the mineral field.

On 4th January 1889 Mr Forrest granted a lease of the coal in his lands of Auchinraith to the defenders' author for thirty-one years from the term of Whitsunday 1888, for payment of a fixed rent of £2000 per annum, or lordships in the lessors' option. By this lease Mr Forrest conferred power on the tenants to sink pits for the purpose of working not merely the coal in the lands let by him but also any coal in the adjoining lands. The consideration for this privilege was the payment to Mr Forrest of a wayleave of a penny per 22½ cwts. provided for under a previous agreement, which was referred to and adopted in the lease. About the same time that this lease was entered into, leases were granted or existing leases modified and confirmed by the proprietors of the adjoining lands; and it is a fair inference that the whole of these deeds were the outcome of a general agreement between the various proprietors and the mineral tenants.

Under the lease of 4th January 1889 it was provided that lordships, which Mr Forrest was entitled in his option to exact instead of the fixed rent, were to be paid to him according to a sliding scale, and that the wayleave of one penny per ton should be paid directly by the mineral tenants. The other proprietors also stipulated for a fixed rent, or in their option a lordship or a fixed sum of sevenpence per ton of 22½ cwts. The sliding scale appears to have been very favourable to Mr Forrest, for it provided that he should be entitled to payment of two-fifteenths of the average yearly selling price of the coal, in the event of that exceeding the lordship of 6¾d. per ton of 20 cwts. Whenever accordingly the selling price of coal at the pithead exceeded 4s. 6d. or 5s. a ton, it was the tenants' interest after they had taken sufficient coal from the lands of Auchinraith to pay the fixed rent, rather to work out the coal beneath the adjoining lands than to increase their output from the minerals of Auchinraith.

Of even date with the lease the parties entered into a minute of agreement; and it is upon the construction of a clause in that deed that the main controversy turns. The clause is quoted at length in Condescendence 4, and by it the defenders' authors "undertook and bound themselves that from and after the term of Whitsunday 1893 they will work the coal in the adjoining properties only to such an extent as to enable them to pay to the several proprietors thereof such sums of lordship as will amount to but not exceed the fixed rent agreed to by their existing leases to be paid to such proprietors respectively." Had the clause stopped there, there would have been no room for doubt, as the language is not open to two interpretations. There follows, however, a declaration in these terms: "If in any year during the currency of this lease the sums payable to such proprietors shall exceed the said fixed rent, then and in that event the second parties shall be bound, as they hereby agree and bind themselves and their foresaids, to pay to the first party and his foresaids (that is, the pursuers) the sum of one penny per ton on every ton of coal worked from the lands of such adjoining proprietors in excess of the quantities necessary to make up or equal the said fixed rents payable to them as above mentioned."

The defenders contend that this clause read as a whole gives them the right to work out the coals in the adjoining lands as fast as they choose on payment of one penny per ton on all coal from such lands in excess of the quantities required to make up the fixed rents; and they referred to various cases in which prohibitions with somewhat similar qualifications had been so construed: Woodward v. Gyles, 1690, 2 Vernon 119; Aylet v. Dodd, 1741, 2 Atkyns 238; Leigh v. Lillie, 1860, 30 L.J. Ex. 25; while the pursuers referred to Gold, 1870, 8 M. 1006; Mackenzie, 18th June 1811, F.C., affirmed 6 Pat. 117, and Mackenzie, 13th December 1811, F.C. In further support of their construction of the clause, the defenders maintained that so small a sum as one penny per ton could not be treated as a penalty for violating a prohibition, and they also founded upon the clause in the same agreement quoted in Answer 4, under which a restriction as to making up a deficiency between the fixed rent and the lordships payable in respect of the coal actually worked in any given year is not to apply "while and so long as the tenants restrict their output from the said adjoining proprietors' lands, so that the lordships payable to them do not exceed the fixed rents." They further point to the admitted fact that ever since 1893 there has been an average excess of output from the adjoining lands over the amount required to meet the fixed rents and lordships of about 55,000 tons per annum; and that notwithstanding the pursuers and their author have accepted the sum of one penny per ton on this excess, although it would have been far more to their interests to have insisted on the output from their own lands being increased. Finally, they contend that the pursuers' construction of the clause if given effect to would be contrary to the good faith of the agreement made with the adjoining proprietors.

I am not much impressed with this last argument, because under the leases of the coal in the adjoining lands the defenders are not under any obligation to work the minerals so long as they pay the fixed rent. It may well be that the adjoining proprietors might have objected to being deprived of the chance of having their coals worked out more speedily, but that was a good reason why the minute of agreement should be entered into between the owners of Auchinraith and the mineral tenants alone; and if the mineral tenants are not violating any obligation which they undertook to the other proprietors, it does not seem improbable that they should have put themselves under this prohibition in a question with the pursuers. As regards the inference which is to be drawn from the actings, it must be noted that Mr Forrest, who was a party to the agreement, died on 28th August 1893, and that during his lifetime no question as to its construction could possibly have arisen. The argument would have been stronger if Mr Forrest—who no doubt had a clear view of what he was stipulating for—had consistently acted contrary to his own interests on the view of the agreement for which the defenders contend. But the fact that his trustees may either have misinterpreted the clause or not had their attention directed to it for fourteen years after his death, does not seem to me to have much bearing upon the true construction. The other points which I noted first do at first sight seem to favour the interpretation on which the defenders found; for if the prohibition of working was to be enforced one would have expected a higher penalty than a penny per ton to be exacted, even if to that be added the restriction to which I have already referred, and which in actual circumstances could have had no deterrent effect. I also recognise fully that a clause which is expressed as prohibitory may nevertheless be so qualified as to confer an option of contravening on payment of a stipulated sum; and the decisions quoted by the defenders contain illustrations of such clauses. In the end, however, the question comes to be one of construction of the particular clause; and I am of opinion that I cannot construe it as giving the mineral tenants a licence to work as much coal as they please from beneath the adjoining lands so long as they pay the stipulated one penny per ton. If that was the intention of parties, I cannot understand why there was any prohibition at all. It would have been much simpler to have said that if the tenants worked coal in the adjoining properties, etc., then they should pay one penny per ton on the excess quantities so worked. On the other hand, it is possible to find a good reason for the clause being expressed as it is, for it would not always be easy to ascertain during the currency of any particular year whether the prohibition was being contravened; and in any event it practically gave the owners of Auchinraith the option either of enforcing the prohibition or of accepting the stipulated one penny per ton, whichever they might think most to their interest.

Parties were agreed that all that I should decide at present was this question of construction, so that they might have an opportunity of getting my judgment submitted to review without any further expense being incurred. I have accordingly limited my interlocutor to a finding in terms of the above opinion.

The Lord Ordinary found—that, on a sound construction of the Minute of Agreement, dated 4th January 1889, between John Clark Forrest and Merry & Cuninghame, referred to in the summons, the defenders are not entitled to work out the coal in the lands of Birdfield, Springwell, part of the lands called Auchinraith and Aitkenfin to any greater extent than is required to enable them to pay to the several proprietors of the said lands such sums of lordship as will amount to, but not exceed, fixed rents amounting in cumulo to £550 sterling per annum.

The defenders reclaimed.

The following authorities were referred to in the debate:—For the Reclaimers: Woodward v. Gyles, 1690, 2 Vernon 119; Aylet v. Dodd, 1741, 2 Atkyns 238; Leigh v. Lillie, 1860, 30 L.J. The Court assoilzied the defenders.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the Lord Ordinary has so well set forth the facts in this case that I do not think it is necessary to repeat in another form what he has already said. But I would call your Lordships' attention to two remarks made by the Lord Ordinary, with both of which I cordially agree. The first of these is: "It is a fair inference that the whole of these deeds were the outcome of a general agreement between the various proprietors and the mineral tenants." I think that is perfectly true,

1st Div.

Forrest's Trustees v. Merry & Cuninghame.

The Lord President.

and it goes a long way towards the settlement of the question with which I shall ultimately have to deal. The other remark of the Lord Ordinary is as follows: "I also recognise fully that a clause which is expressed as prohibitory may nevertheless be so qualified as to confer an option of contravening on payment of a stipulated sum." With that statement I also agree. The question is one of construction, and of construction only, of this particular clause. I do not think that other cases can be any authority in such a matter. They merely serve as illustrations. The true consideration, when the form of the clause is ambiguous, must always be this: Is the leading object of the clause to prohibit a thing from being done, or is the leading object only, either not to have the thing done, or to get a payment if it is done? The farming cases which were cited to us seem to rest on very clear principles. In farming, matters may be done which would cause an irreparable injury, and though you may covenant for damages for irreparable injury, as indeed this Court has often to award them, yet the sum received by way of penalty or damage may never adequately compensate for the injury done. In such cases you would be entitled to ask the Court, and the Court would be right in granting, interdict against the irreparable injury being done. Examples of what I refer to are the breaking up of old pasture, or the cutting down of an ancient wood.

Now we come to the clause in question. Is it more likely that it was meant to be an absolute prohibition of the coal being worked, or is it more likely that it was meant to be a stipulation that if it was worked a royalty was to be paid at a certain rate? Upon the whole I prefer the latter interpretation. The only interest that the pursuers here can qualify is that it would give an indirect lever to compel more of their coal being worked, and if prices were at a certain rate that would be greatly to their advantage under the sliding scale stipulation. So far as I can see, that is true, and I am not overlooking it; but I think it is overweighed by other considerations. In the first place, as I say, it is only an indirect lever, because it might not force Merry & Cuninghame to work the pursuers' coalfield at all. No doubt it is probable that, having spent a certain amount on the pit, they would work the coalfield, but that probability might to a large extent be upset, if I may use the expression, by a great many circumstances. In the first place, it obviously would be upset if any faults or such things arose in the pursuers' coalfield, which would make working in the pursuers' coalfield more than usually expensive. In the second place, it might be upset by the state of the market or the condition of Merry & Cuninghame's mining leases elsewhere. If they had to pay under this sliding scale, and then prices rose to a very large extent, it might be good policy for them even to sacrifice their pit expenses in this field and to work their other pits in order to get such coal as they required. All this is of course pure speculation, but at the same time it shews that this is only an indirect lever and not a true compulsitor.

The matter which really weighs upon my mind is this. Agreeing as I do with the Lord Ordinary that this was the outcome of a general scheme, it seems to me that the construction of the clause which is urged by the pursuers is, if I may say so, in utterly bad faith as regards the arrangement with the smaller proprietors. I cannot believe that the smaller proprietors would have entered into their agreements, which were unico contextu with the agreement founded on, if they had known that such a clause was to be put in force against them; and I cannot believe that Merry & Cuninghame would have assented to such an arrangement. Further, there is the phraseology of the clause itself, especially when taken along with the phraseology of the final words of clause 4, the clause which made provision for an alteration of the time for making up shorts from three years, which it had been before, to one year for the future. That clause concludes with this declaration: "Declaring, however, that this restriction shall not apply while and so long as the tenants restrict their output from the said adjoining proprietors' land." That is a most extraordinary expression to use if, as a matter of fact, the tenants have not the right, during the whole currency of the lease, to restrict their output or not as they choose. This equally applies in any year of the lease, and yet, according to the construction of the pursuers, during all the years of the lease except the first four the tenants had not an option at all to put their output above the amount of the fixed lordship. In other words, they would not be in a position to restrict their output from any action of their own. Upon the whole construction I come to the conclusion, opposite to that of the Lord Ordinary, that the meaning of the clause is that it is not to enforce prohibition, but is to fix a scale of payment if the coal is worked above a certain amount.

The result of that view is to get rid of the action, because the action is not framed for recovery of any sums as in name of wayleave, and it is not said that Merry & Cuninghame have refused to pay any such sums. Therefore I am of opinion that the proper decree here is one of absolvitor.

293. Lord Advocate v. Glengarnock Iron and Steel Company Limited.

Mines and Minerals—Trespass—Lease—Lease by Crown of Minerals Under Sea to Owner of Lands and Minerals Ex Adverso—Subjects Worked as Unum Quid—Subjects Leased "All and Whole the Whole Beds and Seams of Coal"—Claim by Crown for "Wayleave" as Damages in Respect of Conveyance of Coal Won in Landward Property Over Ways in Subjects Leased—Held, on the Terms of the Lease and in the Circumstances in Which it was Entered Into, That There Had Been No Trespass.

The facts of this case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The defenders pleaded: "4. The defenders not having trespassed upon the Crown lands as alleged, should be assoilzied.

The Lord Ordinary sustained the defenders' fourth plea in law, and assoilzied them from the conclusions of the action.

Lord Johnston.—Mr Robertson Cuninghame is the proprietor of the estate of Auchenharvie, including Seabank, which lies on the Ayrshire coast, between Saltcoats and Stevenston, and of the minerals thereunder down to low-water mark on the foreshore. In 1889 and again in 1898, the Crown as proprietor of the minerals under the sea let to Mr Cuninghame for thirty-one years from the term of Martinmas 1888 the minerals below low-water mark ex adverso of his property. The area so let is shewn on the plan appended to the lease of 1898, the part surrounded by a red line being that contained in the lease of 1889, and the contiguous portion, surrounded by a blue line, being that contained in the lease of 1898.

In 1893 Mr Cuninghame granted a lease to the Glengarnock Iron and Steel Company, and to John Charles Cuninghame of Craigends, the sole partner of the said firm, of the minerals in his own property, and sub-let to them the minerals which he held under the two Crown leases. They thus became, as lessees or sub-lessees, the tenants of the whole field under Mr Cuninghame's control as a combined subject. The duration of their lease was thirty-one years counting from Martinmas 1888, so as to run out with the ish of the Crown leases.

The Glengarnock Iron Company, now converted into a limited company, in working under Mr Cuninghame of Auchenharvie, have treated the field as one, and in the scheme which they have adopted for carrying forward their underground workings they have disregarded the fact that they were really working under two separate proprietors, The result is that as the whole coals won in the combined field are brought to bank by a pit on Mr Cuninghame's property, it has happened that some of the coals got above low-water mark, and therefore from Mr Cuninghame's land, pass through an angle of the mineral field belonging to the Crown, before they reach the incline by which they are brought to the pit bottom. The Crown now come forward to claim a wayleave on the coal which has been so drawn. They restrict their claim to damages calculated at the rate of 1d. per ton wayleave, which they maintain is a reasonable charge for the drawing of coal through the under-sea area in question. The amount at present claimed is £715, 10s. on 171,722 tons down to August 1905, and £94, 4s. 1d. on 22,609 tons between August 1905 and November 1906, and all further claims are reserved. The ground of action is thus set forth in Cond. 4: "By leading or drawing through the said sea area a coal other than the coal let by the said commissioners, the defenders have trespassed and are continuing to trespass upon the property of the Crown, and are liable in damages to the extent of the sum sued for," and no other ground of action is pleaded.

The action is directed entirely against the Glengarnock Iron Co. Ltd., Mr Cuninghame of Auchenharvie not being called. But the action admits of being disposed of just as if it had been directed against Mr Cuninghame himself, as the defenders can only plead his right, and are no further liable than he would have been liable.

There is thus raised between the parties a sufficiently difficult general question, which I do not think has yet occurred for determination in Scotland. But besides disputing the right of the Crown to claim a wayleave which is not matter of contract, on general principles, the defenders maintain that the present case depends on exceptional circumstances, in respect that the Crown leases were granted to Mr Cuninghame "with a view to the coal thereby let being worked along with the landward coal belonging to Mr Cuninghame lying ex adverso, the landward and under-sea coal being treated for all working purposes as one single or common field. This was understood and agreed to by both parties to the lease." The defenders thus, and in other passages of their answers, refer the matter to what they term an understanding or agreement between the parties with regard to common working. If by this they mean to found on a separate term or condition, modifying or controlling the contract of lease, I do not think that it is relevantly averred. But if they mean that such must be held to be an implied term of the contract from the circumstances surrounding the contracting parties, and from the terms of the contract itself, then I think that their defence must be considered. It will be convenient therefore to examine the grounds which the defenders have for this special defence before considering the general questions of law which the case raises.

Outer House. Lord Johnston.

Lord Advocate v. Glengarnock Iron and Steel Co. Ltd.

The important circumstances surrounding the contracting parties were these: Mr Cuninghame had undoubted right to a valuable mineral field in his landward property, in which was admittedly included the foreshore ex adverso of his estate. Whether this field was being worked prior to 1888 I am not informed, and it is not material. It was known with reasonable certainty that the coal measures extended underneath the sea, below low-water mark. Of the coal below low-water mark the Crown were undoubtedly proprietors. The coal below low-water mark is to the dip of the coal under the foreshore and under the landward property of Mr Cuninghame. This is to be presumed as a natural fact, but it is also to be implied from the terms of the leases, and was, I think, admitted. It was also admitted in argument, and stands to reason, that the Crown coal could not be practically worked by pits sunk below low-water mark on Crown property, and must be worked, if at all, through the workings and pits in Mr Cuninghame's landward property. And it is a necessary inference from this, and from the circumstances of the locality as disclosed on the plan, including what is known as to dykes and burnt coal affecting the under-sea coal, that Mr Cuninghame of Auchinharvie or those in his right were the only tenants who could work the Crown under-sea coal to profit, and therefore the only possible tenants. I think that these are the only external circumstances which are relevant and competent to be considered in reviewing the terms of the leases themselves, and that of them no proof is required.

The first lease of 1888, which includes the area surrounded by a red line next to Saltcoats harbour, lets to Mr Cuninghame "All and Whole the whole beds and seams of coal, culm, or dross, ironstone and ore or fireclay, in or under the bed of the sea ex adverso of" his lands within certain boundaries, that on the north-east being the line of ordinary low-water mark as defined on the Ordnance Survey Map, and that for thirty-one years from Martinmas 1888, with right to Mr Cuninghame to put an end to the lease at the end of every third year on six months' notice. Now the first thing to be observed is that the lease is granted to Mr Cuninghame and his heirs in the lands of Auchinharvie and "to his or their assignees or sub-tenants," without the usual delectus personarum to the lessor, subject to the sole condition that Mr Cuninghame and his heirs should remain bound jointly and severally with the assignees and sub-tenants in implement of the obligations under the lease. At the same time, creditors and managers for creditors are excluded. Having regard to the facts that Mr Cuninghame had a mineral field of his own contiguous to that included in the lease in question, and that in the knowledge of the parties the minerals included in the lease in question could only be worked through the inclines, levels and pits in Mr Cuninghame's own property, I regard this somewhat exceptional power of freely assigning or sub-leasing as indicating that in the contemplation of the parties the working of the minerals in Mr Cuninghame's landward property and the Crown's under-sea minerals would be and remain in the same hands, and would be developed as a combined mineral field. Mr Cuninghame as lessee receives full power "to search for, work, win, raise, calcine and carry away the coal, culm or dross, ironstone and ore or fireclay hereby let, and to sink, drive, and make use of all pit shafts, mines, passages, drifts, air-courses and water-courses as well for the winning, working, getting, drawing or bringing to the surface or pithead the coal, culm, or dross, ironstone and ore or fireclay from and out of the said mines, seams and beds hereby let, as for draining and ventilating the said respective mines or seams." When it is regarded that the mineral area in question was such that it could not be practically reached by pits or shafts sunk within itself—that is, below low-water mark—it is apparent that part of this last quoted clause is matter of style, and really inapplicable to the circumstances. While it would undoubtedly be necessary both to ventilate and drain the workings under sea as a practical operation, the air-courses and water-courses must be part of a combined system for working the under-sea minerals along with those in the lessee's landward property. And it follows also, I think, of necessity that as the coals got in the under-sea area must be brought to the surface through the lessee's own landward property, the mines, passages and drifts, which either feed or are themselves the main drawing courses in the Crown's under-sea area, and those in Mr Cuninghame's landward area, must, in a reasonable working of the combined field, be laid out and carried forward on a joint plan or system.

So entirely, indeed, were the Crown dependent upon Mr Cuninghame as their sole possible lessee, that for this pretty extensive mineral field they could only stipulate a fixed rent of £10 under the 1889 lease, and an addition of £5 under the 1898 lease, though the royalties which the Crown were entitled to demand in place of this fixed rent were substantial. They were, however, in most cases much smaller than the royalties which Mr Cuninghame was able to obtain from the whole field which he let and sublet to the Glengarnock Iron Company in 1893.

Then Mr Cuninghame binds himself to make all practical exertions for working and putting out and disposing of the coal, etc., let to him, and to carry on the workings at a depth of not less than forty fathoms beneath the bed of the sea; and during the continuance of the lease, to work the coal, etc., "hereby let, and to manage and carry on the same in a fair and orderly manner, and according to the best and most approved method of working mines and seams of the like nature in Scotland, and shall keep the same at all times thoroughly drained while being wrought so as not to hazard or endanger the drowning or firing or otherwise injuring" the coal, etc., hereby let or adjoining thereto, or the working or away carrying thereof, all to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests or their inspector, "provided always that in the event of any dook-pumping machinery being overpowered by influx of water, or in the case of the machinery breaking down and water accumulating in the dook, the second party (the lessee) shall not be bound to pump out such water if the influx of water is such as cannot be overcome by reasonable means."

Now, here I have two points to observe on. First, having regard to the circumstances generally, and the relative situation of the minerals in particular, I do not think it possible to conceive that the best and most approved method of working the Crown's under-sea minerals could be adopted except as part of a comprehensive scheme for working them in conjunction with the lessee's landward minerals. Second, the dependence of the Crown workings on the lessee's landward mineral property is made conspicuously apparent by the provision with regard to a possible influx of water which could not be coped with. It was an underlying fact that that water could only be cleared by raising it through the lessor's landward property. If it overpowered the pumping machinery during the lease, the result was the closing of the under-sea workings, while at the end of the lease the Crown must have remained practically in Mr Cuninghame's hands, and if they did not succeed in renewing the lease with him, anything that remained of their field must have been left to be drowned out.

These two considerations further tend to the implication that in contemplation of the parties the whole field was to be treated as a unum quid in Mr Cuninghame's hands. But this is still more clearly shewn by the next passage in the lease, which provides for the leaving of barriers on certain of the boundaries of the coal let, but with the marked exception of "the north-eastern extremity, or wherever said space or area hereby let adjoins the coal or other minerals in the lands belonging to the second party (i.e. the lessee)."

I think the only other passage in the lease to which I need refer is the one in which the Crown has to stipulate for access for inspection purposes "to all or any of the mines or seams hereby let by any pits or shafts for the time being belonging to or worked or used by the lessee or his foresaids."

In the above I have referred solely to the lease of 1889. I find it unnecessary to refer to the supplementary lease of 1898, as it only incorporates by reference the conditions of the principal lease. Nor is anything to be gained by reference to the lease between Mr Cuninghame and the Glengarnock Iron Company, as the Crown were in no way parties to it.

I return now to the record, and particularly to Answer 3, where the method of working is explained. The defenders, working, as I have said, to the dip, have naturally extended their main haulage road or incline from the pit bottom towards the under-sea coal. The coals won from the working faces have been led by side roads to this main road for the purpose of being hauled to the pit-bottom. In the natural course of working, these side roads have not been taken on the level into the main haulage road, but are themselves minor inclines going to the dip and striking the main incline at an acute angle. Certain of these side roads commencing in the landward portion of the coal are continued through the under-sea coal and reach the main incline at a point within the under-sea area. Accordingly, the defenders state "portions of the landward coal were drawn from Auchenharvie through portions of the under-sea coal measures, and thence back through the Auchenharvie portion of the mineral field to the mine or pit. All of the said side roads here in question run continuously through the landward and under-sea coal measures, and their formation was requisite and necessary for the proper working and development of the under-sea minerals, apart from any consideration of the landward coal. This method of working, which is a proper and ordinary method of working a mineral field in such circumstances, was adopted by the defenders and their predecessors merely as being the most convenient," and they go on to say that they could have arranged otherwise had they been called upon. I do not take the latter matter into consideration at this stage. At present I am only concerned with the defenders' statement of the method of working adopted, and the pursuer's admission "that the minerals were worked according to the method stated."

In his argument the learned Solicitor-General pointedly rejected the idea that he could rest his claim upon recompense. He based his claim entirely on an invasion of a right of property, and admitted that if he did not succeed on that ground, the Crown's action must fail. I am not altogether so clear as the learned counsel that his case could not be based on the doctrine of recompense. For when the agreement between the Crown and Mr Cuninghame is considered, it must, I think, be admitted that the Crown would have got a larger rent and royalties had the inclines and roads through their coal been opened up prior to the lease, and that the Crown therefore paid in the diminished rent and royalties for the actual opening of them up. It was open therefore, I think, to the Crown to contend that if Mr Cuninghame occupied and used these inclines and roads for purposes of his own, outside the lease, he was occupying and using what had cost the Crown outlay, and was liable to the Crown in recompense accordingly. But as the counsel for the Crown did not think proper to maintain this probably somewhat far-fetched contention, and as I think that the case falls to be disposed of adversely to the Crown on other grounds, I do not consider the question further.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Johnston.

The main contest between the parties was on the application to Scotland of the English doctrine of trespass, and damages, as for trespass, measured by a wayleave. I think that there is very great difficulty in applying the English law on this subject to Scotland: first, because the law of trespass is not quite the same in the two countries; and, second, because the English decisions do not make very definite the principle on which they reach the result that a wayleave should be paid as damages in such a case as the Crown postulates.

In England an action of damages lies for trespass even when no damage is done, though the damages found due may be nominal. In Scotland an action of damages for trespass can only relevantly be laid when actual damage is specified. As no damage has been done by the actings of the defenders complained of, it is difficult to see how in England anything but nominal damages could be reached in the present case, and it is more difficult still to see how in Scotland a relevant action could be raised.

But a series of English decisions have been founded on which, carrying into effect the view that no man can be allowed to take benefit by his own wrong, have reached the conclusion that trespass in the circumstances postulated by the Crown must be paid for by way of wayleave. This is doubtless just; but I confess that the English judges appear to me to be somewhat hard put to it to reconcile the result with any definite principle.

The rule was first adopted by Parke, B., at the trial before him of Martin v. Porter (1839), 5 M. & W. 351, but the point was not referred to when the case came before the Court of Exchequer. The rule was accepted by Lord Hatherley, Lord Chancellor, in Jegon v. Vivian (1871), L.R. 6 Ch. App. 742, and in Phillips v. Homfray (1871), in the same volume, p. 770. But the judgments do not assist in reaching the matter of principle. In the former case there could be no claim for wayleave during the lease, as the use of the roads in the seams let for drawing other coals was given by the lease. The claim only arose after the lease came to an end, and Lord Hatherley ordered "an enquiry of what ought to be paid by way of wayleave for the passage of the coal through the mines since this" termination of the lease, but gave no reasons. In the latter case (p. 780) he says: "I at first felt some doubt as to compensation for wayleave; but on further consideration I think that on principle it ought to be given, whether the cases have as yet gone that length or not. . . . This Court has now the power to grant compensation in respect of a continuously accruing damage de die in diem, arising from a continuous trespass underground, which can only be stopped by injunction restraining any further conveyance of coal through the respondent's property. These damages cannot be better assessed than by an enquiry into what is fit and proper to be paid for wayleave for the coals carried through the property." But even this does not assist to reach the point of principle.

For that reference must be made to Whitwham v. Westminster Brymbo Coal and Coke Co., L.R. [1896], 1 Ch. 894 and 2 Ch. 538, where the principle of "the wayleave cases" was adopted and applied to the unauthorised occupation of land for a bing for mineral refuse. The learned judges had much difficulty in overcoming their prepossession that in a case of trespass upon land one must "consider what the plaintiff has lost, not what the defendant has made out of it"; but they reached the conclusion that something must be paid in name of damages on the principle that "a trespasser shall not be allowed to make use of another person's land without in some way compensating that other person for that use." You are not to take an account of the profits derived by him. It is in fact a matter of indifference whether he has made profit at all. But when the trespass consists of using a way over the plaintiff's land, a convenient way of assessing the damages may be by an enquiry as to wayleave. But even "if you can do nothing better, then by rule of thumb the trespasser must be charged for the use of the land" (per Rigby, L.J., at p. 543). Reference may also be made to Lord Hatherley's judgment in Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co. (1880), 7 R. (H.L.) 1. This is the only case in Scotland where apparently the question has been touched on. See also the Lord Ordinary's (Craighill's) judgment, 6 R. at p. 924. Now I cannot say that the judgment in Whitwham's case aids my point in reducing the question to one of principle, and in finding an answer in principle to the initial difficulty which all the judges who took part in the decision appear to have felt. After renewed consideration of the case I have come to think that the difficulty may be more apparent than real. I think that the term trespass has a wider meaning in England than in Scotland, and that what the English judges were groping after in their wayleave cases was just the doctrine at the bottom of the old Scottish law of "violent profits," which is as old as Stair (II. 9. 44), and probably much older.

I should, therefore, but for two further considerations, have been prepared to sustain as relevant the Crown's case, on the footing that the circumstances assumed amount to something more than trespass, though in England that expression may cover them, and that the English doctrine of damages by way of wayleave in such a case is really merely a development of the Scottish law of "violent profits."

But I think it has been overlooked that what is let here is not a mere privilege of taking coals, but "All and Whole the whole beds and seams of coal," etc., in or under the bed of the sea ex adverso of the lands belonging to Mr Cuninghame. What does that import? If there had been a disposition of the lands, with a reservation in similar terms, what remained with the disponer would have been, not the mere privilege of working and winning the coal, of reducing it to what in England is termed a chattel, and removing it in its chattel state. What would have been reserved would have been the stratum of terrestrial space occupied by the coal, with right to remove the coal, but also to use the space for such purposes as the holder of the reserved right chose, and, e.g., for transmitting minerals from other lands to other lands belonging to him or in his occupation (Duke of Hamilton v. Graham (1869), 7 M. 976, and (1871), 9 M. (H.L.) 98; Ramsay v. Blair (1875), 3 R. 25 and (H.L.) 41); see also the English case of Proud v. Bates (1868), L.J. 34 Ch. 406. I think that the same judgment must have been given had the mineral seam been given out in feu and so separated from the property, instead of being reserved when the property itself was given out in feu. And if so in the case of feu, I think that the same result must follow in the case of a lease, but limited to the period of the lease. For this reason I cannot give effect to the Crown contention.

But in addition to this ground of judgment, which I prefer, as it is general and independent of circumstances, I think that the special circumstances of the present case which I examined at the outset imply that the parties contemplated a working of the minerals in Mr Cuninghame's own property, along with those in his Crown leasehold, as one field, and bar the Crown from maintaining the claim they now put forward. The only reason why I do not rest positively upon this ground of judgment is the doubt whether I have not too much presumed the facts in my desire to save the parties from the expense of an extensive proof.

I shall therefore sustain the fourth plea in law for the defenders, and assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action, with expenses.—8th January 1908.

SUCCESSION—SETTLEMENT—DESTINATION—CONSTRUCTION—DESTINATION TO "MY SPOUSE AND MY HEIRS AND ASSIGNEES"—HELD TO IMPORT A DISPOSITION TO WIFE ALONE.

This was an action of multiplepoinding to which the parties were (1) the testamentary trustees of Mrs M'Lachlan, widow of Donald M'Lachlan, venetian blind manufacturer, Glasgow, pursuers and real raisers, and also as claimants; (2) Mrs Harvey and others; (3) Donald M'Kinnon and others. The second and third parties presented rival claims to the fund in medio as representatives of the heir of the said Donald M'Lachlan.

The fund in medio consisted of one-half of the residue of the estate of the said deceased Donald M'Lachlan, in so far as the same was recovered by the said Mrs M'Lachlan as his executrix, after deduction of duties, legacies and expense of administration, etc.

The will of the said deceased Donald M'Lachlan, which was partly written and partly printed, was as follows. The italicised parts were written.

lawful debts, and sickbed and funeral charges, and of the payment of the following legacies, viz. (d) none. . . .

The circumstances in which the case arose are narrated by the Lord Ordinary.

The Lord Ordinary ranked and preferred the claimants Mrs M'Lachlan's testamentary trustees to the whole fund in medio.

Lord Dundas.—The late Donald M'Lachlan, venetian blind maker in Glasgow, died on 27th April 1902. He left a testamentary document, dated 4th June 1877, by which he gave, granted, assigned, disponed, devised, legated, and bequeathed to and in favour of Mrs Margaret Scotland or M'Lachlan, his spouse, and his heirs and assignees, all and sundry the whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, which should be belonging and owing to him at his decease; and appointed his said spouse to be his sole executor and universal intromitter with his moveable means and estate. Mrs M'Lachlan survived her husband, obtained confirmation as his executrix, and had transferred to her own name the whole estate left by him. She died on 3rd January 1906, leaving a trust disposition and settlement and codicil, dated respectively 19th February and 21st April 1903, whereby she assigned and disponed to trustees named (of whom the pursuers and real raisers of this action are the survivors acting and accepting), the whole means and estate of every description which should belong to her at the time of her decease, including therein all means and estate over which she should have the power of disposal.

The fund in medio in this multiplepoinding is "one half-part or share of the estate and effects which belonged to the said deceased Donald M'Lachlan, so far as the same was recovered by the said Mrs Margaret Scotland or M'Lachlan, as executrix of the late Donald M'Lachlan, and is now in the possession of Mrs M'Lachlan's trustees." The claimants in the competition are (1) Mrs M'Lachlan's trustees, who claim to retain the whole fund in medio, to be held and administered by them in trust for the purposes mentioned in her said trust disposition and settlement; and (2) various persons who claim to represent Mr M'Lachlan's heir.

In my opinion, the first-mentioned claim ought to be sustained, and the other claims repelled. The case is not, in my judgment, attended with any serious doubt or difficulty. The question depends upon the proper construction to be put upon Mr M'Lachlan's testamentary document. The document appears upon its face to be a printed form of general style, filled in in writing by an accountant in Glasgow, whose aid Mr M'Lachlan seems to have invoked, instead of having recourse to a law agent, or filling it up himself. I have not seen the document itself, which is recorded in the Books of Council and Session; but at my request I have been furnished with a duplicate of it, which shews its contents as printed and written respectively. The name and designation of the testator's spouse are, of course, filled in in writing. The immediately succeeding words, "and heirs and assignees," form part of the printed matter; and the word "my" has been introduced by the writer, to fill up a space left blank in the printed style for the pronoun—"his" or "her," as the case might be—which should appropriately relate to the heirs and assignees of the disponee, and not of the testator. It is difficult to avoid the inference that the latter had no thought of conjoining his own heirs, or anyone else, with his wife in the general disposition of his estate; and that the friendly accountant made a mistake in putting in the word "my"—instead of "her"—from a conscientious desire to fill up blank spaces, without a sufficiently clear apprehension of the purpose and intention with which this particular space had been left blank in the printed form. If this inference is correct, there would seem to be an end of all dispute in the case; for a disposition of the estate to Mrs M'Lachlan and her heirs and assignees would, beyond all doubt, confer upon that lady a full fee and right of disposal thereof. But however this may be, I find it impossible to hold, as matter of construction and intention, that Mr M'Lachlan's testamentary document imports a joint and equal disposition of his estate to and between his wife, on the one hand, and his heirs and assignees on the other. The introduction of the word "assignees" appears to me to be absolutely meaningless in such a connection. Again, if the testator intended his "heirs" only to be joint disponees along with his wife, it would have been easy for him to say so in plain language. But he did not do this; and the fact that by the subsequent clause (which is part of the printed matter) he throws the whole burden of the payment of debts and legacies upon his wife alone lends strong support to the view that he intended her to be his sole disponee. I heard some argument and citation of authority with regard to the use of the word "and," in relation to its import as a substitution, or a conditional institution, of heirs and assignees. I do not think that any such point arises in the present case. The question, in my judgment, is whether there is a general disposition to Mrs M'Lachlan alone, or a joint disposition to her and her husband's heirs and assignees; and for the reasons stated I think the disposition was to the wife alone. I am therefore of opinion that Mrs M'Lachlan's trustees are entitled to be ranked and preferred to the whole fund in medio, in terms of their administrative claim,

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling, Low and Ardwall.)

300. Duff's Trustees v. Garland's Executor.

Succession—Trust Disposition and Settlement — Vesting — Survivorship Clause—Direction to Trustees to Realise Heritable Subject on Death of Liferentrix, to Divide the Free Proceeds Among Nephews and Nieces Named, and Failing any of them Without Issue, to the Survivors — Niece Predeceasing Liferentrix Leaving Child Who Also Predeceased Liferentrix—Held Vesting Suspended Until Death of Liferentrix.

Special Case.

Thomas Garland, shipowner, Dundee, died on 25th December 1878, leaving a trust disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed to trustees, inter alia, the heritable property belonging to him and situated in Blackness Terrace, Dundee.

The sixth purpose of the settlement was in the following terms:

"In the sixth place, My said trustees shall as soon as convenient after my death convey the foresaid property belonging to me at Blackness Terrace being the subjects secondly before disponed to and in favour of the said Miss Mary Garland my sister in liferent for her liferent use allenarly during all the days of her life after my death; And after the death of the said Miss Mary Garland I direct my said trustees to sell and dispose of the foresaid subjects at Blackness Terrace in one lot, and to divide the free proceeds thereof equally among my said nephews and nieces, Thomas Garland, Joseph Garland, Christian Garland, Agnes Garland, Elizabeth Garland, and Ann Garland; and failing any of them without issue to the survivors and survivor of them equally, if more than one."

The testator was survived by the liferentrix, Miss Mary Garland, who died on 10th January 1885. He was also survived by all the beneficiaries mentioned in the sixth purpose of the settlement. All the beneficiaries survived the liferentrix except Mrs Elizabeth Garland or Leighton. She died on 20th September 1879, leaving a child, Eliza Robina Garland, who also predeceased the liferentrix.

The executor-dative of Eliza Robina Garland was the third party to the special case. The first, second, fourth, fifth and sixth parties were the persons now in right of the shares of the beneficiaries mentioned in the sixth purpose of the settlement other than Mrs Leighton.

2nd Div.

Duff's Trustees v. Garland's Executor.

The following Question of Law was stated:

Had the said Elizabeth Garland, afterwards Mrs Elizabeth Garland or Leighton, a vested right to one-sixth share pro indiviso of said property situated at Blackness Terrace, Dundee, as at her death? Or

Was vesting postponed till the date of the death of the liferentrix of said property, the said Mary Garland?

Argued for the first, second, fourth, fifth and sixth parties: A survivorship clause was presumed to suspend the vesting until the date of distribution (Young v. Robertson, 1862, 4 Macq. 314; Bryson's Trs. v. Clark, 1880, 8 R. 142; Forbes v. M'Condach's Trs., 1890, 18 R. 230). There was nothing to take the present case out of the ordinary rule. The phrase "without issue" might mean either without having had issue or without leaving issue (Cunningham v. Cunningham, 1889, 17 R. 218; Hendry's Trs. v. Hendry, 1872, 10 M. 432). In the present case it meant without leaving issue who should survive the liferentrix.

Argued for the third party: The primary meaning of the phrase "without issue" was without having had issue (Carleton v. Thomson, 1867, 5 M.H.L. 151; Steel's Trs. v. Steedman, 1902, 5 F. 239). The destination over, therefore, only took effect in the event of the institute dying without having had issue. It followed that vesting took place a morte subject to defeasance in the event of the institute predeceasing the liferentrix without having had issue.

The Court answered the first alternative of the question of law in the negative, and the second alternative in the affirmative.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I cannot say that I think the interpretation of this deed presents any serious difficulty. It is very plain, on the face of it, that the gift here is a gift to certain people on a certain event, that event being the death of the liferentrix; and the gift takes the form of a direction to trustees after the death of the liferentrix to sell and dispose of the subjects and to divide the proceeds among certain persons named, who are the testator's nephews and nieces, "and failing any of them without issue to the survivors and survivor of them." I take that to mean that if any one of the nephews and nieces named dies, his or her share is to go to the survivors unless he or she has issue. The question here is as to a share destined to a niece who died before the liferentrix. She had a child, but that child also died before the liferentrix. I think that share must go to the survivors; and in these circumstances the first alternative of the question should be answered in the negative, and the second alternative in the affirmative.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair. The ordinary rule is that a clause of survivorship such as you find here is referable to the date of distribution, which is fixed as the death of the liferentrix; and I think that the real meaning of this clause in the settlement substituting issue for a parent, was simply to give expression by the testator to what would otherwise have been an implication of law under the conditio si sine liberis decesserit, for the issue could only take what had already vested in the parent.

Lord Low.—I agree. It is to be observed that the only gift which is given to the nephews and nieces is contained in the direction to the trustees at the death of the liferentrix to realise the subjects liferented and divide the proceeds thereof among her nephews and nieces. That being so, I think it is plain that the survivorship clause applies to the period of division and payment and to no other. Now the only difficulty arises from the fact that the survivorship clause is expressed in this way: "Failing any of them without issue to the survivors of survivor of them." The expression "without issue" can be construed either as "without ever having had issue" or "without leaving issue." Which of these two constructions is to be adopted depends on the context. It seems to me that here it means "without leaving issue," the time to which the words apply being the termination of the liferent and the period of division. If at that period a nephew or a niece has died without leaving any child then alive to represent him or her, his or her share passes to the survivors. Accordingly Elizabeth and her child having both predeceased the liferentrix nothing vested in either of them.

Lord Ardwall.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion. In the sixth purpose of the trust disposition and deed of settlement of Mrs Duff there is no gift of the fee of the property at Blackness Terrace or the proceeds thereof till after the death of the liferentrix, Miss Mary Garland, because the only words of gift are contained in a direction to the trustees after that event to sell and dispose of the said property, and to divide the free proceeds thereof among certain named beneficiaries. Accordingly, until after the death of the liferentrix there was no gift made, and indeed there was no fund to divide, and therefore, in my opinion, it cannot be held that there was any vesting of the shares of that fund in any of the beneficiaries (see Bryson's Trs. v. Clarke, 1880, 8 R. 142). I think it is equally clear that the survivorship clause refers to the same period, namely, the death of the liferentrix (see Young v. Robertson, 1862, 4 Macq. 318). Now the survivorship clause comes to this, that the share of any of the nephews or nieces who predecease the liferentrix is to accresce to the survivors, and the only event in which accretion is not to take place is the event of any nephew or niece leaving issue alive who should survive to take the share of the parent. Mrs Leighton had a child, but that child died before the liferentrix, and therefore no share fell to either mother or child; and the whole proceeds of the said subjects now fall to be divided in terms of the directions of the deed among the nephews and nieces of the truster who survived the liferentrix. —23*rd January* 1908.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow.

In April 1905 Messrs Aitken Campbell & Co. Ltd., 99 Glassford Street, Glasgow, bought 133 pieces (18,729 yards) of maroon twill from Messrs

Boullen & Gatenby, 70 St James' Street, Manchester, at the price of one penny per yard.

The sale was a sale by sample, and was concluded by certain letters and telegrams passing between the parties. The maroon twill was described in the invoice as "slightly soft."

On or about 22nd May 1905 Aitken Campbell & Co. paid the net price of the goods (£76, 1s. 9d.)

On or about 20th June 1905 Aitken Campbell & Co. made an examination of the goods and found that 64 out of the 133 pieces were disconform to contract. They intimated the disconformity to Boullen & Gatenby, returned the defective goods to them at Manchester, and claimed repayment of the price. Boullen & Gatenby refused to repay the price, or to accept delivery of the rejected goods.

Aitken Campbell & Co. then brought the present action against Boullen & Gatenby. They sued for the sum of £50, 19s., on the footing that they were entitled to reject the goods so far as disconform to contract and to keep the remainder, or alternatively for the sum of £25, 16s. on the footing that they were not entitled to reject the goods which were disconform to contract, but that they were entitled to retain the whole goods and claim damages in respect of the 64 pieces being disconform to contract.

Proof was allowed and led. The pursuers led evidence to shew that the goods rejected were "tender goods," that tender goods were recognised in the trade as a separate class of goods, and that they were usually sold by the pound instead of by the yard. The evidence on this subject is discussed in the judgment of Lord Ardwall.

The Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. cap. 71) provides:

> Sect. 11 (2). In Scotland, failure by the seller to perform any material part of a contract of sale is a breach of contract, which entitles the buyer either within a reasonable time after delivery to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated, or to retain the goods and treat the failure to perform such material part as a breach which may give rise to a claim for compensation or damages.
> Sect. 30 (3). Where the seller delivers to the buyer the goods he contracted to sell mixed with goods of a different description not included in the contract, the buyer may accept the goods which are in accordance with the contract and reject the rest, or he may reject the whole.

On 14th May 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Mitchell) found in law (1) that there was no valid rejection of the goods, and (2) that although the attempted partial rejection was invalid, the pursuers could not claim to retain all the goods and sue for damages, and assoilzied the defenders.

The pursuers appealed to the Sheriff (Guthrie). On 6th December 1906 the Sheriff found in law that the pursuers were entitled to reject the defective pieces and to retain those that were conform to sample. On 24th January 1907 the Sheriff decerned against the defenders for the sum of £45 under the first alternative prayer of the petition.

The Defenders appealed and argued: (1) At common law, in the event of goods not being conform to contract, the buyer's only remedy was to return the goods (Couston, Thomson & Co. v. Chapman, 1872, 10 M. (H.L.) 74, per Lord Chancellor Hatherley and Lord Chelmsford). The Sale of Goods Act, sect. 11 (2), gave the buyer two alternative remedies: (1) a right to reject, (2) a right to retain and claim damages, but it gave no right of partial rejection (Electric Construction Co. Ltd. v. Hurry & Young, 1897, 24 R. 312; Lupton & Co. v. Schulze & Co., 1900, 2 F. 1118; Croom & Arthur v. Stewart & Co., 1905, 7 F. 563). Under sect. 30 (3) the buyer had a right of partial rejection where goods conform to contract were mixed with goods of a description not included in the contract. That meant goods which were different in kind from those contracted for, not merely goods of defective quality (Levy v. Green, 1857, 8 E. and B. 575; Nicholson v. Bradfield Union, 1866, L.R. 1 Q.B. 620). Jaffé v. Ritchie (1860, 23 D. 242) was distinguishable, because the whole goods delivered were rejected. On the evidence, the goods in the present case were defective only in quality, and sect. 30 (3) did not apply. The pursuers therefore had no right of partial rejection, and the course adopted by them was incompetent. (2) The pursuers were bound to elect between their two remedies. They could reject or they could retain and claim damages, they could affirm or disaffirm the contract; but if they elected to disaffirm they could not turn round and affirm. Here they had elected to disaffirm the contract by sending back part of the goods. It followed that they were barred from claiming damages (Electric Construction Co. Ltd. v. Hurry & Young, cit.; Lupton & Co. v. Schulze & Co., cit.; Croom & Arthur v. Stewart & Co., cit.).

Argued for Pursuers: (1) The goods contracted for were described as "slightly soft." The goods rejected were "tender goods." It was proved that tender goods were a separate class of goods well known to the trade. The goods supplied were thus different in kind from those contracted for, and on the defenders' own shewing, sect. 30 (3) applied. But, further, the words "of a different description not included in the contract" meant simply "disconform to contract" (Jaffé v. Ritchie, cit.), and sect. 30 (3) applied even although the only defect was bad quality. It followed that the pursuers were entitled to keep the goods which were conform to contract and reject the rest. (2) But if that remedy were not open, then the pursuers were entitled to claim damages. No doubt they were bound to elect their remedy, and if they elected to reject they could not turn round and claim damages (Electric Construction Co. Ltd. v. Hurry & Young, cit.; Lupton & Co. v. Schulze & Co., cit.; Croom & Arthur v. Stewart & Co., cit.).

2ND DIV. Aitken Campbell & Co. Ltd. v. Boullen & Gatenby.

But here, if partial rejection were incompetent, there was no election of remedy, and the pursuers were not barred. Where rejection was incompetent an attempted rejection would not bar the claim of damages (Paton & Sons v. Payne & Co., 1897, 35 S.L.R. 112). The cases cited by the defenders were distinguishable. In the Electric Construction Co. Ltd. (cit.) and Croom & Arthur (cit.) there was an election to reject. In Lupton & Co. v. Schulze & Co. (cit.) the buyer attempted to reject the goods and also to retain them in security of a claim of damages.

The Court recalled the interlocutors of the Sheriff-Substitute and of the Sheriff, found in law that, although the attempted partial rejection was invalid, the pursuers were entitled to retain all the goods and sue for damages, the defenders not having been prejudiced by the attempted partial rejection, and decerned against the defenders for an agreed sum of £26, 18s. 3d.

Lord Low.—I am of opinion that this is not a case to which sect. 30 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act 1893 applies. That enactment deals with the case of a seller delivering to a buyer "the goods he contracted to sell mixed with goods of a different description not included in the contract." I think that the word "description" is there plainly used to denote the kind of goods contracted for, and that the right of partial rejection conferred upon the buyer applies only to cases where goods of the kind contracted for are mixed with goods of a different kind, and not to cases where all the goods are of the kind contracted for, but part of them is not of such good quality as the seller was bound to supply. Here the goods contracted for were "maroon twills" and the goods delivered were "maroon twills," but 64 out of 133 pieces were not of such good quality as the samples which formed the basis of the contract. I am accordingly of opinion that the pursuers were not entitled to reject the 64 pieces and to retain the remaining 69, and that therefore the interlocutor of the learned Sheriff must be recalled.

The next question is whether the pursuers are barred by having attempted to reject the 64 pieces from retaining the whole goods and claiming damages on the ground that the defenders have failed to perform a material part of the contract? What happened was that the pursuers actually returned the 64 pieces to the defenders, but the latter sent them back, and they are now in the possession of the pursuers, awaiting the issue of the present action. It is not said that as regards the pursuers' claim for damages the defenders have been in any way prejudiced by the attempt to reject the 64 pieces, but the defenders maintain, and the Sheriff-Substitute has given effect to the contention, that the pursuers having elected to follow one course cannot now be allowed to adopt another. The authority mainly relied upon is The Electric Construction Company v. Hurry & Young, 1897, 24 R. 312. The pursuers in that case had supplied a dynamo to the defenders which was disconform to contract. The defenders intimated to the pursuer that they rejected the dynamo, but nevertheless they continued to use it for several months. The pursuers then brought an action for the contract price, in answer to which the defenders maintained that they were entitled to retain the machine, and set off this claim of damages against the price. It was held by a majority that the defenders having elected to reject, were not entitled to fall back upon the alternative of retaining the machine and claiming damages.

I am of opinion that that judgment has no application to the present case. The ground of judgment was that the statute having specified two courses either of which the buyer might adopt, he was bound to make up his mind which of the two he would follow, and could not be allowed first to intimate to the seller that he was to take one course, and then, when he found it to be more to his advantage to do so, to adopt the other course. But that was not what happened in this case. No doubt the pursuers adopted a course which they could not insist upon taking as a matter of right. The defenders might have consented to the course proposed, but they refused to do so, and they were quite entitled to refuse. I can find nothing, however, in that position of matters to debar the pursuers from afterwards adopting either of the courses open to them under the statute, provided that their attempt to reject part of the goods had not put the defenders in a worse position than they would have been in if the pursuers had at first elected to proceed in conformity with the statute. As I have already indicated, nothing of that sort is suggested.

Suppose that when the defenders refused to take back the 64 pieces the pursuers had at once also returned the remaining 69 pieces, and intimated that they repudiated the contract and rejected the whole goods, I cannot imagine any ground upon which it could have been held that they were not entitled to follow that course. But I think that it is equally plain that they were entitled to say to the defenders: "If you will not take back the goods which are disconform to sample, we shall keep them, along with the goods which are conform to sample, but we shall claim damages in respect that you have failed to perform a material part of the contract."

I am therefore of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute was wrong in finding that "although the partial rejection was invalid, the pursuers cannot now claim to retain all the goods and sue for damages."

It appears that the pursuers paid the contract price of the goods before they discovered that part of them was not conform to contract, and accordingly their claim is for repayment of the amount of the loss which they have sustained in respect of part of the goods not being conform to sample. I understand that the parties have adjusted the amount of the loss at £26, 18s. 3d., and accordingly I am of opinion that decree should be pronounced for that sum.

Lord Ardwall.—In April 1905 the defenders sold to the pursuers by sample 133 pieces of maroon twills, and delivered them to the pursuers on 6th May following. On 22nd May the pursuers paid to the defenders £76, 1s. 9d. as the price of the goods. On 20th June following, the pursuers, having made a complete examination of the goods, discovered that certain pieces were not conform to sample, and they intimated a rejection of these pieces to the defenders, and returned to them 69 pieces as disconform to sample. At the same time they intimated to the defenders their acceptance of the balance of the goods. The defenders refused to agree to the attempted partial rejection, and have never accepted re-delivery or otherwise acquiesced in the said rejection. The pursuers, under agreement, have now in their hands the rejected goods and also those that they all along kept as being conform to sample.

In these circumstances the present action is raised for payment of £50, 19s., being the price of the rejected goods, or alternatively the sum of £25, 16s., being the loss and damage sustained by the pursuers on the footing of their retaining the whole goods.

The Sheriff-Substitute held that the pursuers were not entitled to reject part of the goods, and that having attempted to reject part of the goods they are barred from now keeping the whole of the goods and claiming damages. He accordingly assoilzied the defenders. The Sheriff recalled this interlocutor, on the ground that the pursuers were entitled to reject part of the goods in virtue of the provisions of section 30 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act 1893. He accordingly has given decree for £36, 12s. 3d., being the price of the defective pieces which were rejected, and a further sum of £8, 7s. 9d. in name of damages.

I propose to deal first with the question whether the provisions of section 30 (3) of the said Act apply to the circumstances of the present case. That section is in the following terms: "Where the seller delivers to the buyer the goods he contracted to sell mixed with goods of a different description not included in the contract, the buyer may accept the goods which are in accordance with the contract and reject the rest."

In the present case what was sold was maroon twills equal to samples sent, and it is proved that 64 or otherwise 69 of the 133 pieces sent were not equal to sample in respect that they were more "tender," as it is called, than the samples. "Tenderness" in goods of this kind, it is explained, is an extreme degree of softness or weakness in the goods, and there is some evidence to the effect that when goods of this description are of such quality as to merit the epithet "tender," it is usual to sell them by the pound and not by the yard; and on the strength of this practice of the trade it is maintained for the pursuers that "tender" goods are goods of a description different from those which were conform to the sample within the meaning of the word "description" as used in the Act. I confess I cannot accept this contention. I am of opinion that the whole of the goods sent in fulfilment of the order were goods of the same "description," namely, maroon twills, and that their conformity or disconformity to sample fell to be determined by the varying degrees of strength on the one hand and softness or "tenderness" on the other; and from the proof I think it sufficiently appears that the gradation in the texture of the goods varied greatly, and I do not think that at any point in the variation from strong to "tender" goods it could be predicated that goods at any one part of the scale were of a different "description" from the goods immediately next to them, either on the side of strength or of "tenderness."

I accordingly do not think that the subsection in question applies, because I do not think it can be said that any part of the goods delivered was mixed with goods of a different description. I am of opinion that the word "description" implies a difference of kind, not merely of quality, and the cases which were cited as illustrations of cases to which the section might apply were all cases where there was a difference of kind and not merely of quality in the goods.

In the case of Levy v. Green, 1857, 8 E. and B. 575, crockery of a different pattern and consisting of different articles from those ordered was sent in a crate containing the articles which had been ordered. In Nicholson v. Bradfield Union, 1866, L.R., 1 Q.B. 620, in a contract for the sale of coal the sellers put in a lot of coal from a different colliery from that ordered, which got mixed with the first delivery; and in the case of Jaffé v. Ritchie, 1860, 23 D. 242, a seller of yarns which were described as "flax yarns," delivered several spindles containing yarns composed of a mixture of flax and jute, and it was there held that this did not answer to the description of "flax yarns," and that accordingly they were properly rejected. But no case was cited in which a mere difference in quality was held sufficient to divide goods into goods of different "descriptions."

For these reasons I am of opinion that the said subsection does not apply, and that the interlocutors of the Sheriff, which proceed upon the application of that subsection, must be recalled.

The next question for consideration is whether the pursuers, having rejected part of the goods

2ND DIV.
Aitken Campbell & Co. Ltd. v. Boullen & Gatenby.
Lord Ardwall.

sent, are now barred from retaining that part along with the goods which they had not rejected and claiming damages in respect of defective fulfilment of the contract. I confess I have found this to be a question of some difficulty. The cases of The Electric Construction Company v. Hurry & Young, 1897, 24 R. 312, and Croom & Arthur v. Stewart & Co., 1905, 7 F. 563, were cited as authorities for the proposition that after intimating to a seller rejection of goods as disconform to contract a buyer is not entitled to fall back on the alternative remedy provided by the Sale of Goods Act of retaining the goods and claiming damages for the seller's failure to perform a material part of the contract. I may notice in passing that, taking these two cases together, the above proposition as one of universal application was questioned in the first case by Lords Kinnear and Low, and in the second by Lord Kyllachy, and it is possible that in some other circumstances it may deserve reconsideration. But accepting the views of the majority in each of the cases as absolutely sound, I am of opinion that the present case is capable of being differentiated from them. In both these cases the whole of the subject sold was rejected, and in both of them the question was complicated by the buyers, after intimating rejection of machines, continuing to use them for considerable periods of time. Now, in the present case the pursuers did not reject the whole of the subject of the sale, nor did they, by keeping possession of the rejected portion, in any way prejudice, so far as that portion was concerned, the interests of the sellers. They were accordingly not in the position of having elected to take one of the remedies provided by the Act, and therefore by implication to have departed from the other. What they did was to adopt neither the one alternative nor the other, but to make a partial rejection which they were not entitled to make, and which they did make in a mistaken view of their own rights in the matter. In other words, they attempted to do what they were not entitled to do either under the Act or at common law. But the fact of their having made this mistake does not involve them in the dilemma in which the Court considered the sellers had placed themselves in the two cases above referred to, and I am of opinion that nothing else has occurred to bar them from now adopting the alternative remedy provided by section 11, subsection 2, of the said Act by retaining the whole goods and claiming damages for breach of contract.

On these grounds I think the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor of 14th May 1906, with the exception of its findings in fact, ought to be recalled and decree given for the alternative sum of £26, 18s. 3d. claimed by the pursuers.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—My Lords, I concur with your Lordships in holding that section 30 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act does not apply to this case, and that on the grounds so clearly stated by Lord Low. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff must be recalled. Further, I agree with the opinion expressed by both your Lordships that in the circumstances of this case the purchaser of the goods has the right still, retaining the whole of the goods, to claim damages for the disconformity of a portion of the goods to the quality shewn by the sample upon which the purchase was made. The case of the Electric Company, which was founded on at the debate, was one of an entirely different character from the present. The sale in that case was of a specific article—a machine for developing and transmitting energy by electrical transmutation. The party in that case did not return the machine. They intimated that they rejected, but kept the machine and used it for months. The decision in that case, which seems somewhat doubtful as regards its soundness, has no bearing on this case, which is one in which the disconformity is of some part of the goods being of inferior quality. The sellers suffered no damage by the course which was taken, which was a mistaken course under the Act. The Sheriff-Substitute, on the authority of the Electric Company case, held that the buyer was barred from now claiming damages for that part of the goods which were not conform to sample. I concur with your Lordships in holding that the goods were of one "description" in the sense of the Act, and that the section refers to a difference of kind and not of quality—such as in the crockery case, where different articles were sent among those which had been ordered. The case of jute yarn and flax yarn was similar. I therefore agree with the course proposed by Lord Low.—24th January 1908.

Reclaiming Note against Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

Sequel to Case of Allan v. Thomson's Trustees, 1893, 20 R. 733.

The late Mrs Christina Steven or Thomson, Montrose, died in 1882, leaving a trust disposition and settlement whereby she conveyed her whole estate to trustees.

By the sixth purpose of the trust disposition and settlement the testatrix, after providing a liferent of the sum of £2500 to her niece, Christina Black, directed her trustees as follows:—

"And I further direct my said trustees to pay over, on the death of the said Christina Black, the said principal sum of £2500 to any child or children of the said Christina Black, equally among them on their attaining majority . . . .; and failing such child or children, or failing their reaching majority, I direct my said trustees to realise and pay over the said sum of £2500 as follows, viz.: To my said nephew George Black the sum of £1000; to my said niece Jane Black the sum of £750; and to my said nephew Charles Boswell Black the sum of £750; declaring that if the succession thereto shall open to my said nephews and niece, the sums falling to them shall be held to have vested in them at the time of my death; and declaring also that if the said Christina Black shall predecease me, the said sum of £2500 shall form part of the residue of my means and estate."

Miss Christina Black, the liferentrix, died unmarried in 1905. Jane Black (Mrs Allan) had predeceased the testator, leaving a son, Stephen Strachan Allan.

Questions having arisen as to the disposal of the sum of £750 destined to Mrs Allan, the present action of multiplepoinding and exoneration was brought by the trustees. In a previous action arising out of questions relating to the same trust disposition and settlement (Allan v. Thomson's Trs., 1893, 20 R. 733) it was held that the residue clause was of the nature of a family provision to which the conditio si sine liberis applied. In this action claims were lodged by (1) Stephen Strachan Allan, and (2) the residuary legatees.

On 5th February 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) repelled the claim of Stephen Strachan Allan and sustained the claim of the residuary legatees.

Stephen Strachan Allan reclaimed and argued: The testator here was an aunt of the beneficiaries, and it was res judicata that the settlement was a family settlement (see Allan v. Thomson's Trs., 1893, 20 R. 733). The presumption therefore was that the conditio applied. There was nothing in the sixth purpose to rebut that presumption. It was not enough that the beneficiaries were conditional institutes. The doubt on this point expressed in the case of Carter's Trs. v. Carter (1892, 19 R. 408) was only a doubt, and was inconsistent with the cases of Rougheads v. Rannie (1794, M. 6403); Grant's Trs. v. Grant, (1862, 24 D. 1211); and Taylor v. Taylor (1884, 11 R. 423), the facts that the beneficiaries were called nominatim and that their shares were of unequal amount were not fatal (Bryce's Tr. v. Hoffman, 1878, 5 R. 722). The fact that only two out of three families of nephews and nieces were favoured was unimportant, because there was another provision in the settlement in favour of the third family (M'Gown's Trs. v. Robertson, 1869, 8 M. 356; Bogie's Trs. v. Christie, 1882, 9 R. 453). The provision that the fund should fall into residue in the event of the liferentrix predeceasing the testator suggested that it was not to fall into residue in any other event. It had already been held that the conditio applied to the provision of residue (Allan v. Thomson's Trs., cit.). It was not to be supposed that the testator intended that the children of beneficiaries should take their parents' share of residue, which amounted to about £200, and should be excluded from the share of a special provision amounting to about £750.

Argued for the respondents the residuary legatees: The gift now in question was not a family provision but a legacy in favour of selected individuals to which the conditio did not apply (Douglas' Exrs. v. Scott, 1869, 7 M. 504, per Lord Justice-Clerk). The gift of residue had already been held to be a family provision (Allan v. Thomson's Trs., cit.), and where a will contained one gift of a family nature the presumption was that other gifts in favour of the same persons were intended to be personal to the beneficiaries. The facts that the beneficiaries were only conditional institutes (Carter's Trs. v. Carter, cit.), and that the gift was contingent on the liferentrix surviving the testator, were also unfavourable to the application of the conditio.

The Court adhered, and found the reclaimer liable in the expenses of the reclaiming note.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—My Lords, I am very clearly of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary in this case is right and ought to be affirmed. The testament in this case was considered in a former case by this Division of the Court, and it was decided that a bequest under it of a share of residue fell under the conditio si sine, but it was also held that a specific legacy of £250, being a personal bequest for an individual, described specifically as a "memento of me," was not of the nature of a family provision, to which the doctrine could be held to apply.

My Lords, in my opinion it would be inconsistent with that judgment if the claim were sustained that the sums bequeathed to certain individuals by a destination over, which by the original disposal went to other people altogether, were to be held to be family provisions. The sum in dispute here was not a share given to a legatee of a fund to be equally shared by the other members of a family. It was a specific sum directed to be paid to an individual person. The bequest had all the characteristics of an ordinary legacy as distinguished from the disposal of the residue, which was expressly ordered to be divided among a class.

2nd Div.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.

There is here no ground for presuming that the testator had failed to notice the possible contingency of the person instituted leaving children, and in the absence of such ground there is no reason for bringing in the conditio and applying it to the gift. Here the testator, having considered the possibility of a sum of £2500 not being taken by those whom it was intended primarily to favour, gave specific directions that it was to be dealt with by paying specific sums of varying amount to individuals named, a mode of disposal in marked contrast to a family provision to a class of persons.

On these grounds I would move your lordships to adhere to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary.

I may add that I have had an opportunity of considering the opinion prepared by Lord Stormonth-Darling, which goes more fully into the facts of the case, and in which I entirely concur.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—The fund in medio in this multiplepoinding consists of the balance of residue, so far as undistributed by the surviving and acting trustee, of the estate of the late Mrs Christina Stephen or Thomson, widow of Mr Charles Duirs Thomson, solicitor in Montrose. The testatrix died in 1882, predeceased by her said husband, and leaving no family. She was survived by three sets of nephews and nieces. The claimant Mr Stephen Allan is the only child of one of those nieces, Mrs Jane Black or Allan, who was named three times in the settlement of the testatrix: (1) under the fourth purpose, for a money legacy (£250); (2) under the destination over in the sixth purpose, by which, in the event of the liferentrix of a sum of £2500 dying without issue, or of such issue failing to attain majority, the trustees were directed to pay over the said sum of £2500 in certain defined proportions among members of the Black family, including £750 to the claimant's mother, Jane Black; and (3) under the eighth or residue clause of the settlement, by which the trustees were directed to divide the free residue equally among certain persons by name, these being a brother-in-law and the whole nephews and nieces of the testatrix who were in fact alive at her death.

Now, this will has already been the subject of judicial determination. In 1892 the father and administrator-in-law of the present claimant, Mr Allan, brought an action against the trustees, by which he claimed on behalf of his son, who was then a pupil, that the son was entitled, under the conditio si sine liberis decesserit, to payment both of the legacy of £250 left to Mrs Allan under the fourth purpose of the settlement and also of the estimated amount of her share of the residue. The case was decided by this Division of the Court on 30th May 1893, with the result that the conditio was held to apply to the bequest of a share of residue, and was held not to apply to the legacy of £250. The distinction thus drawn proceeded on the footing, as explained in the opinion of your Lordship in the chair, that the specific legacy in the fourth purpose was a personal bequest of a sum of money for the legatee's own use, as shewn especially by the description of all the bequests in that purpose as "mementos of me," but that the bequest of a share of residue being to all the nephews and nieces alive at the death of the testatrix was, on the other hand, of the nature of a family provision, to which the conditio applied.

In the present case the claimant Mr Allan raises again the question of the application of the conditio, although this time it has reference to the sum of £750 conditionally destined to the claimant's mother, Mrs Jane Black or Allan, as the sum set free by the death in 1905 without issue of the liferentrix, Miss Christina Black. By the interlocutor under review the Lord Ordinary has decided in effect that, looking to the whole tenor of Mrs Thomson's deed, it is impossible to regard the destination-over to the three members of the Black family, including the £750 to the claimant's mother, as a family provision, and therefore that it has lapsed by her predecease of the testatrix and fallen into residue. Accordingly, he has repelled the first or alternative branch of Mr Allan's claim; he has sustained the second branch; and he has ranked and preferred the claim of the other residuary legatees. In this mode of dealing with the claims I am clearly of opinion that the Lord Ordinary is right.

The former judgment of this Division may not be in terms a decision of this very question, but I am of opinion that it necessarily covers it. For it involves the determination of whether the particular provision founded on is a family provision or not, i.e. whether the testatrix, by the terms of her settlement—for that, according to the case of Bogie's Trs. v. Christie, 1882, 9 R. 453, is the only mode in which a testatrix can assume the parental character—has placed herself in loco parentis towards this particular claimant. She has done so undoubtedly as regards the bequest of residue, and the claimant will get the benefit of what was left by that provision to the late Mrs Allan. But what is there to shew that the destination over to her of a certain proportion of the sum of £2500 primarily intended for another family altogether (if they had come into existence) was intended as a family provision for the Black family? The unequal division of that sum among the three members of the Black family named has much more the appearance of a division inspired by personal favour than the assumption of the parental character. But, apart from that circumstance, I think that the case of Greig v. Malcolm, 1835, 13 S. 607, which rests on the high authority of Lord Corehouse, shews that the conditio proceeds entirely on the presumption that the testator has overlooked or forgotten the contingency of the institute having children, and that where this cannot be said of the settlement in question, the reason for the application of the conditio disappears. Now here the clause of residue, as judicially construed, does provide for the claimant taking the share destined to his mother, and I do not think that he can claim more.

Lord Low concurred.—24*th January* 1908.

Bankruptcy — Notour Bankruptcy — Cessio — Constitution of Notour Bankruptcy by Insolvency Concurring with Expired Charge Upon Decree for Expenses in Sheriff Court—Debtors (Scotland) Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. cap. 34), sects. 4 and 6—Small Debt (Scotland) Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. IV. cap. 70), sects. 1–5—Held That Notour Bankruptcy Was Constituted, the Provisions of Debtors (Scotland) Act 1880 Not Being Limited to Cases in which Imprisonment for Debt is Rendered Incompetent for First Time by Its Provisions—Black v. Watson, 1881, 9 R. 167, Commented On.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire at Kilmarnock.

This was a petition for cessio, in which the pursuer averred that the defender was notour bankrupt in virtue of an expired charge upon an extract decree of the Sheriff Court at Kilmarnock for payment of the sum of £40, 3s. of modified expenses. The pursuer averred that the defender was also her debtor in the principal sums of £12 and £32 decerned for in the said extract decree, and in other sums.

On 5th August 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute (Mackenzie) found that there was prima facie evidence of notour bankruptcy and ordered service, advertisement, etc., of the petition. The Sheriff-Substitute's note was in the following terms:— 1st Div. Smith v. Harvie.

Note.—It is argued on behalf of the debtor that he is not notour bankrupt, in respect that the debt which he was charged to pay was one for expenses in an action at the instance of the petitioner. This argument is founded on the provisions of the 6th section of the Debtors Act 1880, which provides the mode of constituting notour bankruptcy "in any case in which, under the provisions of this Act, imprisonment is rendered incompetent." It is said that this section, under which the petitioner has proceeded to charge, is not applicable in respect that liability for imprisonment in the present circumstances did not exist before the Act of 1880, having been already removed by the Act 5 & 6 Will. IV., cap. 70, sects. 1–5. That Act (now repealed, but in force in 1880) provides that imprisonment shall not be competent in respect of debts less in amount than £8, 6s. 8d., "exclusive of interest and expenses." The present petitioner has only charged on a sum of £40 of expenses in the previous action, and it is therefore held that there is here no principal sum at all on which the charge has expired, but only a sum of expenses; that such a debt did not carry liability for imprisonment before 1880; and that consequently it was not one of those cases in which imprisonment was rendered incompetent by the Act of that year.

I am not satisfied that this argument is a good one. The sum on which the charge proceeded is £40. That consists, no doubt, of expenses decerned for in another action, but it is none the less a debt due by the defender. I do not know of any principle which would prevent the petitioner from doing diligence in respect of that sum as a substantive debt. He has, indeed, a warrant for "all lawful execution," and has to this extent put it in force. If that sum be above £8, 6s. 8d., I do not see how the provisions of the older Act can help the debtor. If the Act of 1880 had not been passed, I apprehend that the debtor here would have been liable to imprisonment for non-payment of this sum of £40. The decree for it might have been issued in the name of an agent, and I do not see that, in that event, the remedy of imprisonment, at his instance, could have been avoided.

If this be so, the Act of 1880 applies, and the charge having expired, I am of opinion that there is prima facie evidence of notour bankruptcy.

I have not been referred to any reported decision on this question, but I may observe that the competency of proceeding to apply for cessio on a decree for expenses alone seems not to have been questioned on the grounds here stated in the case of the Magistrates of Falkirk v. Lundie, 1892, 8 S. L. Review 272, in the Sheriff Court of Stirlingshire.

On 2nd September the Sheriff-Substitute made an order for cessio. The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Brand), who, on 9th November, dismissed the appeal.

The defender appealed to the Court of Session and argued: The defender was charged for payment of expenses, not for payment of a principal sum. The Small Debt (Scotland) Act 1835 abolished imprisonment for a civil debt not exceeding £8, 6s. 8d. exclusive of interest and expenses. If the charge had been for under £8, 6s. 8d. and for £40 of expenses imprisonment would not have been competent after that Act, as the charge would only have been looked upon as one for under £8, 6s. 8d. The charge in this case shewing no principal debt was no better than if it had been for under £8, 6s. 8d. Accordingly this was a case in which imprisonment was not rendered incompetent by the Debtors Act 1880 and to which the provisions of that Act did not apply (Black v. Watson, 1881, 9 R. 167).

1ST DIV.
Smith v. Harvie.

Counsel for the pursuer was not called upon.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The Lord President.—The point which we have to decide is a very short one, namely, whether there was here good evidence of notour bankruptcy on which a petition for cessio might be granted.

Now the evidence of notour bankruptcy on which the petition was granted was an expired charge for a sum of £40, 3s. of modified expenses, which expenses the defender was charged to pay under an extract decree in foro. On comparing the decree with the execution of charge one sees that the sum of £40, 3s. of modified expenses are the modified expenses contained in the decree.

The point raised by the appellant is that the provisions of the 6th section of the Debtors Act 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. cap. 34) do not apply. The heading of that section is "New Mode of constituting Notour Bankruptcy," and the section says: "In any case in which, under the provisions of this Act, imprisonment is rendered incompetent, notour bankruptcy shall be constituted by insolvency concurring with a duly executed charge for payment followed by expiry of the days of charge without payment, or, where a charge is not necessary or not competent, by insolvency concurring with an extracted decree for payment followed by the lapse of the days intervening prior to execution without payment having been made." And then the section proceeds: "Nothing in this section contained shall affect the provisions of sect. 7 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. c. 79)."

The appellant says that the section I have just read is not applicable, because this is not a case in which imprisonment was rendered incompetent, inasmuch as imprisonment was already incompetent at the date of the Act. In other words, he seeks to put a gloss on the expression "rendered incompetent" to the effect that it really means "rendered for the first time incompetent." I do not think the appellant has any right to put such a gloss on these words. There were other ways of constituting notour bankruptcy than imprisonment, and the case of Black v. Watson, 1881, 9 R. 167, cited by the appellant, really points to that, though Mr Lippe's argument at first sight is supported by the form of expression used by the Lord President in his opinion in that case, that the 6th section of the Act of 1880 provides, not for cases in which previous to that Act imprisonment was incompetent, but for cases in which imprisonment was rendered incompetent by force of the provisions of that Act itself. That form of expression, however, really went, I think, beyond the requirements of the case. The point really decided by the case was that the grounds of constituting notour bankruptcy detailed in the Act of 1856 stand on their own basis apart from the Act of 1880. But when imprisonment for debt was abolished practically in toto, it became necessary to provide a new method of constituting notour bankruptcy in those cases in which under the old law imprisonment was required, but it was not necessary to interfere with the other methods of constituting notour bankruptcy, which still stand. Accordingly I do not think the appellant has any right to put on the words of the 6th section the gloss he proposes. The Act applies to all cases in which by its provisions imprisonment is incompetent. The matter can be very well tested by supposing that the respondent had attempted to imprison the appellant. I think in that case he would at once have been met by the Act of 1880.

Apart from that, however, it is necessary that, for the argument of the appellant, he could have been met by the Act of 5 & 6 Will. IV. cap. 70 also, which provides that imprisonment shall not be competent in respect of debts less in amount than £8, 6s. 8d., exclusive of interest and expenses. That is, it says that such debts shall not be swollen by interest and expenses. Now the objection here is that the sum charged for consists solely of expenses. But if we look at the decree here we see that the principal sums decerned for were each of them greater than £8, 6s. 8d. It is no answer for the appellant to say that you can only find that out by looking at the decree. It is for the person objecting to the notour bankruptcy to shew that it was wrongly constituted, on the ground that the principal sum to which the expenses related was a sum less in amount than £8, 6s. 8d. He cannot shew that here, and I am therefore of opinion that on both grounds the appellant has failed.

Lord M'Laren.—It is not surprising that the Bankruptcy Act of 1856 does not make provision for rendering a person notour bankrupt under a decree for expenses of a small debt action, for sequestration under that statute could only proceed on the application of a creditor whose debt amounted to not less than £50, or in the case of more than one creditor to £70 or £100 as the case might be, and it was not to be expected that the expenses of a small debt action would amount to such a sum. Accordingly, when imprisonment for debt was abolished by the Debtors Act of 1880—except in the case of alimentary debts and debts due to the Crown—it became necessary to have some mode of constituting notour bankruptcy in cases where under the older law diligence by imprisonment was competent.

Now the appellant contends that the provisions of the 6th section of the Debtors Act regarding the constitution of notour bankruptcy in such cases do not apply, inasmuch as imprisonment was not, in the present circumstances, rendered incompetent by that enactment. I do not think it is a good objection to the applicability of the Debtors Act to say that it did not for the first time render imprisonment incompetent in cases where at the date of the Act it was already incompetent under the prior Act of 1835. The two Acts are to be read concurrently.

I also agree with your Lordship in thinking that no legal question really arises here, for if you suspend a charge or bring an action to enforce payment of a debt we are always entitled to look at the grounds on which the decree is founded. Doing so here, one sees that the two principal sums in the decree are each of them greater than £8, 6s. 8d., viz. £12 and £35, and it has not been shewn that the sum of £40, 3s. of modified expenses is a sum of the nature described in the Act of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 70.

Lord Kinnear.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The Debtors Act of 1880 provides that, with certain exceptions, "no person shall, after the commencement of this Act, be apprehended or imprisoned on account of any civil debt." There is no question that the appellant is entitled to the benefit of that general enactment. Then it goes on to say, in sect. 6, that where, under the provisions of this Act, imprisonment is rendered incompetent, notour bankruptcy shall be constituted by certain modes of procedure which do not involve imprisonment. I think that provision applies to cases where a debtor might have escaped imprisonment even although the Act of 1880 had not been passed. The intention was to provide a new method for creating notour bankruptcy in place of the method by imprisonment which the Act had abolished; and if the debt is one which under the provisions of the Act cannot be enforced by imprisonment, the condition for bringing about notour bankruptcy in a different way will attach although the debtor may be protected from imprisonment by an earlier statute as well as by the Act of 1856.

I am not satisfied, however, that the appellant's construction of the Act of 1835 (5 & 6 Will IV. cap. 70) is correct. What is there provided for is that imprisonment shall not be competent in respect of debts less in amount than £8, 6s. 8d., "exclusive of interest and expenses." Now, that is not a general enactment that no person is to be imprisoned for a debt consisting merely of interest or expenses. What the statute enacts is that there is to be no imprisonment for any lesser sum than £8, 6s. 8d., and that debts of a smaller amount shall not be brought up to the statutory limit by adding interest or expenses to the principal. If the debt amounted to more than that sum, I see nothing to prevent the creditor recovering it, including interest and expenses, in any way known to the law at that time. I am not satisfied, therefore, that the charge in question for £40, 3s. is within the scope of the Act 5 & 6 Will IV. cap. 70. But that is merely an academical question, for whether the debtor would have been protected by that statute or not, it is certain that he is protected by the Act of 1880; and if that Act prevents his being imprisoned for the debt in question, it follows that he cannot be made notour bankrupt by such imprisonment.—18*th January* 1908.

304. Cuthill v. North British Railway Company and Another.

Reparation — Negligence — Railway — Passenger—Duty of Railway Officials to Passengers—Ticket Collector Unable to Arouse Passenger—Right to Remove Passenger from Carriage Without Ticket Being Produced or Collected — Running Down of Passenger at Station Where He was Taken Out of Train—Station—Dangerous Condition — Exit from Island Platform — Liability of Railway Company—Relevancy.

This was an action of damages at the instance of John Cuthill for the death of his son. The action was brought against the North British Railway Company and the Caledonian Railway Company as joint owners and users of the line of railway known as the Dundee and Arbroath Joint Railway.

The following statement of the circumstances giving rise to the action is taken from the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary:—

"This is an action of damages by a father in respect of the death of his son. The defenders plead that the action is irrelevant.

"The facts averred by the pursuer are briefly as follows. On 28th November 1906 George Cuthill took a ticket from Dundee to Arbroath, and travelled by the 6.5 p.m. train due to arrive at 6.45 p.m. The train was one which stopped at all the stations, including Elliot Junction, where tickets are checked or collected, Arbroath being the terminus of the railway.

Cuthill v. North British Railway Company and Another.

"When the train arrived at Elliot Junction the deceased was fast asleep, and a porter—James Edwards — who entered the carriage for the purpose of collecting his ticket, failed to waken him. James M'Gregor—the guard of the train—next proceeded to try and get the deceased's ticket and partially roused him, but while he was still only half awake and in a dazed condition, M'Gregor—without demanding or waiting for or insisting on his ticket being produced—turned him out of the carriage on to the platform, being under the impression that the dazed and stupid condition of the deceased was due to his being in a state of intoxication. M'Gregor assisted the deceased for a short distance along the platform in the direction of the east end, and he and the porter then left in order to join the train; and the deceased was left alone on the platform.

"The platform is an island one, connected by an overhead bridge to the platform on the north side of the railway line. At the east end, however, the platform slopes gently down to the level of the rails, and a roadway of about the same breadth as the platform is continued on the level for about thirty or forty yards to a level-crossing. The deceased, instead of going by the footbridge, proceeded down this slope; and when about fifteen yards west of the level crossing was suddenly caught or drawn in by a passing train from the north and received such injuries that he died."

The pursuer's averments of fault were as follows:—

The death of the said George Cuthill was caused through the fault and culpable negligence of the defenders or of their employees, for whom they are responsible, and, in particular, of the said James M'Gregor. By virtue of the contract constituted by the issue of said ticket, the defenders undertook towards the deceased the duty of using every reasonable care and precaution for his safety on his journey from Dundee to Arbroath, and this duty they culpably and negligently failed to perform. The defenders had no right to turn any person out of a train in which they had accepted him as a passenger without satisfying themselves that he had ceased to have right to be there. It was the duty of the defenders' officials at Elliot Junction, before attempting to turn the deceased out of the train in which he was a passenger, to have ascertained his destination by demanding and insisting on exhibition of his ticket. This duty they entirely failed to perform. The production of his ticket was not insisted on, and sufficient means were not taken to ascertain if he had one or what was his destination, but he was, as above stated, culpably and wrongfully, and in breach of the duty undertaken by the defenders under the said contract of carriage, turned out of the carriage on to the platform at Elliot Junction. The officials had no reason to suppose that Elliot Junction was his destination, and no information to this effect was given to them. The deceased's ticket from Dundee to Arbroath, and also his bicycle ticket, were found in the ticket pocket of his coat after his death. The former had been checked at Dundee or some other station on the line. Had the officials at Elliot Junction performed their duty by insisting on production of his ticket from the deceased, they would at once have ascertained that he was in the proper train, and was entitled to proceed to Arbroath. They would necessarily have ascertained this if they had followed in the case of the deceased the course adopted by them with respect to the other passengers in the train, whose tickets were all checked or collected on the occasion in question at Elliot Junction. They, however, through culpable negligence, departed from the usual course in dealing with the deceased. Further, it was M'Gregor's duty, in the circumstances, after having turned deceased out of the train, to have placed him in a position of safety, or to have handed him over to another official. Further, the defenders' station at Elliot Junction is badly constructed, and is unsafe and dangerous for passengers alighting at night. In particular, there is no adequate means of enabling such passengers to find the authorised mode of exit, and no precautions exist for warning persons against taking the course followed by the deceased of proceeding straight along the platform towards the level-crossing. In the absence of such precautions the said course was that which in the circumstances naturally appeared to the deceased to be a recognised mode of exit from the station. Said course was rendered dangerous by the proximity of the rails at the part where the platform sloped down to the level of the rails, and by the tendency of passing trains to catch or draw in a person walking on said part of the platform. The deceased was caught or drawn in by a passing train in this way. The danger was aggravated by the imperfect lighting of the station. The conduct of the defenders' officials in turning the deceased out of the train into such a station without giving him full and accurate instructions for his guidance, and in leaving him alone on the platform when they regarded him as being intoxicated, was an act of gross and culpable negligence on their part, committed in breach of the undertaking entered into with the deceased when he purchased his ticket. Had the deceased been allowed to proceed to his destination—Arbroath—his death would not have occurred.

The following authorities were referred to in the argument on the relevancy of the action: Bridges v. North of London Railway Co., 1874, L.R. 7 E. & I. Ap. 213; Foy v. Brighton Railway Co., 1865, 18 C.B. (N.S.) 225; Cockle v. *L. and S.E. The Lord Ordinary disallowed the issue proposed by the pursuer, and assoilzied the defenders.

Lord Salvesen [after narrating the facts as quoted above]. The fault averred against the defenders is, in the first instance, based on the action of James M'Gregor in turning the deceased out of the train without ascertaining his destination. It is said that M'Gregor ought to have insisted on the production of the deceased's ticket before allowing the train to be started; and if so, of course the ticket, which was in the ticket-pocket of the man's coat, would have shewn that his destination was Arbroath, and he would never have been taken out at Elliot Junction. On the pursuer's statement I am not satisfied that M'Gregor committed any breach of duty. George Cuthill was admittedly in a dazed and stupid condition even after he had been roused by two of the defenders' employees successively; and it is pretty clear that the fact that he had had some beer and whisky in Perth and Dundee prior to entering the train must have contributed to his condition at the time, although it may have been mainly due to his having been up all the previous night. At all events, there is no suggestion that M'Gregor might not quite reasonably form the impression that the deceased's condition was due to intoxication. Now, under these circumstances, the duty of a ticket collector is a somewhat delicate one. He can obviously not proceed to search the man's pockets in order to ascertain whether he has a ticket on his person; and unless the ticket is produced or the passenger explains what his destination is, he cannot tell whether he has already passed or reached his destination, or has not completed his journey. It is the duty of the passenger to exhibit his ticket when the ticket collector demands it; and one can scarcely lay down any absolute rule that in the case of a person appearing to be intoxicated efforts are to be continued for a given length of time to rouse him and to get him to exhibit his ticket at the cost of delaying the train. The failure of the deceased to exhibit his ticket was due to his own condition at the time; and although that condition may have been innocently caused, that merely goes to shew that it was his misfortune and not his fault that caused his failure to comply with the regulations. Even, however, if I were of opinion that the pursuer had relevantly averred that his son was wrongfully removed from the carriage, I do not think that that would have advanced the pursuer's case, for this was not the proximate cause of the accident which afterwards occurred.

The next ground of fault is that it was M'Gregor's duty to have placed the deceased in a position of safety, or to have handed him over to another official. In the case of M'Cormack, 6 F. 362, it was held that a railway company is not liable in damages for failing to see an intoxicated person safely off the platform at which he arrives. It was said that that case was distinguishable from the present in respect that there the passenger had arrived at his destination, but I cannot see how that per se can make any difference in principle. The pursuer argued that if the deceased man had been brought to Arbroath, with which he was acquainted, he would no doubt have readily found his way off the station platform to a place of safety. It might have proved so in the present case, but for all M'Gregor knew the deceased might equally have been a stranger to Arbroath, or might have been familiar with Elliot Junction and not with Arbroath Station. If there is no obligation on the part of a railway company to see to the safety of a drunk man, who was quite prostrate and helpless when he was assisted on to the platform, the duty can be no higher in the case of one who, although averred to have been in a dazed and stupid condition, was evidently quite able to walk a considerable distance before he met with the accident.

The defenders are also charged with fault in respect it is said that the station at Elliot Junction is badly constructed, and is unsafe and dangerous for passengers arriving at night; in particular, that there is no adequate means of enabling such passengers to find the authorised mode of exit; and no precautions exist for warning persons against taking the course followed by the deceased. In the absence of such directions it is said that this course was one which in the circumstances would naturally appear to the deceased to be the recognised mode of exit from the station. I think it very likely that all these things may be predicated of a person in the dazed and stupid condition which the pursuer's son appears to have been in. But on this part of the case I must treat him as being able to take care of himself; and on this assumption I see no ground for imputing blame to the defenders. It appears from Cond. 6 that the platform proper was alone lighted with oil lamps and that there were no lamps on the sloping portion which led down to the rails. Such a sloping portion is a very common feature of most railway platforms, and is presumed to be for the convenience of the railway servants and not for use by the public. Any person who goes down such a platform in the dark without invitation does so, in my opinion, at his own risk. He ought to know that in going down to the level of the rails and placing himself so close to them as to enable a passing train to catch him he was exposing himself to great danger; and he cannot justly blame the Company, who had provided a safe means of getting off the platform which he could easily have found out if he had exercised reasonable care. There is no averment that any other person had ever made the same mistake as the deceased man; and I cannot think that any sober person would have imagined that he was on the right road out of the railway station when he found himself walking in the dark in close proximity to the railway line. It is said that there were no notices posted up indicating the exit; but a man who is not in a condition to see and appreciate the use of an overhead footbridge would scarcely pay any attention to a notice board. I have accordingly reached the conclusion that the pursuer's averments do not disclose a case of actionable negligence against the defenders, and that they fall to be assoilzied.—7th January 1908.

SHIPPING LAW—SALVAGE—REMUNERATION—VESSELS INSURED IN SAME COMPANY—OBLIGATION IN POLICY ON ALL VESSELS INSURED TO ASSIST EACH OTHER WHEN REQUIRED—EXCLUSION OF CLAIM FOR REMUNERATION FOR SALVAGE—HELD THAT CLAIM NOT EXCLUDED BY PRE-EXISTING OBLIGATION IN INSURANCE POLICY.

The Opinion of the Lord Ordinary sufficiently reports this case.

In addition to the authorities mentioned in the Lord Ordinary's Note the following were referred to: Kennedy on Civil Salvage, pages 20, 28 and 84; The "Davaar," 1907, 15 S.L.T. 29; Bell's Principles, sect. 444; James on Salvage, p. 29; The "Collier," 1866, L.R. 1 A. & E. 83.

Lord Salvesen.—The pursuers in this action are the owners, officers and crew of the steam trawler "Clan Grant"; and they seek to recover a sum of £500 in respect of salvage services rendered to the defenders' vessel "Strathclyde." It is not disputed that the facts averred disclose a relevant case for compensation as for salvage services; and the defenders on record state that they are willing to pay reasonable compensation to the officers and crew of the "Clan Grant." They plead, however, [in their first plea in law], that the owners' claim is excluded, because they were under a pre-existing obligation to render the services in question to the "Strathclyde"; and it was this matter alone which was the subject of discussion in the Procedure Roll.

The pre-existing obligation in question is derived from the rules of The Aberdeen Mutual Steamship and Trawlers Insurance Company, with which Company both the "Clan Grant" and the "Strathclyde" were insured. By Art. 3 of the Articles of Association—(No. 13 of process)—"Every person who insures, on behalf of himself or any other person, any ship . . . . in pursuance of the regulations hereinafter contained shall, as from the date of the commencement of such insurance, be deemed to have become a member of the Company"; and by Art. 9, "The classes into which the members are divided, and the rights and obligations of the members of each class, shall be further defined by rules; and every member shall be deemed to accept and agree to be bound by the rules for the time being in force relating to the class of which he is a member." Art. 30 of the rules in question is apparently binding upon all members belonging to class 1 and class 2, and is in the following terms: "Every ship insured in this Company shall give assistance to any steamer broken down, or in distress, which is insured either in this Company, or in The Total Loss Mutual Steam Insurance Company (Sunderland), or The United Kingdom Steam Tug and Trawlers Insurance and Indemnity Association (Shields), or any other association with which an agreement has or may be entered into." Appealing to this rule the defenders say that the owners of the "Clan Grant" were under a general obligation to render salvage services to any vessel in distress insured in the same Company; and that the claim for salvage services, as distinguished from a claim for actual loss incurred in rendering the services, is accordingly barred.

The authority relied on in support of this proposition was a decision of Lord Stowell in the case of the "Zephyr," 1827, 2 Hagg. 43; and undoubtedly if the rubric is to be read as laying down an absolute rule on the subject apart from the special circumstances in which the question arose, it supports the defenders' contention. In that case two vessels had agreed to sail as consorts, and to render each other mutual assistance. In the course of the voyage one of the vessels rendered certain services to the other by standing by for several days; but these services were held in fact, as I read the decision, not to be such as would found a salvage claim. This was obviously a sufficient ground for dismissing the action. But the learned judge prefaced his judgment with some observations, in which he indicated that the claim would in any event have been barred by the mutual agreement to which I have referred. The case, however, was a very special one, and does not, in my opinion, support the general proposition that, where the owners of two vessels have agreed to give assistance to each other, if broken down or in distress, no claim for remuneration, as for salvage, can ever arise. In the case of the "Zephyr" it must be held to have been implied in the agreement that such services as were actually rendered were to be mutually given by the vessels concerned without remuneration; and it is material to a proper understanding of the case that the Court held that the services which were the subject of the action were not salvage services at all.

The defenders also referred to the case of the

"Harriot," 1842, 1 W. Rob. 439; the "Marie Jane," 1850, 14 Jur. 857; and the "Sappho," 1871, L.R. 3 P.C. 690. In the last of these cases it was decided that when salvage services are performed by one ship to another belonging to the same owners, the master and crew of the salving ship are entitled to salvage remuneration, although no claim will lie at the instance of the owners. The decision, therefore, does not touch the present case; and it does not appear to me that the observations made by Lord Justice Mellish, in delivering the judgment of the Court, have any bearing upon the question at issue here. Nor does there appear to me to be any analogy between the case of seamen who render services connected with the saving of their own ship and the case of shipowners who are not otherwise connected than that both their vessels are insured in the same Company, rendering services to each other's vessels. In my opinion, therefore, there is no law to the effect that a pre-existing obligation constituted by an agreement between two shipowners to render salvage services to each other's ship operates in all cases as a bar to a claim for compensation. Such an agreement really does not add very much to the moral obligation which every ship is under to give assistance, where possible, to another ship that is in distress.

I do not affirm that shipowners may not, by agreement, bar themselves from any claim for salvage remuneration in respect of services rendered to each other's property. Such an agreement might conceivably be objected to as being contrary to public policy. But assuming its validity, I think it must be clear from the agreement that the rendering of assistance to a vessel in distress shall not found a claim for remuneration. The right to obtain salvage remuneration is one very much favoured in the law; and, therefore, cannot be excluded unless by express words, or by very clear implication from the language used. Rule 30 contains no express exclusion of such a claim; and it does not appear to me that there is any implication at all that it should be excluded. If the question had arisen with a vessel belonging to The Total Loss Mutual Steamship Insurance Company of Sunderland, I find from the rules of that association (Rule 92) that compensation would have been claimable, although the amount would require to be fixed by the committees of the associations in which the vessels were insured, and not by the ordinary tribunals of the country. The defenders here say that they are willing to pay the owners of the "Clan Grant" any outlay they have incurred, or any damage they have sustained in connection with the services rendered, and that it has been the practice of the insurance company to meet such claims. If their argument, however, is good for anything, I think they must maintain that even such a claim is barred by Rule 30. It is possible to read into Rule 30 an implication that no compensation shall be allowed for assistance given in terms of that rule; but I cannot understand on what principle compensation should be limited to those cases where loss or outlay has been incurred in rendering services. A similar question was mooted, although not decided, in the case of the "Margery" [1902], P. 157; but it was not necessary to arrive at any decision on the point now at issue, because the owners of the salving vessel were not parties to the suit, but were content with the award of compensation which the Committee of the Sunderland Association had made in their favour. Without, therefore, expressing any opinion as to the validity of a bargain between the members of a mutual assurance company that their vessels should give mutual assistance on the footing of not being remunerated for their services, however meritorious, I reach the conclusion that the present claim is not barred because there is nothing in the agreement to exclude the right of the salvor to receive the remuneration for his services which the law gives him. I shall therefore repel the first plea in law for the defenders, and allow parties a proof of their respective averments.—8th January 1908.

The pursuers were owners of the s.s. "Baron Fairlie," and they sued the defenders for payment of freight and charges due in respect of the carriage and delivery of a certain cargo to the defenders. The following statement of the facts is taken from the Opinion of the Lord Ordinary:

"The pursuers are managing owners of the 'Baron Fairlie'; and the question relates to certain charges which were incurred in connection with the discharge of a cargo which she loaded at Bombay and delivered at Leith on 5th February 1907. The cargo consisted of 52,424 bags of cotton-seed; 18,280 bags of bone-meal, and 727 bags of Kurdee cake. There were various receivers — the defenders being amongst the largest. Twenty-seven bills of lading, covering the three commodities above mentioned, were granted by the master; and there were nineteen different marks applicable to the goods.

"The bills of lading contained a clause that the goods were to be delivered 'from the ship's tackles (where the ship's responsibility shall cease) at the aforesaid Port of Leith'; and the defenders say that on the arrival of the vessel they requested the pursuers to deliver their goods to them from the ship's tackles, but that the pursuers declined to do so, and insisted on landing the whole cargo unweighed into shed. The pursuers substantially admit this averment, explaining that it is 'the custom of all ships discharging at the Port of Leith mixed or general cargoes with a variety of distinguishing marks to a number of receivers to land the cargo into shed; and thereafter to assort the several parcels according to the various marks'; and they say that the method of discharging actually adopted — which was the only feasible and practicable method in the circumstances—was in accordance with this custom. They say, further, that the additional charges so incurred fall to be borne by the consignees according to the custom of the Port of Leith. They ask for a proof of these averments."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia:

"1. The pursuers' averments as to the custom of the Port of Leith being irrelevant, the same should not be remitted to probation."

The Lord Ordinary repelled this plea in law, and allowed a proof.

Lord Salvesen [after narrating the facts as quoted above].—The defenders do not admit the custom; but contend that, if it exists, it is not binding upon them, on the ground that it is inconsistent with the bills of lading under which they took delivery. In particular, they refer to the clause with reference to delivery from the ship's tackles.

Had the question here raised been new, I think it would have been by no means an easy one; but I cannot distinguish the facts of the present case from those which occurred in Marzetti v. Smith, 1884, 49 L.T. (N.S.) 580. The decision of the Court of Appeal is one of high authority, because of the eminence of the judges who took part in it; and it has never been questioned in England during the comparatively long period that has since elapsed. Even, therefore, if I saw occasion to differ from the reasoning of the learned judges, I should be very slow to disregard the decision, as I was asked by the defenders' counsel to do. As matters stand, I see no reason whatever for questioning the soundness of the decision; and, if so, it practically settles the present case in favour of the pursuers. It was there held that in the case of a mixed cargo, carried under bills of lading with a clause as to delivery identical with the one with which I am dealing, the shipowner was not bound to discharge the cargo, as the consignees requested him, direct into lighters; but was entitled, at their expense, to have it put upon the quay and assorted there. It was suggested that the charges, for which the consignees were held liable in Marzetti's case, were the charges of the Dock Company in whose sheds the goods were landed, while the charges that are here sought to be recovered are those incurred by the ship in landing and assorting the goods. As the Dock Company, however, undertook the landing of the goods in Marzetti's case, I think the services for which they charged were substantially the same—at all events in part—as those for which the pursuers now claim to be reimbursed. The case, at all events, settles that the obligation to deliver from the ship's tackles is not inconsistent with the right of the shipowner—where a local custom to that effect exists—to land and shed the goods so that they may be assorted with more leisure than is compatible with the rapid discharge of a ship carrying a mixed cargo, and at present I must assume that the pursuers are in a position to prove the custom averred.

A separate point was raised with regard to the expense incurred to the consignees in weighing the cargo. According to the sample bills of lading produced, the freight was payable in Leith on net weight delivered; and, apart from custom, the cost of weighing would probably have fallen upon the ship. This was so decided in the case of Coulthurst v. Sweet, 1860, L.R. 1 C.P. 649. Willes, J., in giving his opinion, said: "In the absence of any custom to govern the matter, the person who wants to ascertain the quantity must incur the trouble and expense of weighing. It is by no means an uncommon thing to have goods weighed on board, but I never heard of the merchant being called upon to pay for it." The shipowner there had attempted to prove a custom under which the consignee was bound to pay for the expense of weighing, but the jury negatived the existence of any such custom. In the present case the point does not, in my opinion, really arise. The defenders do not claim from the pursuers the ordinary expense of weighing the cargo on board ship, but only the extra expense of weighing caused by the ship's landing the cargo instead of delivering it from the ship's tackles. The liability for this extra expense seems to me to depend on exactly the same considerations as the liability for the landing and shed charges with which I have already dealt. I shall accordingly repel the first plea in law for the defenders, and allow parties a proof of their averments.—8th January 1908.

307. Cousland v. The Magistrates and Councillors of the Burgh of Kinghorn.

Reparation — Damages — Trespass—Liability of Proprietors of Golf Course for Damage Caused by Trespass on Adjoining Lands by Persons Playing on Course—Natural and Probable Result—Relevancy—Scot's Trustees v. Moss, 1889, 17 R. 32, Followed.

The pursuer in this case was tenant of land near Kinghorn known as Kilcruick Land, extending to about fourteen acres. The defenders were the proprietors of a golf course known as the "Kinghorn Golf Course," which adjoined Kilcruick land on the south, west, and north, and over which the members of two golf clubs possessed the privilege of being allowed to play on payment of a small sum for each member. Any member of the public was also entitled to play on the course on payment of a small charge. Between the golf course and Kilcruick land a march fence had been erected, consisting of iron standards 4 feet high with six ordinary fencing wires, and not barbed wire, thereon, the bottom wire being 6 inches from the ground, the other wires being about 7, 7¼, 8, 8½, and 9¼ inches respectively apart. The pursuer averred that this fence was not a suitable obstruction between the golf course and Kilcruick land, so as to prevent golf balls being driven thereon by parties playing on the former; that it was quite insufficient to prevent persons going across it on to Kilcruick land to recover golf balls driven thereon; that it should have been constructed much higher at several places and wire netting put thereon; or some other suitable means to prevent golf balls getting over it or through it on to Kilcruick land should have been adopted by the defenders to prevent persons playing golf on said golf course going into pursuer's fields in search of golf balls and destroying his crops; that the defenders were in fault in not putting up wire netting on the whole fence, or taking some reasonable precaution to prevent damage being done to the pursuer's crops. The pursuer, after narrating the position of various teeing grounds, for the purpose of shewing the great likelihood of golf balls falling into the pursuer's fields, averred specific instances where the golfers, or the greater proportion of them, who were playing on said golf course, had accidentally driven balls on to said lands, and had gone over the march fence to recover them, with the result that pursuer's wheat, tares, turnips, etc., were trampled down, and rendered entirely useless. The defenders should or ought to have foreseen that, from the position of the teeing grounds, greens, and holes placed on said golf course, near to said march fence, a very large number of golf balls would fall on to Kilcruick land, and that in such an event it was natural that the persons to whom such golf balls belonged and their companions should go over into pursuer's fields to search for them, and thereby cause damage to the pursuer's crops. It was also averred that the probability of such damage was actually brought to the notice of the defenders on various occasions. The defenders pleaded that the pursuer's averments were irrelevant. The argument appears sufficiently from the Sheriff-Substitute's note.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Hay Shennan), by interlocutor dated 30th December 1907, repelled said plea and allowed a proof.

He added the following note:—

Note.—Put shortly, the pursuer's case is that the defenders used land abutting on his farm for the purpose of a golf course; that they have so laid out the course that players are apt to drive balls into pursuer's land; that players persist in coming in search of these balls into his fields, and destroy his crops; that defenders, though warned of the probability of this, failed to take precautions either by effective fencing or by altering the course so as to prevent such damage; and that accordingly the defenders are liable to make good this damage which was the natural and probable result of their actings. The pursuer bases his case in law on the decision in Scot's Trs. v. Moss, 6 Nov. 1889, 17 R. 32.

The defenders plead that this is not a relevant claim of damages. In the first place they plead that there is no relevant averment of any act of negligence or breach of duty on their part. Now, it is to be observed that the defenders' use of the ground is not the ordinary agricultural use which a neighbour must expect and accept. The defenders here invite all and sundry to come, under certain conditions, to it for the recreation of golf, and they are bound to consider their duty in these unusual circumstances under the brocard sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas. They are bound, in the first place, to endeavour to lay out the green so that balls are unlikely to be driven into pursuer's land. If, in spite of such endeavours, such a risk is created, they are bound to do all in their power to prevent players trespassing on pursuer's land in search of balls. In my opinion the pursuer has relevantly averred that the defenders have failed in these two duties, after they had been fully warned of the probable consequence of such failure. I think the pursuer has brought his case within the principle of the decision in Scot's Trs. v. Moss.

"But then," say the defenders, "we cannot be held liable for the use which players make of the golf course. They are our tenants, and are themselves responsible for their actings. We forbid them to trespass on your land, and we can do no more" Articles 5, 6 and 7 of pursuer's Condescendence do not disclose a case of tenancy. The defenders charge two clubs so much a year for the privilege of allowing their members to play, and they also permit individuals to play by the day or week or otherwise in return for certain payments. But the defenders retain the exclusive management of the course and appoint, pay and control a greenkeeper and two assistants for this purpose. This is quite a different case from that of landlord and tenant, where the tenant obtains exclusive possession. Here the defenders themselves are the occupants, just in the same way as the lessee of a theatre.

It is argued further, on the authority of the case of Stirling Crawford v. Clyde Navigation Trs., 22nd January 1881, 8 R. 826, that the pursuer's proper remedy is not against the defenders, but against the individuals who trespass on his land. In that case, however, I think the real ground of judgment was that the pursuer's object in the action was to prevent the public from using an alleged right of way, and that this question could not be tried with the Clyde Trust, who were not asserting a right of way, but were merely ferrying over the individuals who asserted that right. Here the pursuer sets forth, in Condescendence 12, reasons as cogent as those averred in Scot's Trs. v. Moss, for not proceeding against the actual wrongdoers.

The defenders also complain that the pursuer gives no specification of the names of the trespassers or the dates of the trespass. For such a case as the pursuer sets forth I do not think this minute specification can reasonably be demanded.

The plea of contributory negligence cannot, I think, be satisfactorily dealt with at this stage. Pursuer's averments do not disclose enough to found such a plea.—30*th December* 1907.

Stated Case.

This was an appeal by stated case from a decision of the Sheriff-Substitute at Elgin (Webster) finding a charge against the respondent under the Sea Fisheries Acts and the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Acts not proven.

The stated case was as follows:—

This is a cause at the instance of the appellant against the respondent, charging the respondent with having contravened the Sea Fisheries Acts and the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Acts, in so far as he the respondent did, on (Saturday) 23rd March 1907, at a part of the Moray Firth thirteen and one-third miles or thereby south-east by south a half south from Port Gower, Sutherlandshire, and within a line drawn from Duncansby Head in Caithness to Rattray Point in Aberdeenshire, he being at the time a deck hand on board of the steam trawler "Zenobia," S.R. 11 of Stavanger, Norway, and not in the service or possessing the written authority of the Fishery Board of Scotland, use or assist in using an otter trawl for taking sea fish, contrary to bye-law number ten, made by the Fishery Board for Scotland under the powers conferred on the said Board by the Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Amendment Act 1885, The Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act 1889 (particularly section 7 (1) thereof), and the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act 1890, dated said bye-law at Edinburgh on 27th September 1892, confirmed by Her late Majesty's Secretary for Scotland on 22nd November 1892, and published in the Edinburgh Gazette on 25th November 1892, as amended by bye-law number fourteen, made by the said Fishery Board for Scotland under the powers conferred on the said Board by the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act 1889, section 7 (1), dated said bye-law at Edinburgh on 17th April 1896, confirmed by Her late Majesty's Secretary for Scotland on 6th August 1896, and published in the Edinburgh Gazette on 18th August 1896.

The cause was tried in the Elgin Sheriff Court before Sheriff-Substitute James Gray Webster on 11th July 1907.

It was proved that the said steam trawler "Zenobia" was on the date libelled engaged in trawling with an otter trawl for taking sea fish at the place mentioned in the complaint. It was further proved that the respondent was on that occasion not in a position of authority for the purpose of directing the navigation, management, or fishing operations of the "Zenobia." It was also proved that he did not direct, nor did he assist in directing, such navigation, management, or fishing operations. It was further proved that he occupied a subordinate position as a member of the crew of the "Zenobia," and as such member of the crew, acting under orders of his superior officers, he assisted in the trawling operation proved. It was not proved that he knew or must of necessity have known of the position of the said vessel on the occasion specified. The charge against the respondent was found not proven.

The Question of Law for the opinion of the Court was:—

Whether, on finding the facts stated proved, the Sheriff-Substitute was justified in finding the charge against the respondent not proven?

Argued for the Appellant: If the complaint was relevant—and that was admitted—the Sheriff-Substitute was bound to convict, because, on the facts stated in the case, all the counts were proved. The grounds of the Sheriff-Substitute's decision were not stated, nor were questions put to the Court with reference to these grounds. But they were presumably (1) that the accused was in a subordinate position and not in charge of the vessel; and (2) that he did not know that the vessel was at the time within the prohibited area. As to the first of these, the being in a subordinate position was no defence unless the accused was acting under the compulsion of his superior. The mere plea of subjection was no defence. That was the rule both in Scotland and England (Hume on Crimes, I. 47, 50, 53; Alison's Criminal Law, I. 672; Bell's Notes to Hume 7, 8; H.M. Advocate v. Woods, 1839, 2 Swin. 323; H.M. Advocate v. Boyd, 1842, 1 Broun 7; H.M. Advocate v. Henderson & Lawson, 1842, 1 Broun 360; Fraser, Master and Servant, 305; Russell on Crimes, I. 146). And this was a rule equally applicable to common law crimes and statutory offences. In particular, the rule was not modified by the Fisheries Statutes. In the earliest statutes the penalty was limited to the master (Sea Fisheries Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. cap. 45), sect. 63; Sea Fisheries Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. cap. 21), sect. 20 (1)); but the later Acts made the offence a general one, applicable to every person (Sea Fisheries (Scotland) Amendment Act 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. cap. 70), sect. 4; Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. cap. 23), sects. 6, 7; Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act Amendment Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. cap. 10), sect. 3). And in particular that was so in the case of the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. cap. 42), sects. 10 (4), (5), under which the present prosecution was brought. Accordingly the Fishery Board, in promulgating their bye-laws, had distinguished between offences for which the master was alone liable and those for which every person was liable. Bye-laws made in 1886 and April 1887 applied only to the master, while the bye-law of July 1890 applied to every person. As to the accused's knowledge of the locus in which the vessel was at the time, that must be presumed in the absence of any finding to the contrary. It was for the accused to rebut that presumption (Macdonald on Crimes, p. 1). Mens rea was libelled by implication, and the accused had offered no proof that he was not aware that an offence was being committed. If ignorance was a defence he ought to have pleaded it and proved it. But mere ignorance was not a defence to the charge, although it might be a good plea in mitigation of penalty. Neither the statute nor the bye-laws required that the act should be committed "knowingly." The findings of the Sheriff-Substitute no doubt did not include a statement that the accused contravened the statute "knowingly," but that was unnecessary. It would have been irrelevant to find that he did know he was within the prohibited area. Ignorance that he was committing an offence was no answer by a person charged with it (The King v. Marsh, 1824, 2 B. & C. 717; The Queen v. Bishop, 1880, 5 Q.B.D. 259; Reg. v. Prince, 1875, L.R. 2 C.C.R. 154). Bye-law No. 10 had already been before this Court in Wilson v. Rust, 1896, 2 Adam 114, and Mortensen v. Peters, 1906, 5 Adam 121.

Argued for Respondent: It was no part of the respondent's case to say that the complaint was irrelevant, or that this was an offence for which he could in no circumstances be convicted, and which only the master of the vessel could commit. It was similar to the offence of smuggling, which might be committed by a master of a vessel or by any person; and the cases in which the penalty was confined to the master were distinguished in the statutes from those in which any person was liable (Customs Consolidation Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. cap. 36), sects. 172, 179; Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. cap. 12), sect. 12). But it was necessary for the appellant to shew that, on the findings stated by the Sheriff-Substitute, he was bound to convict, and that no inference was possible but one of guilt. The vital points of the findings were (1) that the accused was not in authority, but was acting under the orders of a superior; and (2) that there was no finding as to the state of the accused's knowledge. From the statements in the case the Sheriff-Substitute was entitled to infer that the accused could not help acting as he had done (Rothwell v. Hutchison, 1886, 13 R. 463). The Sheriff-Substitute was entitled to take all the circumstances into consideration, such as that this took place in the Moray Firth when a ship was often within the prohibited area when out of sight of land, and that a member of the crew could not be expected to know the position of the vessel every time the trawl was shot. It was not enough, in order to secure a conviction, to shew that the vessel was within the prohibited area. The offence libelled was "using or assisting to use," and that, presumably, was the offence of the master. The charge here was really of being art and part with the master. If that was so the prosecutor ought to shew that the accused and the master were acting together with unity of purpose. That was not done, and the Sheriff-Substitute was therefore entitled to find the charge not proven. This was the first case of a prosecution for a contravention of these bye-laws brought against anyone except a master or a dummy seaman who was really the master of a vessel, and the decision of the Sheriff-Substitute was right. The King v. Marsh, cit. supra, really shewed that ignorance would have been an excuse if it had been proved. As to The Queen v. Bishop, cit. supra, it was very easy to say whether the person was a lunatic or not, and therefore it was natural to make a person who kept lunatics responsible, for he must have been held to have known. Reg. v. Prince, cit. supra, was a case of malum in se, not malum prohibitum, and knowledge was presumable in the one case while it was not in the other.

The Court answered the question in this case in the negative, and sustained the appeal.

Lord M'Laren.—This is an appeal on a stated case from a judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute at Elgin in a complaint under the Fisheries Act, charging the defender with a contravention of a bye-law of the Fishery Board for Scotland duly made and confirmed, whereby the defender is on conviction liable, in terms of the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Act 1895, sect. 10, to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds, or imprisonment for a period not exceeding sixty days.

The Sheriff-Substitute found the case against the defender not proven, and the Procurator-Fiscal has appealed from this sentence to the Court.

The facts are very clearly and succinctly stated in the case, and all the facts found being essential, it is only necessary that I should read the paragraph in which these are set out.

"It was proved that the said steam trawler 'Zenobia' was on the date libelled engaged in trawling with an otter trawl for taking sea fish at the place mentioned in the complaint. It was further proved that the respondent was on that occasion not in a position of authority for the purpose of directing the navigation, management, or fishing operations of the 'Zenobia.' It was also proved that he did not direct, nor did he assist in directing, such navigation, management, or fishing operations. It was further proved that he occupied a subordinate position as a member of the crew of the 'Zenobia,' and as such member of the crew, acting under orders of his superior officers, he assisted in the trawling operation proved. It was not proved that he knew or must of necessity have known of the position of the said vessel on the occasion specified."

It was not seriously disputed that a seaman, or fisherman serving as a seaman on board a fishing-vessel, would be liable to conviction if he were proved to have assisted in the operation of trawling within a prohibited area, knowing that the vessel was within the locality in which trawling was illegal.

But on behalf of the defender and respondent it was contended that such knowledge could not be imputed to an ordinary seaman, who has not the means of determining the ship's position at sea, and who would not in the ordinary conduct of the business of navigating the ship be informed by the master as to the ship's position. As a matter of impression I think it is very likely that an ordinary seaman, when out of sight of land, would not know the exact position of the ship, and in this case it is found not proved that he knew, or must of necessity have known, what was the ship's position.

On the other hand, the respondent, although entitled to be a witness in his own case, did not come forward to excuse himself by professing ignorance of the ship's position.

While, in the case of a charge of crime under the common law, guilty knowledge or guilty intention is of the essence of the crime, yet there are many cases where such knowledge or intent is presumed from the facts in the absence of a special defence.

In the case of a breach of a statutory regulation, it is not a universal rule that intention to contravene the statute must be established. That may depend on the policy of the statute, and also on the language of the statute. If the enactment is in form an absolute prohibition against doing a certain thing, it seems to me that in general the prosecutor may be held to have established his case if he proves the commission of the prohibited act by the person accused, unless the accused is able to satisfy the Court that in the special circumstances of the case he is excusable.

In this case there are four statutes dealing with contravention of trawling regulations; but it is only necessary to refer particularly to the latest of these, the Sea Fisheries Regulation Act 1895, sect. 10, subsect. (4), being the Act which prescribes the penalties for infringement of these regulations. Now the enactment begins with the words, "Any person who uses any such method of fishing in contravention of any such bye-law, shall be liable, on conviction," to the fine or period of imprisonment there prescribed. This is in the nature of a universal prohibition, and there is not a suggestion in the words of the statute that knowledge of the locality is necessary to constitute the offence. If it were necessary to a conviction that the prosecutor should prove knowledge on the part of the contravener that he was fishing in prohibited waters, it would be very difficult to get a conviction against any one, and I cannot see that there is any hardship in the case, because it is the duty of those who engage in the fishing industry to inform themselves, and to take care that they do not fish where they are not entitled to fish. In the case of the master of a trawling vessel this is clear enough, and it may be that the ends of justice would be satisfied if the penalty were only enforceable against the master.

But evidently that was not the opinion of the Legislature, because the penalty for contravention is directed against all persons who shall use such method of fishing in contravention of a bye-law of the Fishery Board. I am accordingly of opinion that the respondent was not entitled to a judgment of not proven on the facts stated. I need hardly add that where a person in the position of the respondent comes forward, and is able to satisfy the Sheriff that he was excusably ignorant of the position of the fishing vessel, or that he acted under compulsion, and after protest, his case will always receive indulgent consideration; but if he says nothing, and fishing within the prohibited area is proved against him, I think that the judge or magistrate has no discretion, and that a conviction must necessarily follow.

Lord Kinnear.—I come to the same conclusion. The question put to us in this special case is not very happily stated, because it appears on the face of it to be a question of fact, but when it is read in connection with the statement of facts given by the learned Sheriff, there is no real difficulty in ascertaining what is the point of law which it is intended to submit for our decision. I do not read over again the statement of facts which Lord M'Laren has already read, but I observe upon it that it is clear that the Sheriff held it to be proved that the respondent had done the very thing which is described by the words of the statute as constituting an offence to be punished. He used an otter trawl for taking sea-fish within the prohibited area. But the learned Sheriff follows his recital of what was proved by saying that it was not proved that the respondent knew, or must of necessity have known, of the position of the said vessel on the occasion specified, and then he asks as matter of law whether, on finding the facts stated to be proved, the Sheriff-Substitute was justified in finding the charge not proven. Now, if on the evidence adduced before him the learned Sheriff had said that he had found as matter of fact that the charge was not proved, this Court could not have reviewed his judgment. But I think he makes it quite clear that the judgment he pronounced was not a mere verdict on matter of fact—because he considered this question to be a question of law—and that he proceeded upon a rule of law which he supposed to be binding on him, and in respect of that rule of law he held that the offence was not proved. The question is, What is disclosed in the case as the rule of law which the learned Sheriff accepted? In the statement of the facts there are no considerations tending to establish any defence except the finding that the respondent was not in a position of authority for the purpose of directing navigation or the management of the fishing operations of the ship, and that it was proved that he did not in fact direct or assist in directing the said navigation or management of fishing operations. It is not, I think, suggested, and I do not think the learned Sheriff intended to decide, that the mere fact of the respondent being a deck hand and not a master mariner exempted him from the operation of the clause, and that could hardly have been maintained because, as Lord M'Laren has pointed out, the statute or byelaw which has statutory effect provides that every person, without any exception whatever, who is found doing a certain act shall be guilty of an offence. But when you take these findings in combination with what the Sheriff said was not proved, viz., that the man knew or must of necessity have known, the position of the vessel, I think the question of law, which is meant to be raised, becomes clear enough. The direction which I think the learned Sheriff must have given to himself is that as matter of law it is not enough for the prosecutor to prove the acts which constitute the offence unless he goes on, in the absence of evidence for the alleged offender, to prove by affirmative evidence that the accused knew in fact that he was doing the thing prohibited, that is, that he knew in fact that he was within the protected area. The appellant's counsel maintained that this was wrong upon two distinct grounds. In the first place, it was maintained by the learned Solicitor-General that, inasmuch as the enactment prohibits a certain thing being done without using the word "knowingly" or any equivalent word, it is not necessary that knowledge should be proved, because the offence is committed when the act is done, however ignorant the alleged offender may be of the act which constitutes the offence, or however innocent of any unlawful intention; and that is based upon what is said to be a general rule that, in the construction of statutes and statutory offences, if the word "knowingly" is not used, evidence of ignorance affords no defence. I do not think it necessary for the purpose of this decision to express any definite opinion upon that question, and therefore I shall only say that, as at present advised, I cannot myself assent to it. It was supported by no authority from our own books. The English cases upon which the learned Solicitor-General relied, with the exception of one, namely, The King v. Marsh, 1824, 2 Barn. and Cress. 717, to which I shall afterwards refer, appear to me altogether inapplicable because they were constructions of particular statutes passed for a very different purpose, and expressed in very different terms from that which we are considering. But I do not think it necessary to say more as to the existence in our law of any general absolute rule of the kind stated by the Solicitor-General, because I think the second point taken by the appellant is well founded. The prosecutor having proved that a thing was done which the statute in express terms prohibited, and done by the accused on a particular occasion, the respondent chose to leave the case just where the prosecutor had left it, and it is now maintained on his behalf that he was rightly acquitted, because the prosecutor failed to prove that he knew in fact what the position of the vessel was at the time. I assume, for the purpose of considering that question, that it may be a good defence that the accused was ignorant of the position of the ship—excusably ignorant of the position of the ship. But it does not follow that the prosecutor can be required to do more than prove the existence of the facts which the statute describes as constituting the offence. The prosecutor has done all that could be required of him when he has proved the facts, and it lies upon the respondent to rebut the inference of guilt which arises upon these facts, if he can, by a proof of innocent ignorance, or of any other lawful excuse. The contention on the other side really puts it on the prosecutor to prove a negative, because the position of the case when the prosecutor has closed his proof is really this, that the facts constituting the offence as defined in the statute having been proved or admitted, the accused can still maintain his plea of not guilty on the ground that what he did—which, after all, was malum prohibitum and not malum in se—was done with lawful excuse. I am assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that innocent ignorance is a lawful excuse. But then it lies on him to prove that, not upon the prosecutor to disprove it by anticipation, which I apprehend in most cases would be impossible for him to do. On the case as stated, it appears that the question, whether in fact the accused had a lawful excuse, was not decided by the Sheriff, and it cannot be decided by us, because no such question is stated in the case. The Sheriff finds certain facts, which may possibly be regarded as items of evidence, tending to shew that the respondent was not really aware of the position of the ship; but although they tend in that direction, if we were deciding this as a question of fact, I should still say they do not go very far, because it may well be that a sailor, knowing his ground, may have perfectly good reasons for knowing that he is still within the Moray Firth, although he is not directing the navigation of the vessel, and is not capable of taking observations for the purpose of defining it. He may know where he sailed from. He may know how long a time has elapsed since he left the land, or he may even be in sight of land. The question whether or not he knew where his ship was, must always be a question of fact; and the circumstances may vary so indefinitely that it is quite impossible to lay down, as I think the learned Sheriff did, that the particular circumstances of this case are of themselves sufficient to prove or disprove that question. It may be, again, that although a man may not have known exactly where his ship was, he may have had good reason to believe that its master had set out upon an expedition for trawling within the prohibited area; and if so, a man who takes his chance of being found within the imaginary line that divides the prohibited area from the open area of the ocean, might be precluded from maintaining innocent ignorance. But, then, I think that all that relates to a question of fact, which is not before us, although I have referred to the difficulty of proving the facts. I do not desire to express any real opinion as upon fact at all. I think the learned Sheriff has not done so. What he has done is to say, as matter of law, that the prosecutor has failed to prove what it is incumbent upon him to prove, viz. the absence of a particular defence which might have been brought forward by a man who was acting in innocent ignorance of the facts. I think that is an unsound view of the law. I think the prosecutor has done all that was required of him when he has proved his facts, and that it then lies upon the offender, if he has a defence, to bring it forward. I referred in passing to the case of The King v. Marsh, 1824, 2 Barn. and Cress. 717. I return to it only for the purpose of saying that, while I think the decisions of the English Criminal Courts must always be used in this Court with very considerable diffidence, I have read the whole series of decisions cited to us by the Solicitor-General as carefully as I can, and I think it satisfactory to find that the decision proposed by your Lordship, in which I agree, is entirely in accordance with the law stated by the learned judges in the case of The King v. Marsh. That is a case in which there was an information and conviction against a carrier for having game in his possession, contrary to the statute, 5 Anne, cap. 14, sect. 2, which declares "that any carrier having game in his possession is guilty of an offence, unless it be sent by a qualified person." The only facts proved were that the defendant was a carrier, and that he had game in his waggon on the road. The conviction was appealed on the ground that there was no evidence that the defender knew of the presence of the game in his waggon or that the person who sent it was not a qualified person. The learned judges held that there was a sufficient prima facie case, and that it was not rebutted by sufficient proof on the part of the defender of the ignorance suggested on his behalf. I think the judgments quite plainly imply that if the defendant could have satisfied the jury of his ignorance there would have been a good defence, although the word "knowingly" was not in the statute; and it followed that in the view of the learned judges the effect of the word "knowingly" being introduced into such an Act of Parliament might be to alter the burden of proof, but not to alter any ordinary rule of law that enables a man to plead ignorance as a lawful excuse. It had been shown that game was in his possession as a carrier; it lay upon him to rebut that evidence; and, as he had not done so, the conviction was sustained. I think the present respondent stands exactly in the same position, not having endeavoured to rebut the inference from the facts.

Lord M'Laren intimated that Lord Pearson, who was present at the hearing but absent at the advising, concurred.—17*th January* 1908.

309. Gilmour v. Craig.

I. REPARATION — WRONGOUS USE OF DILIGENCE — SEQUESTRATION — TENDER OF PAYMENT OF RENT BY CHEQUE BY TENANT—CHEQUE RETURNED BY LANDLORD — SAME CHEQUE TENDERED BY TENANT'S AGENT ON AFTERNOON OF TERM DAY—IMMEDIATE SEQUESTRATION —ISSUE ALLOWED.

II. LANDLORD AND TENANT—RENT—PAYMENT —OPINION (PER LORD SALVESEN) THAT RENT WAS NOT IN ARREAR IF NOT PAID BY NOON ON TERM DAY BUT MIGHT BE DULY PAID AT ANY TIME ON THAT DAY.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

This was an action of damages for wrongful sequestration in circumstances which were set out in the condescendence as follows:—

COND. 1. The pursuer is a grocer and wine merchant in Hamilton, and carries on his business in a shop belonging to the defender, of which he is the tenant on a twelve years' lease from Whitsunday 1904. . . The rent of the shop and store is £70 per annum, from which falls to be deducted by agreement with the defender an annual sum of £30 for the cost of altering part of the premises. The nett rent is thus £40 per annum, payable half-yearly at Whitsunday and Martinmas in equal moieties. . . .

COND. 2. On 11th November 1907, when a half-year's rent of £20 was due by the pursuer, the defender sent his shopman, John Barr, to the pursuer at 24 Cadzow Street. . . . The said John Barr asked pursuer for the rent. . . . 1st Dr Gilmour Craig.

COND. 3. . . . The pursuer, about 2.30 p.m. on said 11th November, sent his foreman, John MacLachlan, to the defender with a cheque on the Clydesdale Bank, Hamilton, for £20, the full half-year's rent, which the defender, although knowing that said cheque would be duly honoured, maliciously declined to accept, and John MacLachlan returned with it to the pursuer. . . . On the defender's refusal to accept his cheque, the pursuer, about 2.50 p.m., sent the cheque in a letter to his law agents, requesting them to deal with the matter.

COND. 4. The pursuer's law agents accordingly sent the following letter, along with the cheque for £20 in favour of the defender, by hand to the defender, to whom it was delivered about 3.15 p.m.:—

"Hamilton, 11th November 1907.

"Mr W. G. Craig,
"County Hotel.

"Dear Sir,—Our client, Mr Thomas H. Gilmour, has instructed us to send you the enclosed cheque for £20 in settlement of the half-year's rent due at this term. Please send us receipt.

"We are to explain that the same is made under reservation of Mr Gilmour's claims against you for—(1) fee as witness on your behalf at the Lands Valuation Court—he claims £1, 1s., and application for payment was made to your agents, but they have taken no notice—and (2) price of goods damaged by water from the roof of the saloon, of which you had due notice, and have failed to attend to the repair. We will send detailed claim within the next few days.—Yours truly,

"KEITH & PATRICK."

COND. 5. The defender on the same day, and while said cheque was in his possession, wrongously, maliciously, and without any reason, hastily caused to be prepared and presented to the Sheriff of Lanarkshire at Hamilton a summons of sequestration for rent under the Debts Recovery Act 1867, and obtained the usual warrant to inventory, appraise, and sequestrate the pursuer's goods in the premises, which was executed by a sheriff's officer within the pursuer's premises at 4.10 p.m. . . .

The defender pleaded that the action was irrelevant, and should be dismissed.

The Lord Ordinary allowed an issue in the usual form.

Lord Salvesen.—This is an action of damages for alleged wrongful sequestration. The material facts as averred by the pursuer are, that on 11th November 1907 when a half-year's rent of £20 was due by him to the defender he sent his foreman to the defender about 2.30 with a cheque on the Clydesdale Bank, Hamilton, for £20, which the defender declined to accept; that at 3.15 p.m. his agent again sent the cheque to the defender along with the letter quoted in Condescendence 4, and that the defender, while the cheque was still in his possession, caused to be prepared and presented a summons for sequestration for rent under the Debts Recovery Act 1867 on which he obtained the usual warrant to inventory and sequestrate the pursuer's goods in his premises, and that this warrant was executed at 4.10 p.m. About 4.40 p.m. the defender called on the pursuer's law agent with the letter before referred to and said the cheque was of no use to him, and on being asked to cash the cheque and withdraw the summons he declined to do so or to receive the £20 due in cash except on the condition of the pursuer paying the expenses of the summons of sequestration. The cheque itself was only returned on the following day by the defender's law agents.

The main ground of action is that the pursuer was not in arrear of his rent until the expiry of the 11th of November, and that accordingly the warrant for sequestration, obtained on the representation that he had refused or delayed to pay the rent due on that day, was wrongful. The defender, on the other hand, maintained that the rent ought at all events to have been paid by 12 noon on the 11th November, and that on the pursuer's failure to pay by that hour the defender was within his rights in causing the diligence in question to be executed.

The defender's counsel did not quote any direct authority to the effect that a tenant who delays to pay his rent after 12 noon on the term day is in arrear. He supported his proposition, however, by two arguments which at all events reflect credit on his ingenuity. In the first place, he founded on the Removal Terms (Scotland) Act of 1886, sect. 4, which enacts that "where the term for a tenant's entry to or removal from a house shall be one or other of the terms of Whitsunday or Martinmas, the tenant shall, in the absence of express stipulation to the contrary, enter to or remove from the said house at noon on the 28th day of May if the term be Whitsunday, or at noon on the 28th day of November if the term be Martinmas." The bearing of this enactment on the question here raised is not obvious; but the defender's counsel maintained that as the legal and conventional terms are theoretically the same, it must now be held that payment of the rent must be made by 12 noon on the 11th of November, just as the tenant is bound to remove by 12 noon on the 28th when his lease expires at Martinmas. I confess that I do not see why any such consequence should follow. The Removal Terms Act 1886 proceeded on the assumption that the legal and conventional terms were not the same, and left the term for payment of rent entirely unaffected. If therefore before the enactment was passed the tenant had the whole of the legal term day on which to make payment, I see no reason to infer that this enactment, which was entirely for the convenience of tenants inter se, should alter the relation of the tenant to his landlord.

The second argument was based on a series of decisions dealing with a chapter of the common law which in consequence of the Apportionment Act has now become of only antiquarian interest. In the case of Lady Brunton, 1642, M. 15,885, it was held that the executors of a liferenter who had survived to the afternoon of the term of Martinmas were entitled to the rents of heritage due on that date in preference to the heir; and in the later case of Paterson v. Smith, 1704, M. 15,902, a similar decision was pronounced in the case of a liferentrix who had died on the forenoon of Martinmas day. Both of these decisions proceeded on the maxim dies inceptus habetur pro completo; and they were used by the defender to shew that rent payable at Martinmas becomes due immediately after midnight of the 10th of November, or at all events by custom at noon on the 11th. These decisions are, however, in no way inconsistent with the notion that a tenant has the whole of the term day in which to make payment; as seems to have been expressly held in England in the case of Dibble v. Bowater, 1853, 2 E. and B. 564. They are also consistent with the old case of Wright v. Cunningham, 1802, M. 15,919, to which I was referred by the pursuer's counsel, in which it was held that the days Whitsunday and Martinmas respectively conclude and are comprehended in the preceding terms and are not the first days of a new period.

I am accordingly prepared to hold that payment of rent is just like any other payment falling to be made on a specified day, and as to which the debtor is not in default if payment be made at any time during the day; although, on the other hand, the debt is due in the sense of being demandable by the creditor when the day arrives. This view involves that the defender was premature in obtaining, or at all events in executing, a warrant to sequestrate the pursuer's effects; and that the execution of that warrant was wrongful. It follows that as such a warrant is obtained periculo petentis the defender is liable in any damages thereby caused, and that the pursuer is entitled to the issue which he proposes.

The defender reclaimed and argued: The defender was entitled to apply for sequestration if the pursuer refused to pay his rent when it was due. That was the position of matters described by the pursuer in his condescendence. He was asked for his rent when it was due; he tendered a cheque; the cheque was refused; and in place of tendering cash, which was the only good tender, he sent back by his agents the same cheque. This was tantamount to a refusal to pay.

Counsel for the pursuer were not called on.

The Court adhered.

The Lord President.—I do not think there is the slightest doubt this is a question for the jury. I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Lord M'Laren.—I am of the same opinion. I think nothing can be pointed to on the record which shews that payment might not have been made in the evening of the day in question in the event of the defender having given definite information that he would not accept a cheque. In that case we do not know that the requisite cash might not have been forthcoming. If the pursuer did not have the requisite cash in his pocket he might have got it from his agent.

Lord Kinnear. — I agree. The question whether the sequestration was wrongful is very much the same as whether the defender had reasonable grounds for saying in the circumstances that payment had not been duly made. —29th January 1908.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, and Lords M'Laren, Stormonth-Darling, Low, Pearson, Ardwall and Dundas.)

310. Donnelly v. William Baird & Company Limited.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT 1897 (60 & 61 VICT. CAP. 37), SCH. I. (12)—REFUSAL OF WORKMAN TO UNDERGO SURGICAL OPERATION—INCAPACITY DUE TO INJURED HAND—OPERATION RECOMMENDED BY THREE OUT OF FIVE DOCTORS WHO EXAMINED WORKMAN—OPERATION A SIMPLE OR MINOR OPERATION, NOT ATTENDED WITH APPRECIABLE RISK OR SERIOUS PAIN, AND LIKELY TO RESTORE TO WORKMAN USE OF INJURED HAND—FINDING BY SHERIFF THAT CONTINUED INCAPACITY FAIRLY ATTRIBUTABLE TO WANT OF OPERATION—CIRCUMSTANCES WHERE HELD (DISS. LORDS STORMONTH-DARLING AND PEARSON) THAT WORKMAN HAD DISENTITLED HIMSELF TO COMPENSATION BY REFUSAL TO UNDERGO OPERATION.

Stated Case under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

This was an appeal by way of stated case from a judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute (Mitchell) at Stirling in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37).

The case stated:—

This is an arbitration under said Act, in which the Sheriff of Stirling, Dumbarton and Clackmannan at Stirling was asked to review and end or diminish a weekly payment of 7s., of which the appellant was in receipt in virtue of an agreement entered into by the appellant and the respondents on 24th May 1904.

On 9th January 1906 the then Sheriff-Substitute found that the appellant was still totally incapacitated, as the result of injuries sustained by him while in the employment of the respondents, and entitled to the weekly payment of 7s. in virtue of the agreement before mentioned. On 9th April 1907 a minute was lodged by the respondents again asking the Court to review and end or diminish the weekly payment before mentioned, and on 1st June 1907 I found "(1) that the respondent (the present appellant), on or about 28th January 1903, lost the use of his left hand, in consequence of injuries sustained by him while in the employment of the petitioners (the present respondents), and that respondent still continues to be without the use of said hand; (2) that by agreement between petitioners and respondent, entered into on or about 24th May 1904, respondent became entitled to compensation at the rate of seven shillings weekly during incapacity, and that payment thereof has been made to him up to the present time; (3) that respondent's loss of use of his left hand was and is caused by the removal from said hand of the third finger and of the top of the thumb, the existence of pain in the palm at or near the knuckle from which said finger was removed, and the curvature into the palm and permanent fixing in that position of the second finger; (4) that the respondent has been examined by five doctors, three of whom were asked to examine by petitioners, and that the said three doctors recommend that the crooked second finger should be removed at the knuckle, or the joint next the knuckle, and that a nodule in the palm of said hand, which they believe to be the source or centre of the pain complained of, should also be removed; (5) that said proposed operations are simple or minor operations, not attended with appreciable risk or serious pain, and operations likely to restore to respondent in large measure, or altogether, use of his said hand for the purpose of his former work, viz., 'drawing,' that is pushing, guiding or pulling hutches in a coal pit, or for manual work of some kind in or about a pit, or elsewhere, and to enable him to earn the same wages as before the accident, or wages to some substantial amount; (6) that respondent is of good constitution and in sound general health; (7) that he has not undergone and refuses to undergo such operations; (8) that his continued incapacity to use his left hand and any continued pain in his left palm are fairly attributable to the want of such operations; (9) that in these circumstances respondent is not entitled to refuse, and ought to undergo said operations," and I continued the cause till 1st July 1907, that the respondent (now appellant) might intimate whether he was then willing to submit himself to said operations.

On 25th July 1907, I, having further considered the cause, and in respect of respondent's (now appellant's) declinature to undergo the proposed operations, found that the compensation payable to him should then end, and granted order accordingly.

The Question of Law for the opinion of the Court was:

Whether the appellant by his refusal to undergo the operations has forfeited his right to receive further compensation?

The case was heard on 22nd October 1907 before the judges of the Second Division, and was ordered to be re-heard before a Court of Seven Judges.

Argued for Appellant: The Act did not make it a condition of receiving compensation that the workman should submit to any medical or surgical treatment which the employer might propose (Dowds v. John Bennie & Son, 1902, 5 F. 268, per Lord Adam; Rothwell v. Davies, 1903, 19 T.L.R. 423). The workman was entitled to compensation if he were suffering from the effects of the accident, but not if he were suffering from his own unreasonable conduct. Here it was not found that the appellant's refusal was unreasonable; the examination was recommended only by three out of the five doctors examined; and it was not certain that it would effect a cure. The case must be taken on the footing that there was a diversity of medical opinion. In these circumstances the appellant's refusal was not unreasonable, and he was entitled to compensation. The present case was a fortiori of Rothwell v. Davies (cit.) and Sweeney v. Pumpherston Oil Co. Ltd., 1903, 5 F. 972. Dowds v. John Bennie & Son (cit.) and Anderson v. William Baird & Co. Ltd., 1903, 5 F.

Court of Seven Judges.

Donnelly v. William Baird & Co. Ltd.

373, were distinguishable. In any view the compensation ought not to be ended, but should be reduced to the amount which would have been payable if the operation had taken place.

Argued for Respondents: No doubt surgical operations were not mentioned in the Act, but compensation was due in respect only of incapacity arising from the accident, and not in respect of incapacity resulting from the workman's unreasonable conduct. Here the operations proposed were minor operations, and were not attended with risk or serious pain. In these circumstances the refusal was unreasonable, and compensation was not due. There was no distinction in principle between a surgical operation and medical treatment. Anderson v. William Baird & Co. Ltd. (cit.) and Dowds v. John Bennie & Son (cit.) were a fortiori of the present. Rothwell v. Davies (cit.) and Sweeney v. Pumpherston Oil Co. Ltd. (cit.) were distinguishable. It was not competent to reduce the compensation to what would have been payable if the operation had taken place. There was no machinery whereby the amount payable could be determined. The appellant by his refusal had made it impossible to ascertain what his condition would have been (Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd. v. Sinclair, 1907, S.C. 3).

The Court (diss. Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Pearson) found in answer to the question of law that the appellant by refusing to undergo the operation proposed had precluded himself from any right to receive further compensation, and answered the question of law in the affirmative.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The facts necessary for the consideration of this case are (1) that by the accident suffered by the appellant his left hand was disabled; (2) that by agreement between him and the employers the respondent received compensation at the rate of 7s. weekly; (3) that he has suffered permanent loss of the third finger and part of the thumb; (4) that he still has pain at the stump of the removed finger; (5) that his second finger is fixed in a curved position into the palm. In this state of matters the respondents requested three medical men to examine the hand, and that they and two other medical men examined the appellant. There is no statement in the case what was the opinion of these latter two medical men, the appellant not having produced their reports to the Sheriff. The three doctors employed by the respondents reported that in their opinion the second finger or part of it should be removed, and a nodule in the palm from which they believed the pain proceeded should be removed. They reported that the operations were of a simple and minor character, involving no appreciable risk or serious pain, and that what was proposed was likely to restore in large measure the use of the hand for work such as the appellant was accustomed to fulfil, or other pit manual work, enabling him to earn full or at least substantial wages, he being of sound constitution and good health.

I have thought it well in this short form to state the facts which have to be dealt with, for the question of law for decision in this case turns upon the view to be taken of them—Do they, or do they not, justify the position taken up by the appellant, which is, "I decline to submit to any operation, and demand compensation in respect that my present condition is one of disablement"?

The question whether a refusal to submit to skilled treatment for the restoration, whole or partial, of capacity for work is a reasonable or unreasonable refusal is necessarily a question of degree. For it cannot be maintained that no matter what be the severity of the operation recommended, or how great soever the risk to life or general health of the treatment may be, the workman loses right to compensation unless he brings himself to undergo the treatment and to take the risk. I think the sound view on this matter is well expressed by Lord Adam in the case of Dowds v. Bennie & Son, when he laid it down that a workman who has been incapacitated is not bound in every case to submit to any medical or surgical treatment that is proposed, under penalty, if he refuses, of forfeiture of his right to a weekly payment; e.g., in the case where a serious surgical operation is proposed with more or less probability of a successful cure.

On the other hand, I hold it to be the duty of an injured workman to submit to such treatment, medical or surgical, as involves no serious risk or suffering, such an operation as a man of ordinarily manly character would undergo for his own good, in a case where no question of compensation due by another existed. In preparing this opinion, I find that I have used almost the terms which are to be found in the case of Anderson v. Baird. These two cases which I have referred to seem to me to practically rule this case. The appellant refuses to follow the course reported on by the medical men. He has brought no counter-evidence for the purpose of inducing the Sheriff to hold that the evidence led should not lead to findings in fact in accordance with that evidence; the Sheriff has found in fact in terms of that evidence, and has in consequence held in law to the same effect as was held in the cases of Dowds and Anderson. In that I am of opinion that he was right, and would therefore propose that the question in the case should be answered in the affirmative, except that I think the word "forfeited" is an unfortunate one to use. A better form would be that used in Anderson's case, that the appellant "is precluded from further insisting on his claim for weekly payment."

Lord M'Laren.—I cannot say that I have found this case free from difficulty, but the difficulty is not so much in the finding a principle of decision consistent with the statutory provisions, as in applying the principle to the facts of the case before us.

There is, of course, no question of compelling the party to submit to an operation. The question is whether a party who declines to undergo what would be described by experts as a reasonable and safe operation is to be considered as a sufferer from the effect of an injury received in the course of his employment, or whether his suffering and consequent inability to work at his trade ought not to be attributed to his voluntary action in declining to avail himself of reasonable surgical treatment.

In order to test the principle of decision, I will suppose a more simple case. A workman whose trade requires the perfect use of both hands—a watchmaker or an instrument-maker, for example—has the misfortune to break one of the bones of a finger, and from want of immediate assistance, or it may be from neglect, the bone does not unite in the proper way. The hand is disabled, but he is advised that by breaking the bone at the old fracture and resetting it, the use of his hand will be completely restored. I am supposing a case where the operation is not attended with risk to health or unusual suffering, and where the recovery of the use of the hand is reasonably clear. If in such a case the sufferer, either from defect of moral courage, or because he is content with a disabled hand and is willing to live on the pittance which he is recovering under the Compensation Act, refuses to be operated on, I should have no difficulty in holding that his continued inability to work at his trade was the result of his refusal of remedial treatment, and that he was not entitled to further compensation.

Passing to the other extreme, it is easy to figure a case of internal injury where an operation if successful would restore the sufferer to health, but where the surgeon was bound to admit that the operation was attended with danger. In such a case it would be generally admitted that there was not only a legal, but a moral right of election on the part of the injured person; and if he preferred to remain in his disabled condition rather than incur the risk of more serious disablement or death, it could not be said that his inaction disentitled him to further compensation.

In view of the great diversity of cases raising this question, I can see no general principle except this, that if the operation is not attended with danger to life or health, or extraordinary suffering, and if according to the best medical or surgical opinion the operation offers a reasonable prospect of restoration, or relief from the incapacity from which the workman is suffering, then he must either submit to the operation or release his employers from the obligation to maintain him. In other words, the statutory obligation of the employer to give maintenance during the period of incapacity resulting from an accident is subject to the implied condition that the workman shall avail himself of such reasonable remedial measures as are within his power. I think that this statement is in accordance with all the decisions that have been given in similar cases, but in whatever way the condition is defined, each case must be considered as a circumstantial case depending on the nature of the proposed operation and its probable results. I do not think that in principle any distinction can be taken between medical treatment and surgical treatment as regards the duty of the patient to co-operate with his professional advisers towards his own restoration to health and working capacity. The distinction only begins when an operation is proposed which may be attended with danger, or the results of which are not in the region of reasonable and probable success.

My difficulty in this case is that Donnelly not being a skilled workman, but a drawer of hutches in a coal-pit, I can imagine that the man might honestly believe that no operation on his hand would suffice to remove the sensitiveness to pressure that at present makes him unfit for hard work. This, however, is a point which could not be overlooked by the doctors who have been consulted as to his case, and they have given their opinion that the crooked finger and the nodule in the palm of the hand should be removed, and that the operation is likely "to restore to him in large measure, or altogether, the use of his hand for the purpose of his former work," viz. drawing hutches.

In such cases a prudent and reasonable man will be guided by medical opinion rather than by his own fears; and, without saying that the case is absolutely clear, my view is that by refusing to submit to the operation the party has disentitled himself to further payments. Any difficulty I have felt in considering the case is almost entirely removed by the consideration that nothing but good can come to this young man from the operation. Even if his hand should continue to be too tender to be useful to him in drawing hutches, it will, according to medical opinion, be greatly improved, and so the man will be in a more favourable position for doing work in some other occupation where the use of the left hand is not so necessary as in the work of a drawer.

I am therefore for affirming the Sheriff-Substitute's determination.

The Lord Justice-Clerk intimated that Lord Low concurred with the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord M'Laren.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I concur with my brother Lord Pearson. His view, and that, as I understand, of the rest of your Lordships, is that the question of law which the Sheriff has formulated is not quite accurately expressed, and that the proper result of his findings would not be to "forfeit" the appellant's right to receive further compensation. But, even taking the case as fairly raising the question which probably the Sheriff intended to raise, viz. whether the workman, by his refusal to undergo the particular surgical operation recommended by the three doctors who examined him at the request of the employers, has disentitled himself from claiming further payments by way of compensation, I agree with Lord Pearson that the Sheriff's ninth finding is really a finding in law, and therefore not a finding on which the Sheriff is final. As I read the cases which were cited both in England and Scotland, I think it has never been decided, at all events in explicit terms, that a workman's refusal to undergo a surgical operation, even of a minor kind, can be visited with a practical denial of his right to further compensation.

Court of Seven Judges.

Donnelly v. William Baird & Co. Ltd.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.

In Rothwell v. Davies, 1903 19 Times L.R. 423, the English Court of Appeal negatived such a result. Dowds v. Bennie & Son, 1902, 5 F. 268, which was decided by the First Division, was a case where the injury was comparatively slight and the treatment proposed simple and common (principally passive movements and massage), and therefore it was treated as one where the present condition of the limb was truly due to the injured man's own fault and neglect. Yet Lord Adam, in delivering the leading judgment, said that cases might easily be figured of "a more or less serious operation" being proposed where it would be out of the question to say that the workman was bound to submit to it. Even in Anderson's case, 1903, 5 F. 373, refusal to undergo a "simple operation" as disentitling the workman to a continuance of substantial compensation was (diss. Lord Young) avoided only by allowing the matter to be kept open by awarding him a nominal sum. Lastly, in Sweeney (1903, 5 F. 972) refusal of the workman to undergo a surgical operation which had been recommended by the employer's doctor, as disentitling him to further compensation, was distinctly negatived in deference to a contrary opinion by a surgeon of eminence.

Therefore I think I am well founded in saying that there is not a single case in either England or Scotland laying down in explicit terms the rule for which the employer here contends, even with regard to a minor surgical operation, however probable the success of it may be. But, as Lord Pearson and I are in a minority, it is unnecessary to consider what the practical consequences would be of giving effect to our view.

Lord Pearson [read by the Lord Justice-Clerk].—I agree in the view that the question of law which the Sheriff has formulated is not accurately expressed, and that the proper result of his findings is not to "forfeit" the appellant's right to receive further compensation. But I desire to add that on the question which I think the Sheriff intended to raise, and which was fully argued to us, my opinion is entirely in favour of the appellant. I am clearly of opinion that the Sheriff's first seven findings in fact do not warrant the eighth finding, which is, that "the appellant's continued incapacity to use his left hand, and any continued pain in his left palm, are fairly attributable to the want of such operations." It appears to me that the principles laid down in the cases of Dowds and of Sweeney lead to the opposite conclusion, and that the Sheriff's ninth finding, that in these circumstances the appellant "is not entitled to refuse, and ought to undergo said operations"—which is really a finding in law—is not maintainable. I cannot hold the appellant to be unreasonable in his refusal to submit to the amputation of a finger. I admit, however, the difficulty of giving effect to this view, having regard to the terms of the eighth finding, which is a finding in fact, and is not before us for review; and which when fairly construed imports that the conduct of the appellant in refusing to submit to the operation is so unreasonable as to disentitle him to further compensation.

Lord Ardwall.—I am of opinion that the question of law submitted in this case should be answered in the affirmative, with the alteration suggested by your Lordship in the chair.

The compensation at the rate of 7s. a week which has hitherto been received by the appellant under an agreement entered into in terms of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, has been paid and received under the provisions contained in the first schedule of the said Act, sect. 1 (b), which apply to cases where "total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury." It is stated by the Sheriff-Substitute that certain simple and safe operations would remove the appellant's incapacity to work, and in the eighth finding it is stated that "the appellant's continued incapacity to use his left hand and knee, and any continued pain in his left palm, are fairly attributable to the want of such operations." Accepting this as a fact, it appears that now the appellant's incapacity for work does not result from the injury which he received in 1903, but from his refusal to submit to the said operations, and this being so, compensation is no longer payable in respect of incapacity for work resulting from an injury, and the payment thereof ought to come to an end.

But the appellant pleads that he is not bound to submit to the operations in question, and it was contended by his counsel that no person is bound to submit to an operation in such circumstances as the present against his will, however simple such operations may be, and that if a person in the position of the appellant chooses to take his stand on the ground that he objects to an operation on account of the pain or risk involved in it, he is the sole judge and ought not to be forced by the decision of a court of law into the alternative of either submitting to an operation or forfeiting the compensation which otherwise he is by law entitled to. This raises a question of general importance, but one which has not now to be considered for the first time.

Three cases involving this question have been already under consideration of the Court—Dowds v. Bennie & Son, 5 F. 268; Anderson v. Baird & Co., 5 F. 373; and Sweeney v. Pumpherston Oil Company, 5 F. 972. I think the result of these decisions is that no general rule can be laid down, but that each case must be determined upon its own circumstances, the questions for consideration in each case, generally speaking, being (1) Whether the operation is a simple or a difficult one? (2) Whether it is attended with serious risk? (3) Whether if performed it will attain the end in view by diminishing or putting an end to the injured person's incapacity for work? (4) Whether it is or is not an operation involving much pain, and if it does involve much pain, whether there is serious risk to be encountered by the use of anæsthetics during the operation? and (5) What is the opinion of medical men as to the advisability of the operation?

Now in the present case the Sheriff-Substitute has found (1) the "proposed operations are simple or minor operations"; (2) that they are "not attended with appreciable risk"; (3) that they are "likely to restore to respondent in large measure or altogether use of his said hand for the performance of his former work"; (4) that the proposed operations are "not attended with . . . . serious pain," and that the respondent is of good constitution and in sound general health, from which I infer that there would be no danger to him from the use of anæsthetics; (5) that "the respondent has been examined by five doctors, that three of these doctors recommend that the operations should be performed." Nothing is said with regard to the other two doctors who examined the respondent at his own instance, and I therefore conclude that it must be taken upon the facts as stated that these doctors either did not express any opinion, or that if they did their opinion was that they could not state any objections to the operations proposed.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute has come to a sound conclusion on the facts of the case that the appellant has shewn no reasonable cause why he should not undergo the operations in question, and that his refusal to do so disentitles him to a continuance of the compensation which he has hitherto received.

Court of Seven Judges.

Donnelly v. William Baird & Co. Ltd.

Lord Dundas.

Lord Dundas.—I agree with the majority of your Lordships. The real point at issue in each case of this kind is, I apprehend, whether the workman's incapacity arises from the accident which befel him, or only from his own subsequent unreasonable conduct. If the latter is the fact, the workman must take the consequences of his conduct. I think we must assume, from what is set forth in this stated case, that there was no conflict of opinion among the medical men consulted on both sides, as to the nature or the probable effect of the proposed operations. Now, the Sheriff-Substitute has found, among other things, that these "are simple or minor operations, not attended with appreciable risk or serious pain, and operations likely to restore to respondent in large measure, or altogether, use of his said hand for the purpose of his former work," which was of a very simple nature; that the respondent "is of good constitution and in sound general health"; and that "his continued incapacity to use his left hand, and any continued pain in his left palm, are fairly attributable to the want of such operations." In this state of matters it appears to me that a reasonable man would submit to these operations, and that, as the respondent deliberately declines to do so, his conduct is unreasonable, and his compensation must be ended. I agree therefore with the conclusion at which the Sheriff-Substitute has arrived; but I agree with your Lordships in thinking that the question stated for our determination is not, as it stands, in proper form.—1*st February* 1908.

II. Succession — Trust Disposition and Settlement—Construction—Gift of Fee to Daughters Qualified by Direction to Pay Revenue of Provisions to Daughters While Unmarried and on their Marriage to Secure Provisions in Trust by Antenuptial Settlement on Daughters and their Children—Daughters Married at Date of Will Without Marriage Contract—Circumstances where Held That Direction to Settle on Daughters and their Issue Applied to Daughters Already Married.

Special Case.

John Fyfe, granite merchant, Aberdeen, died on 18th July 1906, leaving a trust disposition and settlement whereby he conveyed his whole estate to trustees.

The seventh purpose of the trust disposition and settlement provided:

I direct my trustees, as soon as they may find convenient, to realise and divide the residue of my estate, heritable or moveable, real or personal . . . among my children in such proportions as I shall by any writing appoint, and failing such appointment equally among them, share and share alike. . . . Declaring . . . . that the term of the vesting of the foregoing provisions of residue shall as regards daughters be on their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events shall happen first: As regards said provisions to my daughters, I hereby appoint that the capital of the same shall not be paid to them (except as aftermentioned), but that my trustees shall pay to my daughters the revenue of their respective provisions while they remain unmarried; and on their marriage my trustees shall see to it that the said provisions, both revenue and capital, be secured in trust in their own names, or in the names of other trustees by antenuptial settlement upon my daughters and their children to be born, in usual form, the husbands of my said daughters (if my said daughters shall so desire) to have a liferent only postponed to my said daughters' liferent: Further, notwithstanding what is before written, my trustees shall have power on the marriage of such daughter to pay to her, or to pay to any daughter already married, at my death, for her own absolute use, such portion (not exceeding one-tenth part) of the capital of her provision as my trustees shall think proper, which payment shall be imputed towards such daughters' provision: Subject to these general directions, the terms of such antenuptial settlement shall, as regards my said daughters' provisions, be determined by my trustees: And I declare that if any of my children predecease the term of vesting of their provisions without leaving lawful issue, the share of such predeceasing child shall accresce to those of my children who shall survive the term of vesting of their provisions, or to their issue per stirpes, but if such predeceasing child shall leave lawful issue, such issue shall have right to their predeceasing parent's share, and to the proportion of any share that may have accresced in manner foresaid: And I declare that my trustees shall have power to advance and pay to or expend for the aliment, education and advancement in life of any of my children, or of their issue, such portion not exceeding one-fifth of the revenue or capital of the provisions hereby made for them, as to my trustees shall seem expedient, and that even though the term of vesting of such provisions may not have arrived, such advances being imputed towards the provision of the child on whose behalf such advances shall be made.

The case stated:

3. The first parties hereto are the trustees appointed by the said trust disposition and settlement. The second parties hereto [Mrs Leslie Fyfe or Duthie, and another] are the daughters of the said deceased John Fyfe, who are married and who were married at the date of his death, and prior to the date of said trust disposition and settlement. They have both attained majority. No antenuptial settlements were made on their marriages. The third parties are the whole remaining daughters of the said deceased John Fyfe. They are unmarried and have attained majority, with the exception of Miss Irene Fyfe, who is nineteen years of age. . . . The fourth parties [who are the children of Mrs Leslie Fyfe or Duthie] are all the grandchildren of the testator, and were all born before his death. . . . The fifth parties are the whole heirs ab intestato of the said John Fyfe.

The case set forth the contentions of the parties as follows:—

The first parties maintain that on a sound construction of the said trust disposition and settlement they are bound (subject to the power to advance) to procure the shares of residue of the second parties settled in trust in the names of themselves or of other trustees for behoof of the second parties respectively, in liferent and otherwise in terms of the directions for the settlement of daughters' provisions contained in the seventh purpose of the trust disposition and settlement; and that as regards the shares of the testator's unmarried daughters, being the third parties hereto, they are bound to retain the capital of the provisions to the said daughters while they respectively remain unmarried, and to pay the income to the said daughters respectively, subject to the power to make advances out of capital not exceeding one-fifth in each case, and that on the marriage of each daughter they are bound to secure the said provisions by antenuptial settlement upon the daughters and their children, as provided by the said seventh purpose of the trust disposition and settlement, subject to the power to make advances not exceeding one-tenth part of the capital in each case.

The second parties maintain that they have an unqualified and indefeasible right of fee in their respective shares of residue, the subsequent directions of the testator falling to be disregarded as inapplicable, or otherwise as repugnant or ineffectual; and further, that they are entitled to present payment of the capital of their shares. Alternatively, they maintain that they are entitled to the income of their respective shares during their lives, and that the fee of their respective shares has vested in them, subject to defeasance in the case of each daughter, in the event only of her entering into a subsequent marriage, and of an antenuptial settlement being executed in manner provided by said trust disposition and settlement, and of children born of such marriage surviving her, and then only if and in so far as rights in the fee shall have been conferred on such children by such antenuptial settlement.

The third parties maintain that they have also a vested right in their respective shares of the residue along with the second parties and that they are entitled to present payment of the capital of their shares. Alternatively, they maintain that they are entitled to the income of their respective shares during their lives, and that the fee of their respective shares has vested in them, subject to defeasance in the case of each daughter, in the event only of her marrying, and of an antenuptial settlement being executed in manner provided by said trust disposition and settlement, and of children born of such marriage surviving her, and then only if and in so far as rights in the fee shall have been conferred on such children by such antenuptial settlement.

It is maintained on behalf of the fourth parties that they have taken a vested interest in the fee of the share of residue provided to their mother, Mrs Lesley Fyfe or Duthie, and that the capital of such share will, on the death of the said Mrs Lesley Fyfe or Duthie, fall to be divided among the fourth parties along with any children that may hereafter be born to the said Mrs Lesley Fyfe or Duthie, subject to such provision, if any, in favour of the said John Duthie as may competently be made by the said Mrs Lesley Fyfe or Duthie.

It is maintained on behalf of the fifth parties that they are entitled as heirs ab intestato of the testator to the fee of the shares of any of the daughters who may die without leaving issue born after the testator's death.

The following Questions of Law were stated:—

1. Has an unqualified right of fee in their respective shares of residue vested in the second parties, and are they entitled to present payment of the capital of their shares? Or
2. Are the first parties bound (subject to the power to advance) to procure said shares settled in trust in the names of themselves or of other trustees for behoof of the second parties respectively, in liferent and otherwise, in terms of the truster's directions for the settlement in trust of daughters' provisions contained in the seventh purpose of his trust disposition and settlement?
3. Has an unqualified right of fee in their respective shares of residue vested in the third parties, and are they entitled to present payment of their shares? Or
4. Are the first parties bound (subject to the power to advance) to retain the shares of the third parties and to pay to them respectively only the income thereof, so long as they are respectively unmarried, and in the event of any of the third parties being hereafter married, to procure her share (subject to the power of advance), settled in trust for behoof of her in liferent, and otherwise in terms of the truster's said directions for the settlement in trust of daughters' provisions?
6. As regards the share of residue provided to Mrs Duthie, have the fourth parties (together with any children who may hereafter be born to her) a vested right of fee in said share?
8. Does the fee of the share of any daughter who may die without leaving issue, born after the testator's death, fall to the fifth parties as heirs ab intestato of the truster?

The arguments are sufficiently stated in the contentions of the parties. The following authorities were cited: Tweeddale's Trs. v. Tweeddale, 1905, 8 F. 264; Chambers' Trs. v. Smith, 1878, 5 R. H.L. 151.

The Court answered the second and fourth questions in the affirmative, and the first, third, sixth and eighth questions in the negative.

At the advising the following judgment of Lord Low was, in his absence, read by the Lord Justice-Clerk.

Lord Low.—The questions raised in this special case depend upon the construction of the residue clause in the trust disposition and settlement left by the deceased John Fyfe.

The truster's sons having elected to take certain other provisions instead of sharing in the residue, the residuary legatees are the truster's daughters, of whom there are eight. Two of these daughters, Mrs Duthie and Mrs Weber, are married. They were both married prior to the execution of the trust disposition and settlement. Mrs Duthie has five children, all of whom were born prior to the truster's death. Mrs Weber has no children.

By the seventh purpose of the trust disposition and settlement the truster directed his trustees, as soon as they might find convenient, to realise and divide the residue of his estate among his children equally, share and share alike, declaring that "the term of the vesting of the foregoing provisions of the residue shall, as regards daughters, be on their respectively attaining majority or being married, whichever of these events shall happen first."

That is a direction which amounts to an absolute gift of a share of the residue to each daughter who shall attain majority or be married. So far there is no ambiguity, but the testator proceeds to give certain further directions in regard to the way in which the trustees are to deal with the daughters' shares, which are so badly expressed as to render their construction a matter of difficulty.

All the daughters maintain that the directions are so ambiguous that it is impossible to give to them any effect whatever, while the married daughters further maintain that, at all events, the directions cannot be applied to the shares destined to them.

I think that the fact that two of the daughters were already married when the settlement was made does add to the difficulty of construction; but leaving that fact out of view in the meantime, and considering the clause as if the question had arisen with daughters who were all unmarried, I do not think that there is any reasonable doubt what the testator's intention was, and I further think that that intention is sufficiently expressed by the language used.

Fyfe's Trustees v. Duthie.

Lord Low.

The testator directs that the capital of the residue shall not be paid to the daughters (except to a certain small extent), but shall be held by the testamentary trustees, or by other trustees whom they are authorised to nominate, during the lifetime of the daughters. So far I do not think that there is any doubt, because the directions to that effect are not really ambiguous. There is more difficulty, however, in regard to the purposes for which the capital is to be held in trust. As regards the daughters themselves, I think that it is sufficiently clear that they are only to be entitled to payment of the income. It is expressly said that so long as a daughter remains unmarried the trustees are to pay the "revenue" of her share to her, and the right of a daughter after she is married is referred to as a "liferent."

That being so, the next question is, What becomes of the capital? I shall quote the very words of the clause upon which the answer to that question depends. After directing the trustees to pay the revenue of their shares to the daughters so long as they remain unmarried, the clause proceeds: "And on their marriage my trustees shall see to it that the said provisions, both revenue and capital, be secured in trust in their own names, or in the names of other trustees, by antenuptial settlement, upon my daughters and their children to be born, in usual form, the husbands of my said daughters (if my said daughters shall so desire) to have a liferent only postponed to my said daughters' liferent."

Now the trust which is to be set up on the marriage of a daughter is to be for the purpose of securing both revenue and capital. The revenue alone, as we have seen, is to be paid to the daughters during their lives, and therefore the securing of the capital must be primarily for the benefit of children. But it was argued that there was nothing to shew what was the precise nature of the right to the capital which was given to the children. It might be an absolute and unqualified fee, the daughters being restricted to a liferent allenarly; or it might be a right which depended upon the children surviving their mothers. The language used, it was contended, was consistent with either of these alternatives. I do not think that that contention is well founded. It seems to me that there are very sufficient grounds for holding that the right given to the children of a daughter depended upon their survivance of their mother.

In the first place, to restrict the daughters to a liferent and to give an absolute fee to their children, if and when they came into existence, would be inconsistent with and repugnant to the initial gift to the daughters. In the second place, there is no destination over of the share of a daughter who survives the period of vesting but has no children. If, however, a fee was conferred upon the daughter by the initial gift, and if the effect of the subsequent directions was merely to burden that fee with a resolutive condition in the event of the daughter being survived by children, there was no room for a destination over in the event of failure of children.

It therefore seems to me that this is a case of the kind of which Tweeddale's Trs., 1905, 8 F. 264, is the most recent example, and that a fair construction of the language used is that a fee was given to the daughters, but that it was burdened with a trust for the purpose of securing to the daughters the income of their shares during their lives, and the capital to their children who should survive them. The result would be that in the event of a daughter dying without leaving children, her share would be carried by her will if she left one, and if not would pass to her heirs ab intestato.

For these reasons I am of opinion that, as regards unmarried daughters, the directions in question sufficiently disclose the intention of the testator, and I shall now consider the case of the daughters who were already married.

In the first place, it seems to me to be certain that the directions were intended to apply to all the daughters. They are introduced by the words: "As regards said provisions to my daughters, I hereby appoint that the capital of the same shall not be paid to them"—words which plainly include all the daughters. Then in the clause immediately following the directions in question the testator authorises his trustees to pay a certain part of the capital to his daughters. The clause is in the following terms:—"Further, notwithstanding what is before written, my trustees shall have power on the marriage of such daughter to pay to her, or to pay to any daughter already married at my death," a portion of her share not exceeding one-tenth. Now there the testator does contemplate that a daughter may be already married at his death, and obviously there would be no necessity for empowering the trustees to pay a portion of the capital to a daughter in that position unless the previous direction to the trustees to hold the capital applied to daughters already married.

But the difficulty which arises is this, that although the trustees are directed not to pay the capital of their shares to any of the daughters, the testator's instructions as to the purposes for which the shares are to be retained are, in terms, applicable only to the case of unmarried daughters. Thus the trustees are directed to pay the revenue of the shares "to my daughters while they remain unmarried"; and "on their marriage" the trustees are to secure their shares in trust "by antenuptial settlement upon my daughters and their children to be born." Therefore, upon a literal reading of the clause, the trustees, although they would be bound to retain the share of a married daughter, would have no power, or, at all events, no express power, to pay the revenue to her, and they could not secure the share by antenuptial settlement, unless such daughter became a widow and married again, and they could in no case secure the capital to children born prior to the testator's death, because the settlement is only to be on children "to be born."

In these circumstances there is much force in the contention of the married daughters that as regards them the directions must be disregarded altogether, because assuming that the trustees are directed to hold their shares, there is no specification of the purposes for which they are to do so, and it cannot be assumed that the intention of the testator was the same as regards married and unmarried daughters.

The question is one of very considerable difficulty, but I have come to be of opinion that the directions are capable of being applied, as they were undoubtedly intended to be applicable, to the case of married as well as of unmarried daughters. I think that the instructions to the trustees as to what they are to do with the shares of the daughters (which they are unequivocally directed in all cases to retain) may be regarded, first, as expressing the testator's intention as to the purpose for which the shares were to be retained; and, secondly, as indicating what might be called the machinery for carrying that purpose into effect. Now if I am right in holding that the purpose is sufficiently clear, I do not think that the testator's intention can be defeated simply because he has indicated a method of carrying out his wishes which is not precisely applicable to every case. There is no difficulty in settling the shares of the married daughters in trust to secure payment of the revenue to them, and of the capital to their children in the event of their survivance, and that is the kind of settlement which the testator had in view, although it is not, and cannot be, precisely the form of settlement which he specified.

I am therefore of opinion that the first and third questions should be answered in the negative and the second and fourth in the affirmative, and that the sixth and eighth questions should be answered in the negative. In regard to the fifth and seventh questions, I think that we should find it unnecessary to answer them.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire at Glasgow.

On 3rd February 1905 George Mulvein, boot and shoe factor, Maybole, and John Murray, 1 Coral Hill, Maybole, entered into an agreement the material clauses of which were as follows:

This Minute of Agreement entered into between George Mulvein, Boot and Shoe Factor, Maybole, and John Murray, presently residing in 1 Coral Hill, Maybole, Witnesseth that the said George Mulvein hereby engages the said John Murray from the sixth day of February nineteen hundred and five, as a retail traveller, salesman, and collector in his said business of Boot and Shoe Factor . . . and this engagement shall be terminable by either party, by giving a fortnight's written notice to the other party of his intention to terminate it; and the said John Murray binds himself not to sell to, or to canvass any of the said George Mulvein's customers, or to sell or travel in any of the towns or districts traded in by the said George Mulvein for a period of twelve months from the date of the termination of this engagement.

2ND DIV.

Mulvein v. Murray.

On 27th October 1906, John Murray, having given the requisite notice, terminated his engagement with George Mulvein and left his employment.

On or about 15th November 1906 George Mulvein brought the present action against John Murray in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow. The pursuer prayed the Court:

To interdict the defender from selling boots and shoes to or canvassing any parties who were customers of the pursuer prior to 27th October 1906, and from selling, travelling for, or trading in boots and shoes in the following districts, namely—Cambuslang, Tollcross, Parkhead, Kinning Park, Govan, Gorbals, Rutherglen Road, Tradeston, Auchenairn, Springburn, being districts traded in by the pursuer, and in particular from soliciting the following persons or their representatives for orders for boots and shoes—(Here followed a list of the names and addresses of persons who, the pursuer alleged, had been canvassed by the defender).

After sundry procedure proof was allowed and led. It appeared that the pursuer's business extended to Ayrshire, Renfrewshire, Lanarkshire, Dumbartonshire, Stirlingshire and Linlithgowshire; that the defender, while in the pursuer's employment, had travelled in the districts mentioned in the prayer of the petition; that on leaving the pursuer's employment the defender had entered the service of Andrew Lees, boot and shoe manufacturer, Ayr, as commercial traveller; and that in this capacity he had travelled in districts in which he had travelled while in the pursuer's employment, and had canvassed the persons whose names were mentioned in the prayer of the petition. These persons were customers of the pursuer at the date when the defender terminated his engagement with the pursuer.

On 8th May 1907 the Sheriff-Substitute (Fyfe) granted interdict as craved.

The Defender appealed and argued: (1) The agreement did not define the capacity in which the defender was to be prohibited from selling or canvassing. Accordingly it must be taken that he was prohibited only as principal and not as the agent of a third party (Allen v. Taylor, 1871, 19 W.R. 556; Dunning v. Owen [1907], 2 K.B. 237). But (2) the contract was void. Contracts in restraint of trade were valid only if they were reasonably necessary for the protection of the party in whose favour they were made (Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1711, 1 Smith L.C. 406; Nordenfeldt v. Maxim Nordenfeldt Guns and Ammunition Co. Ltd. [1894], A.C. 535). The contract here was objectionable (1) because it was not limited to the pursuer's own trade, and (2) because its limits in space could not be ascertained without going dehors the contract. No doubt if a contract contained two severable stipulations, one of which was per se valid, while the other was too wide, the valid stipulation would be enforceable. But where, as here, the only stipulation was too wide, the Court could not make a new contract for the parties by reading in a limitation (Dumbarton Steamboat Co. Ltd. v. Macfarlane, 1899, 1 F. 993; Baker v. Hedgecock, 1888, L.R., 39 Ch. D. 520). Counsel also cited British Workman's and General Assurance Co. Ltd. v. Wilkinson, 1900, 8 S.L.T. p. 67; Woolley & Son v. Morrison, 1904, 6 F. 451; Davies v. Davies, 1887, L.R., 36 Ch. D. 359; Palmer v. Mallet, 1887, L.R., 36 Ch. D. 411.

Argued for Pursuer: The contract prohibited the defender from selling and canvassing, not only on his own account, but also as an agent. (2) As to validity, the contract must be looked at from a business point of view (William Cory & Son Ltd. v. Harrison [1906], A.C. 274). It must therefore be construed as applying only to the boot and shoe business, with which alone the parties were concerned (Dubowski & Sons v. Goldstein [1896], 1 Q.B. 478). The contract must also be construed as applying to customers who were customers at the time when the defender left the pursuer's service (Dubowski & Sons v. Goldstein, cit.). The area defined was the area of pursuer's trading, and that area might be identified by parole evidence (Meikle v. Meikle, 1895, 33 S.L.R. 362; White Tomkins & Courage v. Wilson, 1907, 23 T.L.R. 469). When these circumstances were kept in view, it was plain that the contract was necessary for the reasonable protection of the pursuer, and was valid. In any view the prohibition of selling to or canvassing pursuer's customers was not too wide, and was severable from the probibition of traveling in the districts traded in by pursuer (Nordenfeldt v. Maxim Nordenfeldt Guns and Ammunition Co. Ltd., cit.). The pursuer was therefore at least entitled to interdict against this valid stipulation being infringed. Dumbarton Steamboat Co. Ltd. v. Macfarlane (cit.) was distinguishable. It only decided that the Court could not make a new contract for the parties. Counsel also cited Williams & Son v. Fairbairn, 1899, 1 F. 944.

The following interlocutor was pronounced:—

"Recal the said interlocutor; find that at the date of the action the defender had been canvassing the persons mentioned in the prayer of the petition, being customers of the pursuer, for orders for boots and shoes; that his doing so was in contravention of his agreement with pursuer, No. 7 of process; but as the twelve months referred to in the said agreement have long since expired, find it unnecessary to interdict the defender from selling boots and shoes to or canvassing any parties who were customers of the pursuer prior to 27th October 1906, and in particular from selling to or canvassing the persons specially named in the prayer of the petition or their representatives for orders for boots and shoes; and, quoad ultra, assoilzie the defender from the conclusions of the petition, and decern."

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—There is no doubt that in this case the restrictive obligation was for a time specified and in so far as it was an obligation upon the defender not to canvass customers that it is valid and must be sustained.

But the obligation not to travel in any of the towns or districts traded in by the said George Mulvein for a period of twelve months is in a different position. This is an unreasonable restraint. There is an absolute want of specification. The word "district" seems to me to be a most indefinite description of area. It leaves the application of the restriction to be made wherever it may turn out that the pursuer has been in the past doing business. What are the limits assigned to the expression "district" is nowhere made plain. I cannot but think that such a restrictive bargain should be in terms easy of interpretation and applied with definiteness to the areas intended to be protected.

When we come to look at the subject of agreement the same indefiniteness is found. By the letter of the agreement the limitation does not apply to any particular business but is absolutely general in its terms. It is said that the words must be read as limited to the particular trade in boots and shoes for which the defender was engaged. That would be to infer a limitation as regards future action merely from the designation of the defender. I cannot see that if the conditions agreed to were not bad as as being in undue restraint of trade that the defender could have resisted a general exclusion of him from trading in the prohibited place. The case of Baker v. Hedgecock seems to militate against such a view.

I am of opinion that the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute is erroneous and ought to be recalled, and that the interdict should be limited to the sale of boots and shoes to persons who were customers of the pursuer before 27th October 1906, naming the persons stated in the prayer of the petition as being of those persons, and that no interdict going further should be granted.

Lord Low.—This case belongs to a class which has given rise to much litigation and to considerable diversity of judicial opinion, but the law applicable to such cases has been settled by the judgment of the House of Lords in Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Gun and Ammunition Co. [1894], A.C. 535, in which all the authorities were reviewed.

I think that the result of that judgment is that the question whether the agreement entered into between the pursuer and the defender is or is not enforceable depends upon whether, in view of the circumstances, the restraint imposed upon the defender was reasonable in the sense that it did no more than afford a fair protection to the interests of the pursuer?

In so far as the defender was taken bound not to "sell to or 'canvass'" any of the pursuer's customers for a period of twelve months from the date of the termination of the agreement, I have no doubt that the restraint was reasonable, but more difficulty arises in regard to the additional obligation which is laid upon him not "to sell or travel in any of the towns or districts traded in" by the pursuer for the same period.

A commercial traveller becomes acquainted with his employers' customers in the district allotted to him, and he gets to know the possibilities of the district in regard to the extension of the trade in which he is engaged. I therefore think that it would be reasonable for his employer to take him bound, in the event of his employment coming to an end, not to use the knowledge which he had gained for the purpose of carrying on the same trade, either on his own account or as traveller for another, within the district in which he had acted as traveller, for such a period as might be supposed to be necessary to enable his successor to become acquainted with the customers and with the district. That I take to have been the object of the agreement in question, and if the second branch of the restraining clause had been limited to the districts in which the defender travelled, I should have thought it was reasonable. It however extends to "all the towns or districts traded in" by the pursuer. That is extremely wide, because although the volume of business done by the pursuer does not appear to be very large, it extends over a wide area. He says in his evidence that his business extends to Ayrshire, Renfrewshire, Lanarkshire, Dumbartonshire, Stirlingshire, and Linlithgowshire; and he also says that he employs eight travellers. There is nothing in the evidence to shew that it was reasonably necessary for the fair protection of the pursuer's interests that the restriction placed upon the defender in regard to towns and districts should extend over so large an area.

The pursuer however only seeks to interdict the defender from selling or travelling in districts in which he was actually employed as traveller, and the question arises whether it is competent to grant an interdict so limited? The general rule is that if such an obligation is severable, that part of it which is lawful may be enforced; but if the obligation is not severable, then if it cannot be enforced to its full extent it cannot be enforced at all, because for the Court to make a severance which the parties have not made would be to re-make the contract for them.

So far as I can find, all the cases in which the obligation has been held to be severable have been cases in which the severance has been made in the contract; but, on the other hand, the cases in which the obligation has been held to be not severable have been cases in which any restriction of the generality of the obligation would be entirely arbitrary, there being no data upon which a definite line could be drawn. Now the peculiarity in this case is that it supplies a perfectly definite line dividing what is a reasonable and enforceable restriction from what is an unreasonable restriction which the Court will not enforce. Suppose that the restriction had been that the defender should not sell or travel either in the towns or districts in which he had been employed as a traveller, or in any towns or districts traded in by the pursuer, the effect of the restriction as a whole would have been exactly the same as that which was actually imposed, but it would have been plainly severable, and the pursuer would have been entitled to the interdict which he now craves. The reason why he would be entitled to that limited interdict would be that it was certain from the terms of the contract that the whole area covered by the restriction was composed of two ascertained and definite areas, namely, that in which the defender had travelled, and that in which he had not travelled but in which the pursuer had traded. Now if from the nature of the case it is as certain that the total area is composed of these two areas, as if that had appeared upon the face of the contract, I am unable to see any sufficient reason why the same result should not follow. In neither case would the Court be making a contract for the parties which they had not themselves made, but in both they would be holding that, to an extent which was precisely ascertained, the contract was lawful and enforceable.

I am therefore of opinion that the application of the pursuer for an interdict limited to the districts in which the defender was employed as traveller was competent: and if so, there is no question that the facts proved entitle him to decree.

There is an argument which was strongly urged on behalf of the defender, and that was that the contract was wholly bad in respect that in the restraining clause the kind of business which the defender was restricted from carrying on was not specified. I am of opinion that the argument cannot be sustained. In the agreement the pursuer is described as "Boot and Shoe Factor," and the defender is described as "a retail traveller, salesman, and collector" for the pursuer, "in his said business of Boot and Shoe Factor." The agreement therefore is between a boot and shoe factor and his traveller, and relates to the employment and to nothing else. That being so, it seems to me that the implication is plain that the selling, canvassing and travelling referred to in the restraining clause relate only to the boot and shoe trade with which alone the contract is concerned.

I am accordingly of opinion that the interlocutor under appeal should be affirmed.

Lord Ardwall.—Originally at common law all such agreements as that under consideration in the present case were void as being made in restraint of trade and contrary to public policy. To this general rule exceptions have been from time to time admitted in certain cases on the ground that the restraint imposed in these cases was reasonable and proper on a consideration of the contract between the parties.

It is a question of circumstances in each particular case whether the restraint imposed is reasonable or not, and the main point to be considered in each case is whether the restraint is or is not wider than is necessary for the reasonable protection of the party desiring to enforce it.

With regard to the agreement in question, I am of opinion that the first part of it, in which the defender "bound himself not to sell to or canvass any of the said George Mulvein's customers," is a valid provision, and is separable from what follows. But the contract also binds the defender not "to travel in any of the towns or districts traded in by the said George Mulvein for a period of twelve months from the date of the termination of this engagement." The limitation in time which is applicable to both the clauses I have quoted is quite reasonable, but I am of opinion that the latter clause I have quoted imposes an unreasonable restraint upon the defender. It is too wide and too vague; for all that appears the pursuer may have traded in every district in Scotland and England too; and I may add that the word "district" is in itself a very vague term, as it is not a known geographical division of either town or country. In short, this provision leaves the defender entirely in the dark as to what towns or districts he is precluded from selling or travelling in; and so far as its terms are concerned it might embrace the whole country should it turn out that Mulvein had traded in each district thereof, whatever that may mean. It appears that, according to his own evidence, his business extends "to Ayrshire, Renfrewshire, Lanarkshire, Dumbartonshire. Stirlingshire, and Linlithgowshire," and he adds after this enumeration, "I have a traveller who goes to Bo'ness in Linlithgow," so apparently the pursuer seems to think if a traveller of his visits one town in a county the restriction will apply to the whole of the county; but be this as it may, I am of opinion that an agreement of this sort in restraint of trade should at least be definite and distinct, and in such terms as that the person who is coming under the restraint should know what he is binding himself to refrain from doing.

It was argued for the pursuer that this second clause might be held to be valid with regard to towns or districts which the defender had himself traded in while in the pursuer's service, and invalid quoad ultra. I cannot assent to this argument. I think that to introduce such a limitation into the clause would really be to re-form the contract, and would be contrary to the law laid down in the case of the Dumbarton

Steam Boat Company v. Macfarlane (1899, 1 F. 993), and Baker (1888), L.R. 39 Ch. D. 520.

But further, I am of opinion that the second clause I have quoted is invalid inasmuch as it is a restraint against selling or travelling for any purpose in any of the towns or districts mentioned. Now I think it was wholly unnecessary for the protection of the pursuer that the defender should be prohibited from selling or travelling for any purpose whatever in these towns or districts, and was unreasonable in respect that the defender had a right to engage in any sort of business for himself, provided he did not interfere with the pursuer's class of business in such town or district.

It was pleaded for the pursuer that this clause must be held to be limited to selling boots and shoes or travelling for the purposes of the boot and shoe trade, because the pursuer is designated "boot and shoe factor" in the commencement of the agreement, and the defender is engaged as a retail salesman and collector in the said business of boot and shoe factor; but I am unable to hold that the mere designation of the pursuer, or the statement of the purpose for which the defender was to travel, modifies the absolutely general obligation on the defender not to sell or travel at all in the towns and districts indicated, and I am of opinion that under that obligation, if valid, he might have been prevented from selling or travelling in any trade whatever.

I may point out that in the case of Baker v. Hedgecock (1888, L.R. 39 Ch. D. 520), where the obligation was not to carry on any business whatever, it was held to be of no moment that in the beginning of the agreement the employer was designated as "of 61 High Holborn, Tailor," and the employee was designated "skilled foreman cutter and general superintendent," and the employer was not permitted, by limiting the agreement for the purposes of the action to an injunction against carrying on the business of a tailor, to render the agreement valid or the action good. It was accordingly there held that the agreement was void, and the injunction was refused. Applying that case to the present I am of opinion that the limited restriction in the prayer of the petition against selling, travelling, or trading in boots and shoes will not render the agreement valid so as to entitle the Court to grant the limited interdict asked; and similarly, I am of opinion that the limitation of the districts against trading in which interdict is sought will not have the effect of rendering the agreement valid to that limited extent. I regard the obligation as one and indivisible, and not separable or restrictable in part as suggested by the pursuer.

On these grounds I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute of 8th May 1907 ought to be recalled, and that we should find that at the date of the action the defender had been canvassing the persons mentioned in the prayer of the petition, being customers of the pursuer, for orders for boots and shoes; that his doing so was in contravention of his agreement with the pursuer, No. 7 of process; and in respect that the period of twelve months fixed by the contract has now expired, should find it unnecessary to grant interdict against the defender from selling boots and shoes to or canvassing any parties who were customers of the pursuer prior to 27th October 1906, and in particular from selling to or canvassing the persons specially named in the prayer of the petition or their representatives for orders for boots and shoes; and quoad ultra should assoilzie the defender.—31*st January* 1908.

Ship—Carriage of Goods—Bill of Lading—Construction—Consignee Bound by Bill of Lading to Receive Goods from Ship's Tackles as Fast as Steamer Can Deliver, any Custom of the Port to the Contrary Notwithstanding, and Also to Pay All Charges After Being Discharged Necessary for Steamer's Quick Despatch—Failure of Consignee to Accept Delivery as Fast as Goods Discharged from Ship's Tackles—Employment by Shipowners of Extra Hands to Accelerate Unloading by Clearing Goods from Quay — Circumstances Where Held (Diss. Stewart & Company [1903], A.C. 389, Distinguished — Opinions per Lords Low and Ardwall That Shipowners Could Not Have Sued for Demurrage.

Appeal from the Sheriff Court of Renfrew and Bute at Greenock.

This was an action brought by the Crown Steamship Co. Ltd., 175 West George Street, Glasgow, owners of the steamer "Crown of Granada," against John Leitch, sugar-broker, Greenock, to recover the sum of £40, 19s.

The following narrative of the facts of the case is taken from the judgment of Lord Low:

"The question in this case depends upon the construction of a clause in the bill of lading of a cargo of sugar which was brought by the pursuers' steamer 'Crown of Granada' from Barbadoes to Greenock. The clause is in the following terms: 'The goods to be received by the consignee from the ship's tackles as fast as the steamer can deliver, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding, and all charges incurred after being discharged necessary for the steamer's quick despatch to be paid by the owner or consignee of the goods.'

"The circumstances in which the question arises are these. The defender was consignee of a part only, although a large part, of the sugar, but I do not think that the main question in the case (the meaning and effect of this bill of lading) is affected by that circumstance. The question would have been the same if the defender had been consignee of the whole cargo. The general custom of the Port of Greenock is for sugar to be weighed on the quay as it is put out of the ship and before it is removed into the sheds of the Harbour Trust adjoining the quay. I understand that in all cases the sugar must be put into the sheds for Customs House purposes. Sometimes the sugar is run into the sheds as it is put out of the ship, and is weighed in the sheds. That appears to be an exceptional course to follow, but it is sometimes done, and is quite lawful.

"The 'Crown of Granada' commenced to discharge at 7 o'clock on the morning of the 28th of June 1906. The pursuers had two gangs of men to discharge the cargo at each of the four main hatches, which enabled the derricks to be kept constantly at work, and the cargo to be discharged as fast as it could be delivered from the ship's tackles. The defender, on the other hand, had only one gang of men, and one weighing machine, at each hatch. The result was that the defender's men could not weigh the sugar and remove it to the sheds as fast as it was put out of the ship, and the consequence was that from time to time the quay became blocked with bags of sugar with which the defender's men were unable to deal. When that happened men in the employment of the pursuers cleared the quay by running the accumulated bags into the sheds without being weighed. If that had not been done it would have been necessary to stop the discharge when a block occurred until the defender's men were able to weigh and remove the bags which had accumulated.

"The pursuers now claim from the defender the expense which they incurred in clearing the quay when a block occurred, and the first question is whether that is a claim which they are entitled to make in terms of the clause in the bill of lading which I have quoted."

On 21st December 1906 the Sheriff-Substitute (Neish) assoilzied the defender.

The Pursuers appealed and argued: The pursuers were suing not for demurrage but for repayment of charges which the bill of lading provided should be borne by the defender. The defender was under an absolute obligation to receive the goods "as fast as the steamer can deliver"—i.e. as fast as the ship could put the cargo out on the quay (Kruuse v. Drynan & Co., 1891, 18 R. 1110; Maclay v. Spillers & Baker Ltd., 1901, 6 Com. Cas. 217). The words "quick despatch" referred back to the words "as fast as steamer can deliver," and did not qualify the defender's obligation. The cases of obligation to unload in a reasonable time were either cases where the ship was to be unloaded in accordance with the custom of the port (Postlethwaite v. Freeland, 1880, L.R. 5 A.C. 599; J. & A. Wyllie v. Harrison & Co., 1885, 13 R. 92; Castlegate Steamship Co. Ltd. v. Dempsey [1892], 1 Q.B. 854; Good & Co. v. Isaacs [1892], 2 Q.B. 555; Hulthen v. Stewart & Co. [1903], A.C. 389; Carver on Carriage by Sea, sect. 614A) or cases where the contract contained no stipulation as to time (Hick v. Raymond & Reid [1893], A.C. 22). In the present case the custom of the port was expressly excluded and the obligation was absolute. Further, the defender had caused unnecessary delay by weighing the goods at the ship's side and by separating his own goods from the remainder of the cargo while still on the quay. That had caused obstruction which the pursuers were entitled to clear away at the defender's expense. It was no answer for the defender to say that he had acted reasonably, or that he had taken delivery as soon as he could in the circumstances. Even if that were so he had not accepted the goods as fast as they could be discharged from the ship's tackles. He was thus in breach of his contract with the pursuers, and was liable in the sum sued for as the extra expense caused to the pursuers by his breach.

Argued for the Defender: The words "as fast as steamer can deliver" imposed only an obligation to do what was reasonable in the circumstances (Hulthen v. Stewart & Co. (cit.); Hick v. Raymond (cit.); Temple, Thomson & Clark v. Runnals, 1901, 18 T.L.R. 18 and 822; Carver on Carriage by Sea, sect. 614A; Scrutton on Charter Parties and Bills of Lading, p. 258). Further, that was the natural meaning of the words "quick despatch" in the later clause, and it was probable that the two clauses were intended to be mutually inconsistent. The words "excluding the custom of the port" only barred the defender from founding on any special custom of the port, such as was present in the cases of Postlethwaite v. Freeland (cit.); J. & A. Wyllie v. Harrison & Co. (cit.); and Good & Co. v. Isaacs (cit.). The cases founded on by the pursuers were distinguishable. In Kruuse v. Drynan & Co. (cit.) it was held that there had been in fact unreasonable delay. In Maclay v. Spillers & Baker Ltd.

(cit.) there was a specific obligation to unload continuously, which had not been performed. If the defender were right in his construction of the bill of lading there was no breach of contract. It was necessary to weigh the goods on the quay in order to ascertain whether or not there was short delivery. As to the separation of the goods, it was the pursuers' duty to make separate delivery of the defender's goods (Carver on Carriage by sea, sect. 462), and any delay caused by separating them was due to the pursuers' own default. The defender therefore had acted reasonably, and the pursuers were not entitled to employ extra men at the defender's expense. In point of fact, the employment of extra men had caused confusion and had not accelerated the discharge. In any view it was proved that the work could have been done at the rate of 6d. per ton. The sum claimed by the pursuers (1s. 9d. per ton) was therefore excessive.

The Court (diss. Lord Stormonth-Darling) recalled the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute, found that the charges sued for were to some extent necessary for the "steamer's quick despatch," decerned against the defender for the sum of £11, 14s., and found no expenses due to or by either party.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—The pursuers claim from the defender the expense of providing labour to facilitate the discharge of a cargo of sugar from their vessel. They make this claim in respect of a clause in the bill of lading, under which the consignees were bound to take "from the ship's tackles as fast as the steamer can deliver, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding." The consignees were taken bound to pay all charges necessary for the steamer's "quick despatch."

It is the fact that the defenders were only consignees of a part of the cargo, but it does not appear to me that this fact in any way affects the decision of the question in this case.

It cannot be disputed that the arrangements made by the defender did not admit of the cargo being cleared from the quay as quickly as the ship could deliver, for it is quite certain that with one set of scales opposite each hatch—which was all that the defender provided—the bags brought from the hold could not be weighed fast enough to keep the quay clear for further discharge. To prevent the blocking of the discharge, the ship provided gangs of men, who, when there was a tendency to accumulation, ran the goods back into the shed behind, so as to clear a space for the ship's tackles to lay down more cargo. Such a removal before weighing was not according to the usual practice, but it was a procedure which was sometimes followed.

The first question is, What is the meaning to be put upon the clause in the bill of lading? It is, I think, very definite and clear, and there is no ambiguity in its terms. All custom is excluded; the bargain sharply is for a delivery as fast as the ship can bring the goods forward to the ship's side. To me it appears to be vain to contend that in the words excluding the power to found on port custom the practice of weighing at the ship's side is not included. It excludes everything that can hamper the ship's speed in delivering, which undoubtedly weighing at the ship's side may do, if the weighing appliances are not sufficient to weigh as rapidly as is necessary to prevent delay at the ship's tackles, the ship delivering by her ordinary appliances, as was the case here.

The defender, however, maintains that the latter part of the clause, in which the words "quick despatch" are used, has a less extensive meaning than the words in the earlier part of the clause, and must be read to mean only a reasonable despatch according to the circumstances existing at the time. The defender seems to me to be here in a dilemma. If by "the circumstances" he means general circumstances, then I think it hopeless for him to attempt to escape from the application of the clause as one clause, to be read as one, "quick despatch" referring to the concrete phrase "as fast as the steamer can deliver." If, on the other hand, by "circumstances" he refers to port circumstances, his contention is expressly excluded by the words "custom of the port notwithstanding." As I read the second part of the clause it does nothing more than give a right to the ship, if despatch is being hindered, to claim the expense she is put to in clearing away the accumulation which is causing the hindrance, and exempt her from any claim on the part of the consignee for any unusual expense he may be put to in keeping reception of the goods in such order that the ship shall not be delayed, and forced to discharge more slowly than her appliances enabled her to do when she is free to do full work.

I do not consider it necessary to notice the argument of the defender based on the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Hulthen v. Stewart, except to say that the question in that case related to demurrage arising on the lapse of a specific number of days stipulated for discharge. This is not in any sense a case for demurrage. The sole question is whether the defender failed to give the ship the despatch stipulated for, and whether the pursuers, having taken steps to obviate the delay caused by that failure, are entitled to maintain that the cost incurred in doing so is exigible from the defender. If, as I think is the case, the only difficulty in fast delivery was the desire of the defender to weigh at the quay, he cannot, as I think, found upon that except as being a port custom, and this ground is expressly excluded by the terms of the bill of lading. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers were entitled, when the defender failed to receive

2nd Div.
Crown Steamship Co. Ltd. v. Leitch.
The Lord Justice-Clerk.

cargo and clear the quay as the ship's tackles delivered, to provide force to effect this themselves, at the expense of the defender, seeing that the rate of delivery was clearly notified to him, and it was pointed out to him that if he desired to weigh at the quay, extra scales would he necessary.

As regards the charge made by the pursuers, I do not think it can be held just. There is evidence that the 1s. 9d. they charge per ton is largely in excess of what such work is usually contracted for by those who provide a gang of quay work, and there is no counter evidence. The high charge was in part the result of the pursuers bringing a large gang all the way from Glasgow daily. In my opinion the pursuers' charge should be cut down to the sum represented by 6d. per ton, which comes out at £11, 14s.

Lord Low (read by The Lord Justice-Clerk) [after stating the facts ut supra].—It seems to me that, so far as the language used is concerned, there is no ambiguity in the first branch of the clause. The consignee is taken bound to receive the goods as fast as they can be delivered by the use of the ship's tackles, and that obligation is not to be limited or minimised by any custom of the port.

Upon that part of the clause I have two remarks to make. In the first place, I think that the words "any custom of the port," referred to, or at all events included, the custom of weighing the sugar on the quay before it was removed into the sheds. That is the only custom of which there is any evidence, and it is plainly a custom which materially affected the rate of discharge, because it is admitted that if, instead of weighing the sugar upon the quay, it had been at once run into the sheds, the defender would have had no difficulty in receiving the cargo as fast as the ship delivered it.

In the second place, although, in my judgment, the words which I am now considering are unambiguous, I have no doubt that they must be construed reasonably, and that the extent of the consignee's obligation may depend a good deal upon the circumstances existing in the particular case. For example, if the shipowner devised some means by which the cargo could be discharged much faster than the consignee had any reason to anticipate or be prepared for, I do not think that his failure to take delivery as fast as it was tendered would be a breach of his obligation. For reasons which I shall state presently, however, I do not think that any case of that kind has been established.

I now come to the second branch of the clause, which is much more difficult of construction than the first. I repeat the words: "All charges incurred after being discharged necessary for the steamer's quick despatch to be paid by the owner or consignee of the goods."

There is no dispute that the words "after being discharged" mean after goods have been discharged, but I think that it is also plain that they do not mean after all the goods have been discharged, because if all the goods were discharged the ship would be free, and there would be no room for incurring charges to ensure quick despatch. The clause therefore referred to something which might require to be done during the course of the discharge, and the only thing, so far as I can see, to which it could possibly refer, was just the very thing which happened, namely, a block occurring, which would have interrupted the discharge if the pursuers had not cleared it away.

There remain the words "quick despatch." The pursuers argued that these words referred back to the first part of the clause, and that the expression "for the steamer's quick despatch" was just a short way of saying "to enable the steamer to discharge the cargo as fast as she can deliver from the ship's tackles." The defender, upon the other hand contended that the words "quick despatch" must be read according to their ordinary signification, and as meaning that the ship should be discharged with reasonable speed, looking to all the circumstances.

I think that the construction for which the pursuers contend is in accordance with the intention of the clause. If it were not so, the unequivocal obligation which was laid upon the consignee by the first branch of the clause would be inoperative and ineffectual, because unless the shipowner could step in, under the second branch of the clause, and clear away an accumulation of bags which would otherwise interrupt the discharge, the consignee would incur no penalty for failing to implement his obligation to receive the goods as fast as the ship could deliver them. I further think that the expression "quick despatch" is a flexible expression which may quite well bear the interpretation which I have indicated if the context shews that that is the sense in which it was used. It is also important to remember that, in any view, the custom of the port is excluded. That was conceded by the defender's counsel. Now if the custom of the port had not been excluded, and if the stipulation had simply been that, in discharging the cargo, the steamers should get "quick despatch," I think that the defender could have successfully maintained that he was entitled to weigh the cargo on the quay, and to employ the number of men and of weighing machines which he did employ, because that was in accordance with the custom at Greenock. As the clause stands, however, the defender cannot found upon that custom—it is expressly excluded; and as I have already pointed out, he admits that if he had not weighed the sugar upon the quay, but run the bags into the sheds, he could with the same number of men have received the cargo as fast as it could be delivered from the ship's tackles. Except the custom of weighing the sugar upon the quay, I find no circumstances which would have prevented the defender from taking, or justified him in not taking, delivery as fast as the sugar was discharged.

It is said, however, that the claim of the pursuers is contrary to a well-established principle which was finally settled by the judgment of the House of Lords in Hulthen v. Stewart & Co. [1903], A.C. 389. That principle is that if a specific number of days is fixed within which the discharge of a ship is to be accomplished, then if these days are exceeded demurrage is due whatever the actual circumstances were. If, upon the other hand, a specific number of days is not fixed, but the contract is to discharge "with all despatch" or "as fast as steamer can deliver," or expressions of that sort, the question whether demurrage is due depends upon whether the discharge has been carried out with reasonable expedition and diligence in view of whole circumstances.

If the pursuers had been claiming demurrage I agree that this case would have fallen under the latter category, because I cannot read the bill of lading as fixing a specific time for the discharge. But there is here no question of demurrage. The only question is whether under a special agreement the pursuers were entitled to do, at the defender's expense, certain work which the defender was under obligation to do himself? No doubt the object of the agreement was to prevent the steamer being detained, but that does not make the pursuers' claim one for demurrage, nor does it necessarily introduce a principle which would have been applicable if the claim had actually been for demurrage.

The difficulty in this case seems to me to be entirely one of construction. But suppose that there had been no ambiguity in the language used, and that the bill of lading had provided in the clearest terms that the consignee should receive the goods as fast as the steamer could deliver from the ship's tackles, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding; that if the consignee chose to weigh the goods upon the quay he should be bound to employ a sufficient number of men and of scales to enable him to do so without interrupting or retarding the discharge; and that if he did not do so the ship should be entitled, at his expense, to do what was necessary to prevent the discharge being interrupted or retarded, by removing to the sheds without being weighed, any bags of sugar which the defender was unable to weigh as fast as they were delivered by the ship's tackles—if that had been the bargain between the parties—as I think it truly was—expressed in quite unambiguous language, I fail to see why it should not be a perfectly lawful bargain, and enforceable according to its terms.

The only ground upon which such a contract could be held to be not enforceable would be that it was not sufficiently definite. Now, in the first place I think that the obligation laid upon the consignee was sufficiently definite for the purposes of the contract, because I imagine that persons experienced in the unloading of ships would know with sufficient accuracy for practical purposes what was involved in an obligation to receive the goods as fast as they could be delivered from the ship's tackles. None of the witnesses say anything to the contrary. In the second place, however, I do not regard the obligation as being absolutely unconditional. I have already indicated circumstances which, in my opinion, would absolve the defender from the obligation to take delivery as fast as the steamer could deliver, but, in the discharge of the cargo, which actually took place, I repeat that I can find no circumstance (except the custom to weigh upon the quay, upon which the defender cannot found) which prevented him taking delivery as fast as it was tendered.

The only circumstance which might have been regarded as absolving the defender from exact fulfilment of his contract is that apparently (the evidence is by no means clear on this point) the pursuers employed an unusually large number of men to discharge the cargo; and if it had been shewn that the defender had been taken by surprise, and could not reasonably have been expected to be prepared for the discharge being made by so strong a force, that consideration might have had a material bearing upon the question of his liability. But no such defence is open to the defender, because he was given ample notice of the manner in which the pursuers were to discharge the cargo. He was told that the sugar would be delivered from "at least four derricks at the rate of not less than 40 hogsheads and 300 bags per hour at each derrick," and that he would be tendered "10 bags of sugar, in slings of 5 bags each, with each delivery of the derrick." He was further told that "if you intend to weigh the sugar as it is tendered to you, it will be necessary for you to have at least two scales to each derrick." He was also told that, failing his receiving the sugar as fast as the ship could tender it, the owner would put the sugar into the shed at his expense in terms of the bills of lading.

The defender took no objection to the rate of discharge proposed by the pursuers, nor at the time of the discharge did he take any objection to the employment by the pursuers of men to clear away accumulations of bags. Further, in the correspondence the pursuers proceeded upon the assumption that the meaning of the bills of lading was that for which they now contend, and the defender took no objection. It was not until the pursuers claimed from the defender payment of the sum now sued for that he maintained that their action was not justified by the bills of lading. In these circumstances, I think that it is somewhat difficult for the defender to maintain that the meaning of the contract is something different from that to which he assented at the time, and upon the faith of which he allowed the pursuer to act and to incur expense.

I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers were justified in acting as they did, and that they are entitled to recover from the defender the expenses reasonably incurred by them in running into the shed sugar consigned to him. The amount paid by the pursuers to their stevedore for running sugar into the sheds was £103, 14s. 7d. The pursuers have divided that amount among the various consignees in proportion to the weight of sugar run into the sheds for each of them. For the defender 468 tons were run in, and his proportion of the total cost, for which the pursuers now sue, is £40, 19s. That is at the rate of 1s. 9d. per ton, which, the defender says, is an excessive charge. In that, I think that he is right. My impression is that the pursuers, in their anxiety to secure that the discharge should not be interrupted, spared no expense. They had a very large number of men upon the quay ready to run the sugar into the sheds directly a block occurred, and the bulk of the men were brought from Glasgow, which, of course, cost more than if they had been hired in Greenock. Then, no independent evidence was led by the pursuers to shew that the charge made by them was a usual and reasonable charge. One witness, however, was adduced by the defender—Mr Harvey, secretary of the Greenock Beetroot Sugar Association—who said: "Part of our business is running in and piling up sugar discharged from steamers at the quays. Our rate therefor is 6d. per ton. I was prepared to run in the cargo in question if that had been ordered." That was the whole of Mr Harvey's evidence, and he was not cross-examined. His evidence, therefore, is not challenged, and I think that it must be held as establishing that the running in of the sugar might have been done for 6d. per ton instead of 1s. 9d. That brings out a sum of £11, 14s., for which I think that the pursuers are entitled to decree.

Lord Ardwall.—I have found this case to be one of much difficulty. If it were a question of demurrage that was here raised, it appears to me that the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Hulthen v. Stewart & Co. ([1903], A.C. 389), affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal, would have been conclusive against the pursuers. But what is here sought to be enforced is a special contract, under which I am of opinion that it was the intention of the parties that should delay occur in the removal of the goods by the consignees from the quay at the ship's side the shipowner should be entitled to employ men to run such goods into the sheds in order to give the steamer quick despatch—that is, despatch as quickly as the goods could be delivered over the ship's side. The document is very obscurely worded, and unless it had been that the parties, both in the correspondence and on record, and at the discussion on the appeal, assumed that what was pointed at in the bill of lading was charges for removing goods from the side of the quay after they had been put over the ship's side, I should have had great difficulty in construing the clause at all. I think that the proviso "any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding" prevents the defenders from pleading, as they might otherwise have done, that the block was caused by their endeavouring to weigh the sugar before it was put into the sheds. Therefore it must be taken that their obligation was to prevent the front of the quay from being blocked by goods, either by having two weighing machines opposite each hold to weigh the sugar as quickly as the ship could deliver it, or, failing that, to run the sugar straight into the sheds, leaving it to be weighed afterwards, which was what actually was done with a considerable portion of the cargo in question. I do not go further into detail either with regard to the construction of the bill of lading or with regard to the law applicable thereto, as I have had the advantage of reading my brother Lord Low's opinion, and agree with the views which he has expressed. The next question is whether the sum sued for was a charge "necessary for the steamer's quick despatch," for it is only such charges which, according to the bill of lading, are "to be paid by the owner or consignee of the goods." Now I think it is clearly proved that from time to time in the discharge of this steamer a block took place, and that these blocks were removed by the intervention of stevedores' men provided by the shipowners. This being so, the only remaining question is as to the amount of these charges. Now I think it clear that the shipowners here set about the business of discharging the vessel in a most extravagant manner. They did not content themselves with getting stevedores or quay porters at Greenock but brought them all the way from Glasgow, and brought them in quite unnecessary numbers. It is proved by the uncontradicted evidence of Mr Harvey, a witness for the defenders, that 6d. per ton is a sufficient allowance for running in and piling sugar from the quays into the sheds, and I think it is only that sum that should be allowed in the present case. It is said that there were 468 tons run in, and at 6d. per ton this amounts to £11, 14s.—and for this amount I think the pursuers are entitled to decree.

I think it right to add that it appears to me that the clause under discussion, which, it seems, is a new one, is not much of an improvement upon the clauses hitherto in use in bills of lading, and instead of being ultimately of any benefit to shipowners, is likely to cost them a good deal more money than is saved, at all events if they follow the course that was adopted by the shipowners in the present case; and I must also add that although I think that, on a sound construction of the peculiar contract which the parties agreed to enter into by the bill of lading, the pursuers were entitled to intervéne so as to hasten on as they did the despatch of the vessel, yet the time saved was of comparatively small amount, and was really not worth all the trouble and expense which the shipowners put themselves to; indeed, it appears on the evidence they would have saved as much time if, instead of beginning the discharge of the vessel on the 28th, they had commenced it immediately on her arrival on the afternoon of the previous day, and been content with the usual rate of discharge of sugar cargoes at Greenock.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I am sorry that I cannot reach the conclusion at which your Lordships have arrived. The action is one by shipowners against the consignees of part of a cargo of sugar carried by the pursuers in a general ship to the port of Greenock. The claim is not for demurrage, but for a contractual substitute therefor. The clause in the bill of lading on which the action is laid is in these terms:—"The goods to be received by the consignee from ship's tackles as fast as the steamer can deliver, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding, and all charges after being discharged necessary for the steamer's quick despatch to be paid by the owner or consignee of the goods." The pursuers say that they incurred certain charges to a stevedore from Glasgow in landing and removing cargo consequent on failure to take delivery from ship's tackles as fast as steamer could deliver it, and the proportion of these charges applicable to the defender's consignment (which consisted roughly of about two-thirds of the total cargo), the pursuers estimate, so far as handled by their men, at £40, 19s. It is plain, and was indeed admitted by the pursuers' counsel, that this estimate must, in any view, suffer considerable deductions in amount.

The Sheriff-Substitute, from whom the appeal is brought, has found that the pursuers have not proved that the sum sued for consists of "charges incurred after being discharged necessary for the steamer's quick despatch," in terms of the bill of lading, and he accordingly has assoilzied the defender, with expenses. I am of opinion that the Sheriff-Substitute's interlocutor ought to be affirmed.

The proposition which lies at the root of the pursuers' case is that the clause in the bill of lading requiring "the goods to be received by the consignee from ship's tackles as fast as the steamer can deliver, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding," is practically equivalent to a clause fixing the number of days or hours during which the discharge is to be completed. It is true, they say, that a definite period of time is not prescribed, but a standard is fixed, viz. the ship's capacity for discharge when her tackles are working as fast as they can, and this standard must be perfectly well known to the shipowner, and can be ascertained by the charterer or consignee if he takes the trouble to inquire. There is nothing, therefore, they say, vague or uncertain about a clause so read, which imports a mechanical equivalent for a definite period of time, and there is no reason for attaching to it different consequences from a clause laying down in plain terms a certain number of days or hours for the discharge. Unfortunately for this argument, the point has been considered and determined the other way in a recent judgment of the House of Lords, Hulthen v. Stewart & Co. [1903], A.C. 389, affirming a decision of the Court of Appeal reported [1902] 2 K.B. 199. The claim in that case was no doubt one for demurrage, while here it is a claim for something in the nature of demurrage, and is intended to have the same deterrent effect. Demurrage being simply "the agreed-on amount of damage which is to be paid for the delay of the ship caused by a default of the charterers at either the commencement or the end of the voyage," a demurrage clause has been held elastic enough to cover damage caused in that way as being "in the nature of demurrage" (see case of Harris, 1885, L.R. 15 Q.B.D. 247). Hulthen's case, therefore, seems to me directly in point—as a case either of demurrage, or of something in the nature of demurrage. If the view had prevailed that the two clauses were practically identical (the clause, I mean, fixing a mechanical equivalent, and the clause fixing a definite period of time), the obligation in the case before us would have had to be construed as an unconditional one on the part of the consignee to take delivery within the time which could be shown to be the utmost capacity of the ship's tackles to give delivery, without regard to the actual circumstances of the case, just as if a definite time had been prescribed. But what say the noble and learned lords? After stating the opposing contentions, and explaining how the case would stand if there were no authority on the subject, Lord Macnaghten said: "It is certainly satisfatory to find that there is a series of decisions, some in this House and others of great weight both in this country and in Scotland, which leave little or no room for argument. It is, I think, established that, in order to make a charterer unconditionally liable, it is not enough to stipulate that the cargo is to be discharged 'with all despatch,' or as 'fast as steamer can deliver,' or to use expressions of that sort. In order to impose such a liability, the language used must in plain and unambiguous terms define and specify the period of time within which delivery of the cargo is to be accomplished." This passage expresses the ground of a unanimous judgment as to the effect of a clause providing for discharge "with customary steamship despatch, as fast as the steamer can deliver," which, in substance, is just the clause here, and the words which here follow, 'any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding,' obviously make no difference, seeing that no peculiar or exceptional custom of the port of Greenock which could affect the matter one way or other was proved.

The case, therefore, presents itself to my mind as one in which the consignee was under no absolute and unconditional obligation to take delivery within a specified time, but in which his obligation was limited to taking delivery within a reasonable time, so as to allow of the steamer's "quick despatch," having regard to all the existing circumstances. Again, you have no expression defining the precise time when the ship was to be ready for despatch. All is left to the rather vague word "quick," which is the more remarkable as the precise date when the vessel was due to sail from Glasgow (6th July) was known as early as 23rd June. She arrived on 27th June and was berthed in the James Watt Dock, Greenock, the same afternoon. The defender was instructed to be ready to take delivery at 7 a.m. on the morning of the 28th, though why the shipowners, if they were so anxious for the utmost promptitude, should have made up their minds to sacrifice some working hours on the 27th does not very clearly appear. It rather appears from their agent's letter of 26th June that they had even then resolved to bring down a special force of stevedores from Glasgow, and they brought five gangs of sixteen men each—in all eighty men—who were largely employed in running-in the sugar into sheds without taking time to have it weighed. The Sheriff-Substitute is of opinion that this mode of working created confusion and delayed operations on the quay, which I think stands to reason. But he admits that running-in sugar into the sheds without weighing it would have saved some time, although he thinks that weighing before shedding is the more natural course, both to ascertain the freight and for customs purposes, and it was not certainly either contrary to custom or to contract, for the shipowners contemplated weighing the sugar as delivered when they wrote the letter of 26th June, in which they suggested the providing of a double set of scales at all the hatches. I cannot assent to the view that the shipowner was entitled to prescribe to the consignee either the precise rate or mode of delivery. All that he was entitled to require was that the rate should be reasonably rapid, under the sanction that, if it were not so, the shipowner might incur charges which were "necessary" for the steamer's quick despatch, and charge them against the consignee. As a matter of fact the ship was discharged at the rate actually employed in thirty-six and a half hours, which involved no great delay, and the Sheriff, who saw the witnesses, describes the kind of evidence which satisfied him that there was no unreasonable delay on the defender's part. Certainly the pursuers are not entitled to charge against the defender expenses which they intentionally incurred, unless they can shew that these expenses were "necessary for the steamer's quick despatch." Therefore I concur in the Sheriff-Substitute's negative finding as to the effect of the proof. I do not find a syllable of evidence to the effect that the vessel was prevented by any delay on the defender's part from sailing on her appointed day, or that she would have been so prevented unless the pursuers had used the extraordinary exertions which they did. How, then, can it be said that any part of these expenses were "necessarily" incurred for that purpose?

The moment you reach the conclusion that the obligation to take delivery "as fast as the steamer can deliver" is not an absolute obligation, and that all the circumstances must be taken into account in order to judge whether the defender has acted reasonably or not, I think it is impossible to lay your finger on any definite failure in fulfilling his obligation to take delivery. If shipowners are desirous to lay new liabilities on charterers or consignees, they must be prepared to express these liabilities in what Lord Macnaghten describes as "plain and unambiguous terms." I think they have failed to do so in this bill of lading, and therefore I should be for affirming the judgment appealed from.—31*st January* 1908.

314. Mackison's Trustees v. The Magistrates of Dundee.

Contract — Contract of Employment—Extra Services—Burgh Surveyor and Sanitary Inspector Salaried—Work Done as Parliamentary Engineer — Circumstances Where Held Employee Had No Right to Extra Remuneration.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. p. 676.)

This was an action brought by the late William Mackison against the Magistrates of the City of Dundee. The pursuer died during the course of the proceedings, but his testamentary trustees insisted in the action after his death. The pursuer was appointed "Surveyor of Police" to the burgh of Dundee in March 1868, and "Sanitary Inspector" in July of the same year. In this action the pursuer said that the defenders owed him (1) thirty-eight years' arrears of salary as sanitary inspector at £100 per annum; and (2) a sum amounting to £45,801 for work done by him as an engineer and architect in connection with a series of muncipal undertakings extending over the whole period of thirty-eight years, all which he alleged to be "outside the scope of the pursuer's official duties as surveyor of police and sanitary inspector." But he restricted his claim in the summons to £15,000. The Lord Ordinary (Lord Ardwall) having decided (Vol. XIV. p. 676) that it was competent to sue for a restricted sum although the pursuer gave no indication of the basis of his calculations or the proportions in which he intended to restrict the various items of his claim, proof was led on the whole history of the relationships between the parties. The defenders maintained that they had originally engaged the pursuer at a salary of £400 per annum, subsequently increased to £500, which covered all the duties performed by him. The facts proved sufficiently appear from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, who held that the pursuer had failed to establish that the defenders had impliedly contracted to pay professional fees to him, and that all the work done came within the scope of his appointment as burgh engineer and sanitary inspector.

Lord Guthrie.—This action was instituted by the late Mr William Mackison, who was Burgh Surveyer of Police for Dundee from 1868 to 1906, and is now insisted in by his trustees. Mr Mackison died on 24th November 1906, before the proof was led. The summons concludes for a sum of £15,000. But that sum does not represent what the late pursuer estimated as the full measure of his rights. According to Condescendence 12, he was entitled to £49,601, made up of £3800 for arrears of salary as Sanitary Inspector and £45,801 for alleged extra work done in the Burgh Surveyor's department, but said not to be covered by the Burgh Surveyor's salary, this latter sum of £45,801 representing "the ordinary charges made by engineers and architects for similar work." Although maintaining legal right to the above-mentioned sum of £49,601, the late pursuer restricted his claim in the summons to £15,000, but on what basis his son, Mr J. W. Mackison, is unable to explain. Mr Carter, C.E., with whom Mr Bennett, C.E., substantially concurred, priced the claim for extra work at £19,584, which being added to arrears of sanitary inspector's salary makes a total now claimed to be legally due of £23,384, as against the above sum of £49,601, subject to a certain deduction from the claim for extra work, to be afterwards referred to.

1. Arrears of salary as Sanitary Inspector, from date of appointment on 16th July 1868 to date of summons, amounting to £3800.

The defenders admit that the late pursuer was appointed on 16th July 1868 Sanitary Inspector for the united parish of Liff and Benvie, within which the burgh of Dundee is situated; that the said appointment was never recalled; and that in some of the defenders' annual Government returns Mr Mackison was entered as one of the Sanitary Inspectors.

Prima facie, therefore, apart from amount, the late pursuer made a good claim under this head, which it lay on the defenders to displace. In my opinion they have done so. They have proved (1) that, as in a question between the Police Commissioners and Mr Mackison, his salary for the two offices of Police Surveyor and Sanitary Inspector was fixed at £400, which salary, or an increased amount, was regularly thereafter paid to him; and (2) that no work as Sanitary Inspector, separate from his work as Burgh Surveyor, was ever done by Mr Mackison, the whole separate duties having been discharged with a separate staff and separate books, in a separate office, by Mr Thomas Kinnear, who had been Inspector of Nuisances from 1867, and who was also appointed Sanitary Inspector for the same area within five months of the late pursuer's appointment, and who was regularly paid a salary therefor. The late pursuer's appointment was always treated as, and was, in fact, nominal. With the arrangements in 1868 between the Police Commissioners, the defenders' predecessors, and the Board of Supervision, under which not a separate salary, but the proportion of the late pursuer's total salary, payable in respect of his appointment as Sanitary Inspector, was fixed at £100 per annum, the late pursuer had no concern. If he ever knew of that arrangement, he must also have known that, notwithstanding thereof, only £25 was entered in the Burgh Treasurer's books annually between 1868 and 1875 under this head, reduced after 1891 to £5 annually, which nominal sum of £5 has been regularly entered in the annual returns made to the Local Government Board since 1891, as Mr Mackison's salary as Sanitary Inspector. The nominal nature of Mr Mackison's appointment is demonstrated by the fact that no claim, or hint of a claim, under this head was ever made by him until the question arose which led to his dismissal as Burgh Surveyor. The claim, if it existed, was liquid and instantly provable. There was no reason why Mr Mackison should not have insisted in it if it was a good claim. It is an afterthought, due probably not to Mr Mackison, but to his advisers.

2. Claim for alleged extra work done in the Burgh Surveyor's department, but said not to be covered by the Burgh Surveyor's salary, amounting to £45,801.

The onus of proving this claim seems to me to rest throughout on the pursuers. In the pursuers' favour these points are proved: First, Mr Mackison worked personally, and supervised his subordinates to an extent in excess of what was contemplated at the time of his appointment. During his term of office the municipal area was doubled, so was the length of the sewers, while the population was almost doubled, and the assessable rental was more than doubled. Second, from time to time, prior to 1894, he indicated to the Police Commissioners, the defenders' predecessors, or to Committees of their number, or to individual members and officials, and, subsequently to 1894, to the defenders or to Committees of their number, or to individual members and officials, the existence of a duty on the part of both bodies to remunerate him for the extra work now in question, or some of it, in addition to his salary as Burgh Surveyor. Third, both among members of the Police Commission prior to 1894, and among members of the Town Council since 1894, there has existed throughout a feeling that Mr Mackison ought to receive some extra payment in addition to his salary.

Outer House. Lord Guthrie.

On the other hand, there are striking considerations against the pursuers' case as stated on record, which, in my opinion, they have failed to meet. In the first place, they claim for services over thirty-eight years—from 18th May 1868, when Mr Mackison was appointed Burgh Surveyor of Police for Dundee, to 19th July 1906, when his office ended—the earliest items being thus within two years of extinction by the long negative prescription. Mr Mackison was not a man of private means; his salary did not exceed £500; and the Burgh of Dundee has never been in financial difficulties. In the second place, no interest is claimed on the sum said to have been payable from time to time to Mr Mackison for services rendered beyond the duties covered by his salary as Burgh Engineer, thus resulting, if the claim now made is a good one, in a loss to his estate of at least as large a sum as that for which the defenders are said to be liable. In the third place, the capital sum claimed from the defenders has been arbitrarily restricted to £15,000 out of the £49,601 (including the arrears of sanitary inspector's salary) alleged in the summons and memorandum No. 6 of process to be due. In the fourth place, while it is alleged that Mr Mackison from time to time brought the existence of the present claim for the extra work now specified, or some of it, under the notice of the defenders and their predecessors, it is admitted that he never tabled any complete priced demand, either slump or detailed, until the present action was brought. Mr J. W. Mackison deponed: "Unless it be 1871 and 1878, Mr Mackison never made a money claim against the town for these specific works that are mentioned here." Even when the memorandum was submitted to the defenders in 1906 no prices were given. And any particular note of charges made up by Mr Mackison seems to have been on a different basis from that on which the claim is now made. For instance, his note referring to the 1878 bill (page 200 of No. 265) amounts to £721 8s.; and it is stated in the memorandum (page 11) that if the fees there charged "had been priced according to the ordinary professional scale they would have been several times the amount charged." Yet under this head Mr Carter only allows £200, after deduction of one-third for use of the office staff.

The basis of the pursuers' claim is thus stated in Cond. 8:—"In particular, the pursuer was employed by the defenders and their predecessors as their engineer in regard to the following Bills and Acts, and for the execution of the works thereby authorised, and for the other works after referred to, on the footing and agreement in every case that he was to be paid the usual professional charges, under deduction of office charges and expenses. The pursuer accepted said employment and acted as such engineer in connection with said Bills and work, and did all the work in question. No part of the said work fell within the scope of the pursuer's duties as surveyor of police or sanitary inspector." And plea 1 is as follows: "The defenders and their predecessors having employed the pursuer to act as their parliamentary engineer, and as their engineer, architect, and surveyor for the execution of the works authorised by their own special Acts of Parliament, and otherwise, on the footing and agreement that he was to be paid all as condescended on, are bound to pay the pursuer in respect of the work done and services thus rendered by him, and decree should be pronounced in terms of the conclusion of the summons, with expenses."

No case of bar is made in respect of Mr Mackison having been induced, fraudulently and otherwise, to perform the services in question on the faith that he would be remunerated for doing so apart from his salary. Had this been the basis of claim, I presume the amount would have been calculated on quantum meruit. But no materials have been put before me for an estimate on that basis. From beginning to end Mr Mackison never kept any details of the alleged extra work done by him.

As to the mode of estimating the pursuers' claim, it was made up by Mr Mackison and has been spoken to by his son and Mr Carter and Mr Bennett, apart from charges of supervision and maintenance, on the footing of a percentage on cost, as if Mr Mackison had been an outside engineer, subject to deduction of one-third, on account of the saving to him through the employment of the town's official staff. It may be noted that although Mr Carter and Mr Bennett proceed, like the memorandum, on a percentage on cost, the percentages are very different. For instance, Mr Mackison's claim for £3000 on p. 22, letter D., of the memorandum is cut down by Mr Carter and Mr Bennett to £350. Again, as to the proper deduction on account of use of office staff, Messrs Carter and Bennett have only allowed one-third, but Mr J. W. Mackison says his father counted it at 40 per cent.

The pursuer's case then is (a) express employment by the defenders and their predecessors, to do the work in question for remuneration separate from his salary as Burgh Engineer; (b) such remuneration to be calculated on the same footing as if Mr Mackison had been an outside engineer; but (c) such remuneration, so calculated, to be subject to deduction of one-third of an outside engineer's charges, on account of Mr Mackison's use of the official staff and premises.

In my opinion, the pursuers have failed to establish (a), (b), and (c), or any of them. I come to this conclusion, not on a balance of evidence, but in the absence of any evidence. No attempt has been made to say when—in 1868 for all future extra work, or from time to time, or how, in writing or verbally, or partly both, or by whom, the defenders and their predecessors as corporate bodies, or by committees or by individuals representing them—any such agreement or agreements were entered into. Nor has any attempt been made to define the standard according to which the parties agreed that work should be considered ordinary or extraordinary. It appears from the evidence of Mr J. W. Mackison that his father was ultimately guided in making the distinction which is the basis of the memorandum by the views of his law agent, Mr Stewart, and other advisers. See the case of Latham, 1866, 4 Macph. 1084.

The pursuer's counsel stated that he did not found any part of his case of agreement on the terms of the minute dated 28th April 1868 containing his appointment; and he admitted that there was no document instructing an agreement between Mr Mackison and his employers as to extra payment for extra work, and no evidence of any meeting between Mr Mackison and his employers at which any such agreement was entered into. The letter of 27th March 1868, founded on in Cond. 2, was not addressed to Mr Mackison, or ever communicated to him. It was further admitted that the minuted instructions by the defenders to Mr Mackison for the alleged extra Parliamentary and other work did not differ substantially in their modes of expression from instructions given for ordinary work. In these circumstances it would be sufficient to hold that the pursuers have failed to prove the only case averred and pled by them on record.

But it is right that I should consider and express an opinion upon the case on which, in the end, the pursuers relied. Their contention is that in the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, written and oral, such an agreement as they have averred must be implied in law, because the work claimed for as extra was essentially different, both in kind and degree, from the work which Mr Mackison was engaged to do, and which was covered by his salary.

In the case of a servant hired for certain work, who, in addition, does other and unrelated work, it may be possible, by that circumstance alone, or by that circumstance taken along with others, to rear up an implication for separate and additional remuneration, which, I suppose, would be calculated on the basis, not as here, of ordinary professional charges, but of quantum meruit, for which, as I have said, there is no material. But in this case I am unable to discover any work, in the office or on the ground, Parliamentary or local, done by Mr Mackison as an engineer, an architect, or a surveyor, which had not a direct relation to his admittedly official work, and which, on his appointment, might not reasonably have been anticipated as likely to arise, although, it may be, not to the extent actually developed. See Mr Mackison's own statement, dated 13th May 1887, and headed "Statement of the Principal Work of the Burgh Engineer's Department," No. 1606 of pro. The pursuers have failed to prove what they allege on record—namely, "No part of the said work fell within the pursuer's duties as Burgh Surveyor or Sanitary Inspector," or that the work in question was "entirely outwith his duties as Surveyor of Police or Sanitary Inspector." With the exception of a part of an outfall sewer at Lochee, the whole work founded on related to ground within the area of the Burgh of Dundee, and it was all done by Mr Mackison's official staff without outside assistance. The esplanade and swimming baths had been the subject of previous discussions; and the Stobsmuir skating ponds were constructed in the time of Fulton, Mr Mackison's predecessor. The needs and prospects of Dundee were well known to Mr Mackison, who received his professional training there. The title of the general Act of 1850, under which the Burgh was administered until the incorporation or adoption of the Lindsay Act in 1871 and 1882, sufficiently shews the wide range of the legislation under which Dundee was governed at the date of Mr Mackison's appointment. It runs: "An Act to make more effectual provision for regulating the police of towns and populous places in Scotland, and for paving, draining, cleansing, lighting, and improving the same." Except in regard to hospitals and tramways, all the subsequent operations authorised and executed in Mr Mackison's time were foreshadowed, if not specifically dealt with, in the Act of 1850, and that Act, by sect. 327, authorised Parliamentary application. The Dundee Roads and Streets Act of 1865 was obtained in the time of Mr Fulton, who was Police Surveyor from 1853 to 1868. An advance from gas to electricity or from horse trams to electric cars did not involve either a difference in kind or an advance beyond reasonable contemplation in 1868. Mr Mackison must have known on his appointment that, sooner or later (indeed, looking to the rapid development and great prosperity of Dundee in 1868, sooner rather than later), Dundee would not be behind other towns in the very schemes of burgh extension, sanitation, removal of slum property, street widening, and provision for the recreation and health of the people which form the subject of Mr Mackison's claim. These schemes were all of them of an ordinary municipal type, not involving the social experiments in which Glasgow has so often been in advance of other towns, nor the abnormal advance of Clydebank materially, or, it is said, of Dunfermline intellectually.

But if the alleged extra work done by Mr Mackison cannot be differentiated in kind from the work admittedly covered by his salary, the pursuers found on the undoubted increase in the amount of work in Mr Mackison's department as sufficient basis for his claim. I say Mr Mackison's department, because it does not follow that Mr Mackison's own work was proportionately increased. The defenders admit Mr Mackison's knowledge and ability in all branches of his work, his ceaseless and disinterested devotion to duty, and the uniform success of everything he undertook. But they claim, I think rightly, that they cannot be called on to make extra payments because, as appears from the evidence, he was a slow worker, hyperscrupulous as to details, and unable in many minor matters to delegate his work to others.

I do not say that an implication of an agreement for separate payment may not conceivably arise from mere increase of amount of work, even in a case where the nature of the work is incapable of differentiation from that for which salary is paid. It is sufficient to say that no such question arises here. While the work immensely increased, Mr Mackison obtained not only ample additional staff for the actual execution of the work, but, in 1875, in Mr James Thomson, a qualified surveyor, civil engineer, and architect, skilled assistance of the best quality for purposes of supervision. So far as I can see, there was no part of the work which Mr Mackison might not have delegated at any time to Mr Thomson, with safety to the work itself and with satisfaction to his employers. Employers ordering additional work may either increase the salary of the same staff or may increase the staff and pay the same salary to the old employees. So far as Mr Mackison was concerned, the defenders seem to me to have taken the latter course. The Burgh Surveyor's office staff increased from 3 in 1868 to 18 in 1906. And it is clear that the staff was increased from time to time, as I think Mr Mackison was originally appointed, with a view to avoid calling in outside assistance either in connection with the ordinary or the extraordinary work of the department.

These observations are, of course, directed to the case made by the pursuers of alleged implication, from the circumstances of an agreement for separate employment, with a corresponding obligation to pay at usual professional rates. It will not avail the pursuers merely to prove, as I think they have done, that the circumstances may have warrantably led to the reasonable expectation, on Mr Mackison's part, of an increase of salary after the last increase in 1873, or of periodical honoraria. The evidence leaves on my mind a regretful impression that Mr Mackison, partly through reluctance to bring matters to an issue (bred of the consciousness that the defenders had, in Mr Thomson, a servant competent at any time to succeed him in every part of his work, ordinary and extraordinary), and partly through the vague impression of a legal claim, undefined in quality and extent, grasped the shadow and missed the substance, which he might have obtained, either in the shape of increased salary or honoraria.

Of admissions of legal liability by the defenders I can find no trace. That other officials, like Sir Thomas Thornton, or that Provost Hunter or other individual members of the Council held that Mr Mackison had a legal claim, will not avail. Nor would evidence that all the defenders as a body and all the other officials thought that Mr Mackison had an equitable claim to honoraria. As to Sir Thomas Thornton, it seems clear that he thought Mr Mackison underpaid. Indeed it is said that, in connection with the 1871 Act, Sir Thomas estimated Mr Mackison's services at £1000, while Mr Carter only estimates them at £500, which, deducting one-third for use of staff and premises, and giving credit for the £100 paid as honorarium, becomes £234. But in any case I cannot imagine that a man of business of the strenuous type of Sir Thomas Thornton, if he believed, as a lawyer, that Mr Mackison had a legal claim against the Town Council, would have been so remiss in his duty to the Council, a shifting body of employers, and to the ratepayers of Dundee, a shifting body of debtors, as to allow such a claim to run on from year to year without the question being brought to an issue, while the whole evidence, oral and documentary, was still fresh. I go further: I cannot believe that Mr Mackison ever made it plain to Sir Thomas that he (Mr Mackison) believed he had any such legal right. No one ever associated the policy of drift with Sir Thomas Thornton.

The pursuers have to prove their case, and their failure to do so is sufficient warrant for absolvitor. But it would not be right to ignore the formidable case made by the defenders.

The defenders' counter case, apart from the points already dealt with, rests on—

1. Their advertisement in 1868, No. 9 of process, and Mr Mackison's application, No. 1381 of process.

These documents, in their references to the qualifications of an architect, engineer, and surveyor, embrace all the qualifications necessary for the execution of all the work in the pursuers' claim. Yet, according to Mr J. W. Mackison, his father has claimed on the footing that any work involving an architectural design was outside his official duties, and falls to be charged as extra work, his view having been that his official duties were limited to paving, sewerage, and roads.

2. The terms of the pursuer's appointment.

Mr Mackison succeeded Mr Fulton, who did the ordinary duties of his office, and also extraordinary work connected with the Act of 1865, as well as preliminary work preparatory to the application for the Act ultimately obtained in 1871. It must be held, in absence of evidence to the contrary, that Mr Fulton neither claimed nor received any extra payment (except, possibly, by way of honorarium) in addition to his salary, which, beginning at £250, was gradually increased to £400. In these circumstances Mr Mackison was bound, if he meant to take office on a different footing from his predecessor, to have made this plain either in his appointment or in a separate document. So far from the minute of appointment making this plain, it seems to me that by it Mr Mackison put his knowledge and skill, so far as relating to all work for which his training had fitted him, and his time, at the disposal of his employers. He became bound "to devote all his services to the business of the Commissioners"; and he was appointed "during the pleasure of the Commissioners of Police, with all the powers and authorities belonging to the office of surveyor, and subject to such conditions and regulations regarding his duties and the mode of performing them as may be made and prescribed by the Commissioners from time to time." The case would have been different if he had been asked and, without any stipulation as to remuneration, had agreed to do and actually had done or assisted in doing work in another department, say that of the Town Treasurer. He could have refused to do such work; and if he had been referred to the terms of his appointment which bound him to give his whole services to the business of the Commissioners, he could have successfully maintained that the word "business" only meant work akin to that regularly done in his department, and for which he had special training—the business, in short, of an engineer, an architect, or a surveyor. But there was no part of the alleged extra work which he could have refused to do. If, however, he was of opinion that there was any part of the work in this position, he had ample opportunity to bring his view under the notice of his employers by refusing to do the work without a special antecedent arrangement for separate remuneration. No such antecedent arrangement was ever proposed by him. I may add that neither in the advertisement nor in the minute of appointment is there any reference to the three Acts of 1850, 1856, and 1865, within the scope of which it is said that Mr Mackison's official duties were confined.

3. The terms of Mr Mackison's application for an appointment in Liverpool in 1871, and the testimonials then obtained by him from the Dundee provost, bailies, and a number of chairmen of committees.

By the testimonials dated 22nd and 23rd June 1871, and in terms of his application dated 13th September 1871, Mr Mackison would necessarily lead the Liverpool Town Council to believe that he had been discharging in Dundee for his salary all the duties, both ordinary and extraordinary, falling to his department, and that he was prepared to do the same in Liverpool. Believing as I do in Mr Mackison's high sense of honour, it is facts like these which lead me to question whether, down to near the time of his dismissal, he ever believed that he had, or ever intended to make, a legal claim against the defenders.

4. The extra payments to Mr Mackison on 16th April 1872 and 10th May 1882.

If the terms of Mr Mackison's appointment left his position in regard to extraordinary work in his department uncertain, the question on the pursuers' own shewing was brought to an issue in 1872. According to the pursuers, Mr Mackison then made a claim of about £1000 for services in connection with the Dundee Police and Improvement Act of 1871, on the footing of legal right, conform to the memorandum on page 84 of No. 265 of process, although there is no evidence that that memorandum was ever communicated to the Commissioners. Assume, however, in the pursuers' favour that this communication took place, it was met by an offer on the part of the defenders' predecessors equivalent in law and in fact to a denial of any legal right on his part. A bare refusal to pay might have merely meant that the Police Commissioners did not think Mr Mackison had, in point of fact, performed any extraordinary services. But a proposal to pay honorarium, in response to an application for payment as a legal right, necessarily implied that, while he had performed what might be called in a sense extra services, and while these deserved to be recognised, he had no legal right to payment.

The question having thus sharply arisen, I cannot reconcile the acceptance by Mr Mackison of £100 in terms of Mr Farquharson's letters of 17th and 19th February 1872, on pages 88 and 89, and the receipt of 16th April 1872 on page 91, and Mr Mackison's own entry in the account on page 91/1 of No. 265 of process, with an adherence by him to the legal claim which he is said to have made, and with an agreement that he should be remunerated as of right for similar future services. On the contrary, I regard this transaction as involving an abandonment of any such position, if it was ever taken up, leaving it open for Mr Mackison thereafter to represent, as he unfortunately never did, that if he had been paid an honorarium in connection with the 1871 Act, he should be similarly dealt with in relation to other similar work, and, of course, for the Town Council to reply that the increases of salary in 1873 were meant to come in place of any such payments. The subsequent payment of £50 on 10th May 1882, "for special and extra professional services in connection with the construction of the Perth Road tramways," seems open to similar observations.

5. Mr Mackison's increases of salary in 1873, making his salary £500.

The first of these took place within a few months of the payment of the honorarium of 16th April 1872 in connection with the 1871 Police Act. It is at least suggestive of a recognition by the Police Commissioners that Mr Mackison was now doing more work than contemplated when his original salary was fixed at £400, and of a resolution that, instead of repeating the unsatisfactory, because uncertain, method of honoraria, it would be better to prevent all such questions by an increase of salary. That Mr Mackison's salary was not increased after 1873 was due, I am afraid, to the known existence of a vague claim on his part, undefined in amount and uncertain as to its ground.

6. The fact that in the accounts of the Police Commissioners and of the defenders, made up for the purposes of rating and borrowing and for Government returns, their total liability in connection with the various matters dealt with in the memorandum was calculated, in the knowledge of the late pursuer and without adverse comment by him, without reference to the existence of any of the claims now made.

On the whole matter I grant absolvitor, with expenses. I negative the existence of any agreement, express or implied, between the late Mr Mackison and the defenders or their predecessors, for payment to him by them or any of them for any of the alleged extra work detailed on record and in the memorandum. I have indicated my regret that Mr Mackison did not, in his own interest, bring before the defenders from time to time the large amount of extra work, both in the way of personal initiation and of supervision, entailed on him by the defenders' various schemes for the benefit of Dundee (for which with the exception of the two sums of £100 and £50, while his office staff were paid for overtime, he received no extra remuneration), with reasonable proposals for increase of salary or for honoraria. I have fully in mind the extent to which assistance was rendered to Mr Mackison from time to time, both in the way of an assistant engineer and skilled subordinates. But while I negative legal obligation on the part of the defenders, I feel strongly the difference between the claim for extra work and that made for arrears of salary as sanitary inspector, which I have held bad both in law and in equity. In a question of fair dealing between man and man there is much to be said for some parts of the claim for extra work, and I think that the defenders might well consider whether the case is not one for making a substantial allowance to the pursuers in the shape of such an honorarium, as I think it clear their predecessors would have given from time to time had the matter been put before them by Mr Mackison timeously, in a reasonably detailed form, and moderately estimated. If Mr Mackison neither found Dundee brick nor left it marble, it was in his time and not a little through his ability and devotion to duty, working as he did year after year, early and late, often after office hours, and in his short holidays, that the town was brought into its present high state of municipal efficiency.—11*th January* 1908.

Licensing Laws—Administration—Action of Reduction of Decision of Licensing Appeal Court — Jurisdiction — Appeal Court—Constitution of Appeal Court—Members of Appeal Court Sitting in Causes Where Dominus Litis is Vigilance Association to Which They Are Subscribers—Members of Court Voting Who Had Not Been Present Throughout Whole Proceedings—Appeal Not Instructed by Parties in Whose Name it is Taken—Nullity of Proceedings—Circumstances Where Decisions of Appeal Court Reduced.

These were three actions in which publicans in Glasgow who had been deprived of their licences at meetings of the Licensing Appeal Court in May 1907 sought to have the decrees of the Court reduced. The first ground of action upon which they proceeded was that the meeting of the members of the Appeal Court which dealt with the licences in question on 7th and 8th May 1907 was not validly convened.

The Lord Ordinary repelled this plea after discussion in the Procedure Roll upon 20th December 1907, and allowed a proof before answer upon the other pleas in the case.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia (the second and third pleas applying only to Cassidy), as follows:—

"2. The appeal against the renewal of pursuers' certificate not having been instructed or authorised by the parties in whose name it was presented and insisted in, there was no competent appeal before the Court, and the pursuer is therefore entitled to decree as concluded for.

"3. The said appeal having been taken and insisted in for and on behalf of the said Citizens' Vigilance Association, and certain members of and subscribers to said Association having taken part in the discussion and determination thereof, the decision of the Appeal Court should be reduced as concluded for.

"5. The said determination of the Appeal Court is inept and invalid, in respect certain members of the Court who took part therein had not been present during the proceedings, and were thus not qualified to act or vote in the matter."

The facts of the case and the contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note. The Lord Ordinary sustained the second, third and fifth pleas of the pursuers (in Cassidy's case the second and third).

Lord Johnston.—In these cases, which are raised for setting aside, at the instance of three licence-holders in Glasgow—Goodall, Cassidy, and M'Lean—the deliverances of the Glasgow Spring Licensing Appeal Court of 1907, sustaining appeals against deliverances of the Licensing Court renewing their certificates, I have already disposed of the first ground of action, holding the Licensing Appeal Court held on 7th and 8th May 1907 to have been validly convened and constituted, and have accordingly repelled the first plea in law for each of the pursuers.

It now falls to consider the remaining grounds of action, which are threefold.

First, that the appeals against the renewals of the pursuers' certificates were not instructed or authorised by the parties in whose names they were presented and insisted in, but by or on behalf of a certain association styled the Citizens' Vigilance Association, which had no locus standi to be heard in the matter, and therefore that there were no competent appeals before the Court.

Second, that the appeals having been taken and insisted in for and on behalf of the said Citizens' Vigilance Association, certain members of and subscribers to that Association sat as members of the Appeal Court and took part in the determination of the appeals, which rendered the proceedings null; and,

Third, that certain members of the Appeal Court who took part in the determination of the appeals had not been present during the whole of the proceedings, and consequently that their intervention rendered the proceedings null.

The whole of these grounds of action are applicable to the cases of Goodall and M'Lean, but the first and second only are applicable to that of Cassidy. It was arranged that the case of M'Lean should be sisted to await the determination of the other two. Before these grounds of action can be considered, it is necessary to ascertain precisely the true state of facts as disclosed on the proof which has been led. As matter of convenience it was arranged that the proof in Goodall's and Cassidy's cases should be taken together. That proof, exhaustive as it necessarily had to be, has I think been somewhat unduly protracted by the anxiety of the defenders' witnesses to explain away the import of documentary evidence, and considerable discrimination is necessary in order to educe the essential facts.

The defenders are, firstly, certain of the nominal objectors and appellants—objectors in the Licensing Court and appellants in the Appeal Court; and secondly, the members of the city of Glasgow Licensing Appeal Court. The first set of defenders ostensibly defend in their own interest, but it is a question with which I may subsequently have to deal, whether these defences are really proponed in their own interest, or in that of the Citizens' Vigilance Association, or in what circumstances.

I shall for the present confine my attention entirely to the questions of fact raised on the evidence.

The Citizens' Vigilance Association came into existence in 1902, as the outcome of certain public meetings held in Glasgow in the early half of that year. The Association is not in any way a corporate body, but a mere voluntary association. Its constitution, No. 33 of process, is a very brief document. It sets forth as the objects of the Association—

(a) the due enforcement of existing licensing and related laws;

(b) the suppression of drunkenness; and

(c) the promotion of good government in the city.

Despite the best efforts of its officials in the witness-box, I am satisfied from a perusal of its reports, the literature of its propaganda, and the excerpts, which were taken from its minutes and those of its committees for the purpose of showing its objects, and from samples of its correspondence, that the whole raison d'être of the Association was, or at least long before the present question arose had become, the improvement of the licensing administration of the city of Glasgow, and by effecting a reduction of licences to work towards the reduction of intemperance in the city. I cannot find any trace of the third avowed object of the Association, viz the promotion of good government of the city, being prosecuted in any other direction than that of purging the Council in the interest of temperance. But I desire to say that the Association has throughout its history disclaimed the extremes of the temperance movement, and has refused to associate itself with the more extreme organisations of the temperance party. It has never advocated a total abstinence policy, but it has aimed solely at the purification of the city from the charge of being extravagantly overlicensed—a charge in justification of which it had only to refer to the statistics prepared for the licensing authority by the Justice of Peace clerk, No. 20 of process, which discloses the astounding fact that in the Broomielaw, the district in which the public-houses in question are situated, there is one licensed house to every one hundred and twenty-two inhabitants old and young, and to that end it has sought merely to compass the reduction of the temptations to drunkenness, which it conceives to be thrown in the way of the lower classes of the population to an inordinate degree by the overlicensing of the districts in which they congregate. I desire further to state that, though I shall have to criticise its methods and its actings in the present cases, I do not for a moment wish to impute to it anything but the highest motives, or by anything which I may be called on to say to detract from the good which I believe it has done and will still do. These are matters which have no part in determining my judgment. That must depend on a consideration restricted to the facts and law of the actual cases before me.

To return to the constitution. It provides for certain office-bearers to be elected annually, and for the affairs of the Association being managed by an elective board of directors, with power to appoint committees from their own number, supplemented, if expedient, from the General Committee, to deal with any business affecting the work of the Association. This General Committee was to consist of (1) the office-bearers, (2) the directors, (3) the secretary and three representatives from each Vigilance District Committee, and (4) all members of the Association who have subscribed to its funds during the preceding year. Perhaps the main feature of the Association is the District Committees. These were to consist of all the members of the Association residing in each municipal ward—district and ward being synonymous. Their duties were to be "to report any breaches of the Licensing Acts, to assist the authorities in preventing irregularities, and periodically to review the condition of the ward with regard to licensed premises; also to co-operate with the directors for the selection of suitable candidates for the Town Council, and in the promotion of good government in the city."

As regards membership it was provided that "all who approve of the objects of the Association and who are willing to assist in carrying them out may be enrolled as members. All members are invited to subscribe to the funds of the Association." It is thus made clear that subscription to the funds was not made essential to membership. But it has been strenuously maintained that subscription to the funds did not in itself constitute membership. In this, so far as concerns the question raised in this case, I cannot concur.

The Association has been in the custom of enrolling as members at its public meetings and on separate occasions sympathisers and those willing to assist, by obtaining their signatures to a form, a specimen of which is No. 93 of process. Its terms involved no obligation to subscribe or afford financial support. And a roll of members has been, with some attempts at accuracy, kept, by wards, in the ledger No. 103 of process. None of the forms signed have been retained, and there is, I think, reason to believe that the names of many persons who have never been subscribers, as well as of some at least of those who have been subscribers, have been entered on this roll, though they have never signed a membership form. I do not, however, rest my opinion that subscription to the funds of the Association constituted membership upon these details, but on the consideration that it is impossible to conceive of a subscriber to this Association who has not all the essentials of membership, who does not approve of its objects, and who is not willing to assist and does not substantially assist in carrying them out. As I think is clearly shewn by the whole documentary evidence, financial support was essentially necessary, and was, in fact, the most important assistance that could be afforded; and looking to the terms of its constitution and its mode of conducting its business, I cannot regard a subscriber as other than a member of this very loosely knit Association. On the roll of members, as stated by Mr Wedderburn in his evidence, there are still standing about 1850 names, and about 450 more have been scored out, as presumably having ceased to be members. But the total subscribers from first to last, whose names appear in the treasurer's accounts from the formation of the Association (the account for one year having at the date of Mr Wedderburn's evidence gone amissing), is only 282; and of these 282 subscribers only 168 are found among those entered on the roll of members. The importance of this matter is in its bearing upon the question of whether certain of the members of the Licensing Appeal Court were members of the Association. I hold that if they were subscribers they were essentially members, whether their names appeared on the roll of members or not. In point of fact, subscription is, to my mind, more emphatic proof of membership than enrolment. The so-called enrolment slips are not extant, and there is nothing to prove the justification of the enrolment. In one very crucial instance—that of Mr W. F. Anderson, one of the members of the Appeal Court, who is to be found enrolled as a member in No. 10 or Exchange Ward, though his name is now deleted—Mr Anderson denies that he ever was a member or gave any justification for his enrolment, and the same may possibly be said with equal justice of others. On the other hand, as direct proof of subscription we have the receipts for subscriptions in one or two cases and the receipt counterfoils in, I understand, all cases.

After it was formed the Association immediately set itself to the work of opposing the granting of any new licences and of influencing to the utmost of its power a reduction in the number of old licences. For information as to its proceedings I rely much more confidently upon the documentary productions than upon the parole evidence of its officials and supporters. These documents are the Annual Reports of the Association from the year 1902–3 to the year 1906–7, Nos. 34 to 38 of process, its pamphlet or fly-leaf literature, of which Nos. 39 to 47 are examples, a sample of its correspondence, No. 69 of process, its treasurer's accounts, Nos. 55, 56, 105, 57 and 58, and the excerpts from its law agent's books, No. 31 of process. I cannot, except at inordinate length, refer to these items of evidence in detail, and shall content myself with a summary of the matters which I hold them to establish.

The Association at its inception appointed Mr James Stewart, writer, Glasgow, its law agent. Mr Stewart became clerk to the Justices of Peace of the county of the city of Glasgow in the spring of 1906, and before the spring Licensing Courts of that year. He was succeeded by Mr Robert Kyle, writer, Glasgow. The Association's law agent was paid by a salary; and while his appointment was general, there cannot, I think, be any question that practically his sole duty to the Association was to give his services in the Licensing Courts in opposing the granting and renewing of licences, and this duty these two gentlemen in succession appear to have performed with ability and with considerable success. But neither under the old law, nor since the Act of 1903 came into operation, could the Association, as an Association, have any locus standi to be heard in the Licensing Courts. It necessarily had to act through the medium of competent objectors and appellants. And these had to be found. The method of proceeding was not uniform throughout the whole period of the Association's existence, nor even with reference to any one Court sittings. It varied from time to time, and it also varied with circumstances. Excerpts from three different minute-books are produced, No. 67 of process being, I understand, from the General Minute Book of the Association, No. 65 of process from the Licensing Laws Executive Committee Minute-Book, and No. 66 of process from the minute-book of a sub-committee the precise composition and powers of which I have no means of ascertaining, nor wherein it differed from the Licensing Laws Executive Committee, with which it was co-existent.

The evidence of the Association's officials notwithstanding, I am satisfied that the course which the Association took was to select the more congested areas of the more congested wards of the city—congested in reference not merely to population, but to the numbers of existing public-houses; congestion indeed in the mouth of the Association means the existence of an excessive number of public-houses in any area compared with the population. Having fixed on the district, the committee or committees of the Association then, with the assistance of that district's Vigilance Committee, marked down the licences to be made subject of attack. And the next step was to find competent local objectors. This matter was left largely to the District Vigilance Committees, but their efforts were sometimes supplemented by the services of a paid assistant. It is, at the same time, right to say that the Association was sometimes, and probably more frequently latterly, aided by the voluntary intervention of persons locally interested, and particularly of the office-bearers of local churches. But however they were found, there is no doubt that the nominal objectors were generally obtained by canvassing in one form or another, and were rarely, if ever, people who came forward of their own accord. There was seldom anything said about the expense of lodging and supporting the objections. It was tacitly assumed that the Association undertook the whole burden and expense connected with lodging and supporting the objections. Farther, having found the objectors, the Association took absolute possession and control of their objections. The practice was to obtain a mandate from the objectors to oppose a certain licence, in favour of the Association's law agent. The law agent then lodged objections under his own hand in name of the objectors, and the nominal objectors were no further concerned or communicated with. They were not, unless in very exceptional instances, called as witnesses, and they were not, so far as I can see, consulted as to appeals! The Association's law agent, unless in a few very exceptional cases, where churches were concerned, appeared at the Licensing Court and Licensing Appeal Court, and conducted both objections and appeals nominally in name of the objectors, but really on behalf of the Association. This is my conclusion by reason of the direct evidence of the procedure in the present cases, made general in its effect, when taken in conjunction with the terms in which the law agent's reports to the Association's committee are couched, and in which the committees minute their resolutions and directions.

Goodall v. Bilsland and Others. Cassidy v. Bilsland and Others. M'Lean v. Bilsland and Others.

But the two cases with which I am concerned were somewhat different from what I conceive to have been the usual run of things, at least in the earlier history of the Association's activity. I am not sure whether or not the operation of the 1903 Act put difficulties in the way of the Association, but I find it minuted by the Licensing Laws Executive Committee on 7th March 1907, No. 65 of process, that "Mr Kyle stated that an area had been selected, but there was difficulty in getting witnesses. . . . It was agreed to insert advertisements in the morning and evening newspapers regarding the forthcoming Licensing Court on 9th April." This may have been done before, though I find no trace of it, but at any rate there appeared in the "Glasgow Herald" of 27th and 28th March 1907 an advertisement under the heading "Glasgow Public House Licences" in the following terms:

"The Annual Licensing Court begins its sittings in the City Hall, Glasgow, on Tuesday, 9th April, at 11 a.m. The meetings of the Court are open to the public. The list of applications is advertised in the 'Daily Record and Mail' of 27th and 28th March.

"Statutory objections to any house must be lodged not later than Wednesday, 3rd April. All necessary information and guidance can be obtained by citizens willing to help from the Citizens' Vigilance Association, 21 West Nile Street."

This advertisement bore fruit in a call from Mr Ritchie, one of the missionaries of St Mark's Institutional United Free Church, upon Mr Battersby, the organising secretary of the Association, by whom he was directed to Mr Kyle. St Mark's Church has an allied church or mission in Carrick Street, in the Broomielaw Ward, nearly opposite to Cassidy's public-house. Carrick Street is a short side street running from the Broomielaw to Argyle Street. M'Alpine Street is a similar adjoining street parallel to Carrick Street, in which Goodall's public-house is situated, being indeed back to back with Cassidy's. Mr Ritchie and his fellow-workers in the mission had long been keenly anxious, in the interests of their people, for the suppression of these two public-houses; and if the accounts given of their surroundings, or their habitués, and of the scenes enacted in their proximity, are correct, no reasonable person can wonder at their anxiety, and I am perfectly satisfied of their bona fides. At Mr Ritchie's request Mr Kyle went the same evening and met Mr Ritchie and a few of his leading deacons and workers in the vestry of the mission, and they explained to him their view of the position of matters, and he explained to them what was necessary to be done. The result was that he arranged to send to Mr Ritchie a form of mandate, and on Mr Ritchie or his friends getting it filled up with the names of competent objectors, Mr Kyle undertook to lodge objections and conduct their case. Accordingly he at once sent down forms of mandates for, inter alia, both Goodall's and Cassidy's case. I am not concerned with the Association's other operations in this ward, though they were instrumental, I think, in lodging as many as eighteen objections altogether in this one ward. It is necessary to confine attention entirely to the two instances in question.

The form of mandate in Goodall's case—and Cassidy's was in precisely the same terms—was as follows:—

"W. 12, Broomielaw
R.

"Glasgow, March 1907.

(40)

"To Robert Kyle, Esq.,
"Writer,
"45 West Nile Street,
"Glasgow.

"We hereby authorise you to sign and lodge on our behalf objections to the granting of the Certificate for Licence for a public-house applied for by Alexander Goodall for premises at 68 M'Alpine Street, at the forthcoming Licensing Court of the City and Royal Burgh of Glasgow, and to appear on our behalf in support of said Objections."

These and the other mandates, which he had undertaken to get filled up, Mr Ritchie distributed among deacons or others of his workers, who, though they might not live themselves in the district, were familiar with its circumstances and acquainted with their church's people resident in it. James M'Dade took charge of the mandate referring to Goodall's licence, and R. Ferguson and W. Stevenson took charge of that referring to Cassidy's licence. Now these men, though influential members of the mission congregation, were themselves only working men, and though it was carefully explained to them that the only competent objectors were owners or occupiers of property in the neighbourhood of the licensed premises in question, I do not think that they had any very definite idea, which they could explain to others of inferior position and intelligence to themselves, what the precise purpose of the mandate was, and what was intended to follow on it. In Goodall's case M'Dade obtained the signatures of John Green, John M'Leod, John Kennedy (since dead), Isabella Hamilton, Sarah Cairnduff, George Queen, and John Birkby; while in Cassidy's case Ferguson and Stevenson obtained the signatures of Robert Henderson, James Flannagan, W. E. Callaghan, Samuel Austen, Bella Buchanan, Sarah Moore, John Fowler, David Moore, Christina Montgomery, Robert Paterson, James Wilson, John Buchanan, James M'Dade, and J. E. Dryden. Most of these people were examined, and I think that the objections of but a small minority in each case could, on the most benevolent construction, be described as spontaneous, that an analysis of the evidence would shew that a certain section of them wanted any proper occupancy qualification, that a certain section did not understand that they were signing anything more than what I might term a petition to the Licensing Authority against either licences in general, or against the particular licence, which petition was to be presented and would have effect by its own virtue, that a certain section altogether misunderstood the import of the mandate, but that in each case there were two or three of the signatories who were genuinely anxious to see the licences in question suppressed, and were glad to have the opportunity of assisting to that end, and who had a general though indefinite understanding that something was to be done in the Licensing Court by Mr Kyle to effect what they desired. In Goodall's case I might instance John Green and John M'Leod, and in Cassidy's case J. Fowler, R. Henderson, and J. Flannagan. In the latter case even M'Dade, the emissary, does not appear to have understood what was to follow the mandates, and himself rather regarded them as of the nature of a petition to be presented to the Licensing Authority. But I have no doubt that had these, and probably others of the signatories, been approached by Mr Kyle himself or by any one having a full understanding of the situation, they would have willingly joined in going the whole length necessary with a view to obtaining a reduction of the licences in the district. I must add that as regards any expenses which might be incurred in proceeding upon these mandates, this matter does not appear to have occurred to any of the signatories at the time, and so far as they may have had any afterthought on the subject as matters progressed, they seem to have considered that it was their church which was taking the matter up, and that any expenses involved would fall upon it. They knew nothing whatever about the Citizens' Vigilance Association or Mr Kyle's relation to it.

The mandates having been signed, they were sent by Mr Ritchie to Mr Kyle, who prepared the objections No. 24 of process, which were the same in both cases. From this point Mr Kyle had no further communication whatever with the objectors. He acted in their name indeed, but entirely in his character as representing the Vigilance Association. The objections were never submitted to any of the objectors, and the third, viz., "the applicant is not a fit and proper person to hold a public-house licence," they all unanimously disclaimed. Mr Kyle paid the dues to the town clerk on the objections in the Licensing Court, and again the dues to the Justice of Peace clerk for the subsequent appeal to the Licensing Appeal Court. In preparing his evidence he precognosced no objectors, and called no objector as a witness. He prepared the evidence and led it entirely from what with one exception I must term the stock witnesses of the Association, for they appear to repeat their evidence in case after case.

The objections had no success in the Licensing Court, but that fact was not communicated by Mr Kyle to the objectors. Yet notwithstanding this and the terms of his mandate, he presented appeals No. 25 of process in the names of the respective sets of objectors to the Licensing Appeal Court, in which he stated that "the appellants are dissatisfied with the proceedings in the Licensing Court in granting the applications for renewal, and appeal therefrom to the Licensing Appeal Court." But to my mind one of the most pregnant facts in the case is, not merely that Mr Kyle took these appeals along with a great number of others without communication with or authority from his nominal clients, but the terms in which he reported to his committee his dissatisfaction with the decisions of the Licensing Courts and his determination to challenge them before the Appeal Court, and in which they approve his action.

Neither in these appeals did Mr Kyle call any of the objectors as witnesses, and his excuse that he expected them to be called by his opponent is not, I think, ingenuous. In both cases he again called his stock witnesses, who had been already repeatedly examined by him before the Appeal Court as they had been formerly before the Licensing Court, such as Mr J. P. Maclay, Mr Alexander Galbraith, Miss Flora M'Naught, and Mr William M'Ghee, with two others, in Cassidy's case, and Mr James Ritchie, the St Mark's missionary, in Goodall's case. Mr James Ritchie was the only individual called who had any connection with the objectors. Mr J. P. Maclay was one of the leading members of the Association, without whose quite munificent financial support it could hardly have carried on its work.

The appeals came on for hearing—Cassidy's on the 7th and Goodall's on the 8th May 1907, and again Mr Kyle communicated with none of the objectors.

Before touching the progress of the cases in question, it is necessary to go back on certain circumstances which had occurred at earlier sittings of the Appeal Court. That Court included among its members Bailie John Battersby, who was the salaried organising secretary of the Citizens' Vigilance Association. At a preliminary meeting of the Court on 22nd April, Bailie Battersby was one of a small committee nominated to inspect the premises and localities in connection with which appeals had been lodged, with a view to reporting to a private meeting of the members before the sitting of the Appeal Court. (See Minutes of Appeal Court, No. 13 of process, page 16.) Again, at the Appeal Court of 29th April it is minuted (page 22 of said Minutes) that the Court adjourned to discuss certain appeals in private, and that "on their return to Court Bailie Scott asked Bailie Battersby a series of questions as to his connection and position with the Vigilance Committee or Association, and as to his legal right to vote in the Court. The chairman ruled that these questions were not competent for the Court to consider." Notwithstanding this challenge Bailie Battersby continued to sit and vote, and the three appeals in question were sustained by a majority of one—thirteen votes to twelve. In the next appeal, that against the renewal of Mrs Masterton's certificate (page 24 of said Minute), Mr Kyle—who, I may note in passing, regularly appeared for the appellants in all the appeals—"was heard for the appellants, and Mr Campbell for the said Catherine Murray or Masterton. Before proceeding, Mr Campbell requested the clerk to note that he objected to the presence of Bailie Battersby on the bench." Before the next effective sitting, an interdict was presented against Bailie Battersby's taking further part in the proceedings in the Licensing Appeal Court, and when the Court met on 7th May, there was read by the clerk (said Minutes, page 38) a letter from Bailie Battersby in the following terms:—

"139 Rutherglen Road,
"6th May 1907.

"James Stewart, Esq.,
"Clerk to Licensing Appeal Court.

"Dear Sir,

"While maintaining my right to act as a member of the Licensing Appeal Court, I have decided, in order to facilitate the business of the Court, not to attend further the present sittings.

"I am, Yours truly,
"(signed) John Battersby."

I have mentioned these matters, not that they have a direct bearing upon the question at issue, but because they have an indirect but most important bearing upon what follows.

The Court of 7th May proceeded with the appeals, Mr Kyle appearing as usual for the appellants. The first appeal was dismissed. On the second appeal being called Mr Kyle withdrew from that and a number of his other appeals the names of certain of the appellants, who represented societies of which the magistrates were ex officio members, and it was then agreed to adjourn until 2 o'clock p.m. On resuming (said Minutes, page 40), Mr Kyle intimated to the Court that he withdrew the pending appeal and seventeen others—that is to say, eighteen out of the thirty-five appeals in the roll—for all of which, as representing the Vigilance Association, he was responsible. This is another, to my mind, most pregnant piece of evidence. For it betokens that Mr Kyle in doing so assumed such control of the proceedings that he could withdraw appeals without any communication with his nominal clients the objectors, and did so after some hint from the Lord Provost, the precise nature of the communication not appearing. The last appeal to be heard on that day was that against Cassidy's licence, when Mr Kyle appeared for the appellants and Mr J. M. Connell, writer, Glasgow, for Cassidy. This appeal, so far as the minutes shew, was allowed to proceed without any objection to Mr Kyle's locus standi to appear. On Goodall's case being next called, Mr MacQuisten, writer, Glasgow, who appeared for Goodall, took such objection (see No. 61 of process). But as the adjournment of the Court was then moved, nothing further was then done on it.

On the following morning, 8th May, the Appeal Court sat at 11, and the appeal in Goodall's case was at once called. Mr Kyle appeared for the appellants, and Mr MacQuisten for Goodall. "Before hearing agents, Mr MacQuisten intimated that he objected to the status of Mr Kyle as representing the appellants, in respect that he did not represent the appellants, but represented the Citizens' Vigilance Association, who were the true dominus litis in this appeal, and that the said Association was not entitled to appear as appellant in this appeal. The chairman, on the advice of the clerk, ruled that it was incompetent for the Court to consider the point raised by Mr MacQuisten, as Mr Kyle, prima facie, represented persons who were qualified to be heard as objectors under the provisions of the Licensing Act." The case accordingly proceeded, and the appeal was sustained. With reference to this episode I refer to the evidence of Bailies M'Innes Shaw, Thomas Dunlop, and Archibald Campbell. Bailie Shaw stated that all about the Association and Mr Kyle's position was public property. "I understood he was there for objectors, but I understood that the Vigilance Association had him there." "I often wondered why none of the objectors appeared at the Court." "Nothing occurred on that occasion to alter what was my understanding and belief, viz. that Mr Kyle was there prosecuting the appeals on behalf of the Vigilance Association." And Bailie Dunlop stated that he knew all about the Vigilance Association and Mr Kyle, that the chairman took the advice of the clerk of court, who ruled that the matter could not be gone into, and that the rest of the Bench acquiesced in the chairman's ruling. On the other hand, several of the members of the Appeal Court who appeared for the defence professed a surprising ignorance of the Association and its action and of Mr Kyle's connection with it. I regret to find that I have innocently committed myself on this subject by stating in my former judgment, on the objection to the constitution of the Appeal Court, that "it is common knowledge that the Association is a patriotic body, which has done most excellent work in connection with Glasgow municipal affairs." Though apparently the knowledge had not reached members of the Glasgow Licensing Appeal Court, I was personally aware generally of the existence and objects of the Association long before this case arose, from the public press, and I had understood that what I stated was made common ground in the Procedure Roll discussion. Having regard to the history of the Association as disclosed in its own documents, and to the campaign which had been carried on by it for some years, much the same as in the spring Licensing Court of 1907, against the renewal of certificates, through the agency of its two salaried law agents, Mr Stewart and Mr Kyle, the former of whom was sitting as clerk to the Licensing Appeal Court, and the latter appearing for every set of appellants, and looking particularly to what had occurred with regard to Bailie Battersby at the earlier sittings of the last-mentioned Court, I feel the greatest difficulty in accepting that the state of information regarding the Vigilance Association and Mr Kyle of Bailies Shaw, Dunlop, and Campbell, was any different from that of the rest of the Court.

What actually happened was that Mr MacQuisten had cited the whole objectors as his witnesses. What would have been the result of examining them we cannot tell, but on Mr Kyle holding up a sheaf of mandates, without any examination of them, after a short passage between the agents, the clerk's advice was taken, the chairman gave the above ruling, and the Court acquiesced. I think, however, that there must have been some doubt thrown on Mr Kyle's position at some earlier stage of the proceedings of which I have no definite information, and that his sheaf of mandates, I understand in the form of a bound volume, had been handed up to the Bench, turned over by a few of the members, and I must assume examined by the clerk.

There remains one more episode in the proceedings of the Court which must be dealt with. It bears upon the challenge in Goodall's case of the votes of Mr Ross and Mr King, Justices of the Peace. These gentlemen are alleged to have taken their seats on the Bench after the case of Cassidy had proceeded for some time. The witnesses on this subject for the pursuer are Galloway (evidence, page 83), Watson (page 148), and Duncan (page 150), all clerks in the Justice of Peace clerk's office, Glasgow, together with, what is more important, their contemporaneous jottings Nos. 64, 61 and 62 of process respectively. Galloway notes that Mr Ross arrived during the hearing of No. 21 (that is, the appeal in Goodall's case) at 11.25, and that Mr King came in at 12.5. Now Galloway, who was depute clerk on the occasion, says that he had received special instructions from the clerk, Mr Stewart, "to keep a note of those members who arrived after the Court had commenced, and to take a note of the time when they arrived. I carried out those instructions. I took my place at the door of the Court so as to see the members of the Court immediately they came in." He then proved his jotting No. 64 of process, and stated that he handed it to Mr Stewart before the vote was taken, and the Minutes of the Court (No. 13 of process, page 48) bear, "Before proceeding to vote, the clerk called attention to the fact that two of the members (Mr R. G. Ross and John King) had entered the meeting during the hearing of this appeal." Galloway adds that the case lasted till one o'clock.

Watson's evidence is that he took his note No. 61 of process without any special instructions, but thinking it part of his duty. His jotting is rather of the nature of a note for a subsequent minute. It bears, "Wednesday 8th May. 11.5," which I understand was the hour at which business commenced; "Bench 18," presumably the number of members who took their seats at the beginning.

"Case No. 21 (Goodall).

"Mr MacQuisten took obj. to objectors (section 19).

"Mr Russell came on Bench during Mr MacQuisten's objection. Mr Stevenson came in at 11.12.

"Mr Kyle.

"Witnesses, Mr M'Lay, J.P.

"Mr Galbraith (Missionary).

"Mr Ross came in at 12.25, during ex. of Galbraith.

"James Ritchie. Miss M'Naught. (Mann, Byars & Co.).

"M'Ghee, Sanitary Officer."

In the subsequent portion of his notes dealing with the witnesses for Mr MacQuisten there is written on the margin "Mr Ross / " King | after case started." without any hour for Mr King's arrival, but the witness refers to the Roll of Justices, No. 63 of process, kept by him, where opposite to Mr King's name he has written: "12.5. Came in while case in progress."

I am not quite satisfied that the last witness, Duncan, is independent in the details to which he speaks and has noted, but he produces for what it is worth the jotting No. 62 of process, where he has noted "W. F. Russell arrived 11.9, during MacQuisten's objection to Mr Kyle. D. M. Stevenson arrived immediately after. Mr Ross arrived during the cross of Mr Galbraith by F. MacQ." There is no such definite note in the body of the jotting of Mr King's arrival, but in the lower left-hand corner there is "Ross 11.25," "Bailie King 12.5," and a reference to the clerk's statement to the Court as to these gentlemen. I should have said that there is a clock in the Court-room by which these witnesses went. Irrespective of the notes of the particular minute by the clock when these gentlemen joined the Court, there is this important concurrence in all the jottings, viz. that Mr Ross came in during the cross-examination of the second witness for the appellant, and that Mr King came in distinctly later; and I prefer to accept the evidence of two out of these three clerks, supported, though with doubtful effect as above noted, by the third, and founded on contemporaneous memoranda taken in the course of their duty, to the general recollection of Mr Ross and Mr King, and one or two of their colleagues. I think it is therefore proved that these gentlemen, and particularly the latter, took their seats on the Bench after a substantial part of the evidence had been led.

Before leaving the evidence, the only matter which still remains to be considered is the question upon which the second point before me depends, viz. the disqualification of certain members of the Bench by reason that they were members of the Vigilance Association. On this point the averment is: "The following members of said Court are or were then or had previously been members of and subscribers to the said Association, viz. Sir Samuel Chisholm, Bart.; D. M. Stevenson, W. E. Anderson, John King, Robert S. Allan, R. G. Ross, and James Stewart, and are so disqualified. Nevertheless these members took part in the vote against the pursuer and in favour of the said appeals being sustained." I have already referred to the roll of members of and list of subscribers to this Association. With regard to the roll of members I find that three out of the gentlemen named were at one time upon the roll of members, viz. Mr Anderson, Mr Wallace, and Mr Stewart, but that all their names had been deleted. I confess to some doubt on the subject of this deletion. I am not satisfied on the proof as to the time when that deletion was made, and I think it is most unfortunate that the ledger in which the roll was kept was not openly produced to the pursuers at the commission for the recovery of documents. I can see no reason why it was not produced or why there was any difficulty made in connection with its production, and it was ultimately compelled to be produced during the proof. But although I am not satisfied as to the somewhat remarkable fact that all these crucial names turned out to have had a pen drawn through them when that ledger came to be examined—from my point of view this did not matter, because as I have already explained, I hold that a subscriber was, at any rate for the purposes of this case, as much a member—if not more a member—of this Association as any one who was merely enrolled on the members' roll. I therefore turn to the question of subscription, and as a preliminary I must deal with the plea maintained by the learned Lord Advocate to the effect that none of the alleged subscribers had paid their subscription for the year in which the Licensing Appeal Court was held. Now I find that the Association's year runs from the last day of September until the last day of September, and that a number of subscribers were in the custom of giving their subscription at or about a definite time of year: for instance, one in July, another in August, and another in October. Where I find a gentleman a continuous subscriber for a period of years, I cannot hold him to have ceased to be a subscriber because the Association's financial year had run out and because, according to his practice, the time for his paying his subscription had not been reached. I hold such a gentleman to be a subscriber and to remain a subscriber during the current year although he might pay his subscription six or seven or eight months late according to his custom. Now Sir Samuel Chisholm was a subscriber but he had not paid any subscription since July 1905. He was therefore not a subscriber for the year 1905–6, and I cannot therefore hold him to have been a subscriber in the current year 1906–7. Mr Stevenson, on the other hand, had been a regular subscriber, and his custom was to pay his subscription in the month of August, and he paid his last subscription on August 6th, 1906. Notwithstanding that the period at which his subscription would naturally have been paid had not been reached, I hold that he did not cease to be a subscriber at the intermediate period when this Licensing Appeal Court was held, viz. in April and May 1907. Mr R. S. Allan was in the same position: May 10th, 1906, was the date of his last subscription. Sir William Bilsland's firm were in the habit of paying in or about October. They had paid in October 1906, and they were the only ones of these subscribers who paid again—in October 1907. I do not regard that latter payment; but by reason of the payment in October 1906 I hold that they were still subscribers at the date of this Court, and Sir William Bilsland being a partner—the fact that he was senior partner is not material—of that firm, I think that for the purpose of this case he must be held to be a subscriber to the Association through his firm. Mr Wallace, like Sir Samuel Chisholm, had ceased to subscribe in 1905. Mr Alexander Murray was, like Mr Allan, still a subscriber, having paid his subscription in August 1906. The others—Mr Anderson, Mr King, Mr Ross, Mr Stewart, and Mr Stevenson—had never been subscribers at all. The result is that at the date of this Court two of the members of the Court had been subscribers—Sir Samuel Chisholm and Mr Wallace—but had more than a twelvemonth before the Court sat ceased to be subscribers; that Mr Stevenson and Mr Allan had been subscribers and continued to be subscribers, and that Sir William Bilsland, through his firm, was in the same position. I count nothing of the fact that Mr Stevenson and Mr Allan ceased their subscriptions after this question arose. The question is not what in prudence they thought it right to do post litem motam—and I think it was right that they should do it—the question is what was the state of matters as at the date of the Court in question, and at that date they were, in my opinion, subscribers to the Association.

The questions which remain for me to decide are these :—

First, whether the appeals against Goodall's and Cassidy's licences were not, in fact, "taken for and on behalf of the parties whose names they bear, but were prosecuted and insisted in solely by and on behalf of an association in Glasgow known as the Citizens' Vigilance Association, and at its expense."

And if so, must the decisions of the Licensing Appeal Court, which entertained the appeals, be set aside?

But before this question can be disposed of, it is necessary to determine whether the objection can be competently raised before this Court.

On that preliminary point there is considerable difficulty. But on the best consideration I can give to the authorities, I think that the objection can competently be raised and must be considered.

Though there is not now, in the 103rd section of the Licensing Act 1903, such a widely expressed limitation of review as there was under the 34th section of the previous Act of 1862, it has been held authoritatively that, while there is committed to the new Licensing Court and Licensing Appeal Court a privative jurisdiction in the matter of granting and refusing certificates for licences, their decision may yet be reviewed by this Court, if they exceed their statutory jurisdiction. But it has been explained that excess of jurisdiction in this collocation means, not excess of jurisdiction in the narrow and technical sense merely, but also the use of discretion in a manner which is not judicial, not according to reason and justice, but so as flagrantly to violate the conditions of a judicial spirit (Walsh, 7 F. 1009 and L.R. (1907) A.C. 45). The objection, however, in the present case partakes, I think, more of the strict and technical sense.

Sect. 19 of the Act of 1903 gives the power of objecting to the renewal of a certificate, subject to certain exceptions introduced by sect. 20, only to any person or the agent of any person owning or occupying property in the neighbourhood of the licensed premises. Notice specifying the objections must be in writing and served upon the licence-holder. These objections must be heard, and before the renewal can be refused, these objections must be proved to the satisfaction of the Court. It is true that the objector does not become properly a party to a lis, and that his function is rather the informing the Court of what objections there are to the licence being renewed. But notwithstanding, the whole purview of the enactment shews conclusively that it was intended to confine the right to object and to be heard in support of objections, to those locally interested, and it would be contrary to its spirit to allow outsiders to intervene indirectly where they cannot intervene directly.

I had a good deal of argument on the cases in which the question of dominus litis has been raised, but I confess that I do not think them to any extent applicable. These cases divide themselves into two categories—first, those in which the alleged dominus litis has a direct patrimonial interest, but sues or defends in the name of a person who has a title, but either no interest or only a secondary interest; and, second, those in which persons of means put up a man of straw to sue what may be called an actio popularis. Of the first class Fraser v. Malloch (1896), 23 R. 619; Kerr v. Employers' Liability Insurance Co. (1899), 2 F. 17; and Stevenson (1900), 3 F. 182, are examples, and of the latter Jenkins' case (1869), 7 Macph. 739. In both these classes of cases the question is simply one of rendering the true dominus litis liable in expenses, though in the latter the liability for expenses may be be brought home ab ante to the dominus, by making the nominal pursuers find caution for expenses. In neither class of case does the question of title to sue or defend arise. The present case has some of the elements of the actio popularis, and were the case a proper litigation I think that there would have been good grounds for making the nominal objectors find caution for expenses. But the matter is not a litigation, it is a question of statutory right to bring the objectors' views before the Licensing Authority, which is only in a quasi sense a Court, and I think that if the Licensing Authority admits objectors who have no statutory right to be heard, it exceeds its jurisdiction, and in doing so exposes its procedure to review, though not on the merits. There can be no doubt that if the Citizens' Vigilance Association had been admitted as objectors eo nomine, and on their objections either the Licensing Court or the Appeal Court had refused a renewal of certificate, these Courts would have gone contrary to the statute, and that review of their action would not have been excluded. One branch of Walsh's case (supra) bears on this, for proof was allowed as to whether a party claiming the right of privileged objection under the 20th section of the Act really held the position entitling him thereto; and though the Lord Chancellor does say that, in coming to an administrative conclusion on questions of licensing policy, the Licensing Court "may use their own judgment and hear whom they please," I do not understand him by the last words to indicate that that freedom may be exercised independently of the statutory limits.

It may be that there are difficulties in checking the outsider intervening through a man of straw or put-up objector. But there are two sides to this question: the earnest temperance reformer may seek to advance the cause which he has at heart, through the medium of a nominal objector with a title, but the owner of a tied house or rival publican may also seek to obtain a local monopoly by the same means. I do not think that either were intended to have the opportunity. And if by determination of the Licensing Authority they have received the opportunity, that Authority has, in my opinion, overstepped its jurisdiction, and, whatever the difficulty of proof may be, it is, I think, open to this Court to rectify the mistake in an appropriate process such as the present. I conclude therefore that there is no incompetency in raising in this Court the first question which I have to consider.

But that question is a matter of degree. There is no reason why a wealthy individual or a philanthropic association should not find money or skill to assist a poor and bona fide objector to make good his objections. It may be difficult to ascertain when the assistance goes beyond this, but if it can be truly said, adapting the words of the late Lord President in Kerr v. Employers' Liability Insurance Company (supra), to suit the circumstances, "Here was the nominal party ever in Court at all? His name was, but he had nothing to do with the objections or the appeal, having long ago transferred to the Association the right to support the one and prosecute the other," then I think that that point has been reached, and that it is the duty of the Licensing Court to refuse to hear the objections or entertain the appeal, and if they do not do so that their subsequent proceedings are invalidated. Further, in determining the question thus raised, the reality of the situation and not merely the form falls, I think, to be considered.

Now I am not in this case directly concerned with the proceedings in the Licensing Court. Still it is necessary to take a preliminary survey of them. There can, I think, be no doubt that the office-bearers of St Mark's Church Mission were perfectly justified in moving in the matter of these two licences. Irrespective of personal residence in the district, the trustees vested with the property of their premises, whether freehold or leasehold, had a good statutory title to object. So I should be prepared to hold that the Session or even the Deacons' Court had, as representing the mission congregation, even though the church belonged to one of the independent bodies. Nor could there be any objection to the office-bearers assisting local members of the congregation to present and support objections which they personally had, or even arranging that the objections of the general congregation should be put forward in the name of certain local and bona fide objectors. Further, I see no objection to the objectors, whether office-bearers or their bona fide nominees, accepting the assistance of such a body as the Citizens' Vigilance Association and the services of that Association's paid agent. Though the matter was gone about in a very bungling fashion, that was at the outset its true complexion. Had the Association and its agent been content to let things work themselves out on this footing, it would have been difficult to find ground of challenge of what was done. Accordingly, though in reality the complexion of the matter changed as soon as Mr Kyle got his mandate, I think it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to challenge effectually his position and his action in the Licensing Court.

But the initial complexion of the matter had, as I have said, in reality changed, and that change became most tangible the moment the Appeal Court was reached. The objections in the Licensing Court were not really those of the nominal objectors, but of the Association, who, through Mr Kyle, took absolute possession and control of the proceedings from the moment the mandate was in his hands, and in their zeal for licensing reform thought no more of the nominal objectors. In the Licensing Court this was latent; in the Appeal Court it became patent. And it is the procedure in the Appeal Court which is alone in issue, because the pursuers here are content with the decision of the Licensing Court, which in spite of Mr Kyle's objections renewed their licences. Now appeal is provided for by the 22nd section of the 1903 Act, which provides, inter alia, that "if any proprietor or occupier of property in the neighbourhood of such house who has objected before the Licensing Court to the granting or renewal of such certificate, shall be dissatisfied with any proceeding of any Licensing Court assembled for granting certificates as aforesaid, whether in granting or refusing or otherwise disposing of" an application for a certificate or renewal of certificate, it shall be lawful to such proprietor or occupier "to appeal therefrom to the next Court of Appeal from such Licensing Court," provided the appeal be lodged with the clerk to the Appeal Court within ten days, and that the appellant shall intimate the appeal to the opposite party and to the Licensing Court of whose proceeding he complains, and "shall find caution to abide such appeal and the expenses thereof." This appears to me to be an entirely new departure or new proceeding, and one which an agent authorised to lodge objections in the Licensing Court had no right to take without the authority of his client; yet Mr Kyle's mandate, No. 32 of process, merely authorised him to sign and lodge objections on behalf of those who signed the mandate at the forthcoming Licensing Court and to appear on their behalf in support of said objections. Did this justify Mr Kyle, without consulting them, in stating that the objectors were dissatisfied with the decision of the Licensing Court, in taking the appeal and giving the notices, and above all, in laying them under the obligation to find caution for expenses? I think not. Yet he not only does all this without consulting his nominal clients, and without even communicating to them the result of their objections in the Licensing Court, but he arranges for caution being found for them without any one of the objectors being the least aware of what he was doing. In fact, he acted according to the reality, not as agent for the nominal objectors, but of the Association who employed him, and a glance at the minutes of their committees amply illustrates this. How, then, is the matter dealt with by the Appeal Court when Goodall's appeal is called? I quote from the Court's own Minute, No. 13 of process, page 47: "Before hearing agents Mr MacQuisten intimated that he objected to the status of Mr Kyle as representing the appellants in respect that he truly did not represent the appellants but represented the Citizens' Vigilance Association, who were the true dominus litis in this appeal, and that the said Association was not entitled to appear as appellant in this appeal." Let it be noted that the objection was not merely to want of mandate on the part of Mr Kyle, or to the informality or fictitiousness of his mandate, but was something deeper and more far-reaching. At that stage, in my opinion, Mr Kyle had indeed no mandate, and did not even nominally represent the nominal appellants. But more than this, did he represent the Citizens' Vigilance Association, who were not entitled to appear as appellants? And how is the objection disposed of? "The chairman, on the advice of the clerk, ruled that it was incompetent for the Court to consider the point raised by Mr MacQuisten, as Mr Kyle prima facie represented persons who were qualified to be heard as objectors under the provisions of the Licensing Act"—that is to say, the Court refused to entertain the objection. I am somewhat at a loss to understand the Court's action in this matter, for the alleged relation of the Vigilance Association to these appeals was no new matter to them. I am not prepared to take it off the hands of any of the members that they had no previous knowledge of the Vigilance Association or of its activities with reference to licensing proceedings. But even if they had no previous knowledge, they had had their attention very sharply and pertinently called to the matter at previous stages of the same appeal sittings in relation to Mr Battersby, and they had had notice of the attitude Mr MacQuisten was to take up the afternoon before. But they assumed this position: "Mr Kyle tables a bundle of mandates, ex facie regular; that is enough for us; we cannot competently look behind them." In that I think they were wrong. In the first place, if they had looked at the mandates they would have seen that they were not mandates authorising appeal. In the second place, if they had gone further they would have found, what the evidence in this case has disclosed, which I take it to be, as I have already said, that, through the missionary of St Mark's Church and some of his colleagues in its mission work, mandates to object had been placed in Mr Kyle's hands, some at least of the signatories of which had a title to object and bona fide did object, but that from the point at which they signed these mandates they had ceased to have any relation to or control over Mr Kyle's action, and that the reality of all that followed was that Mr Kyle was representing, not the nominal objectors, but the Vigilance Association, who through him found the objections, paid the fees of the Court, and found the witnesses, who were dissatisfied with the first decision, and through him took the appeal, paid the fees of Court, and found caution for the expenses of the appeal, and who again found the witnesses, who were their witnesses and not the objectors' witnesses; and that this Vigilance Association were acting in the matter as part of a large scheme for forcing the views of outsiders, sound as these views may have been, on the Licensing Authority without any statutory locus standi to do so. It may be that it might have been difficult in the Appeal Court to have exposed the true situation of matters. It may be that had there been a prima facie mandate in Mr Kyle's favour the Appeal Court might reasonably have said, and it is possible that this is what they meant by their deliverance, that in the summary procedure of a Licensing Appeal Court it was out of place to go beyond an agent's prima facie mandate, that the business must proceed and their decision be taken periculo petentis, leaving any such serious question as had been raised to be determined by a court of law. But they could not, in my opinion, shelve the question either by holding it not competent to entertain it or by, as far as they were concerned, disregarding it.

Now that it has been brought before a court of law, it is established, in my opinion, in the first place, that there was no valid appeal, because the appeal was taken by Mr Kyle without authority, but, in the second place, that, even if there had been a prima facie mandate, Mr Kyle in reality represented, not the nominal objectors, but the Vigilance Association, and on these grounds I think the decision which the Appeal Court proceeded to give on the merits must be set aside.

It was contended for the defenders that the objectors, or at least those who had a competent title to object, had homologated Mr Kyle's action. This is based on the idea that they had not disclaimed his appeal, though what they did not know of it is difficult to see how they could disclaim. If he had cited them as his witnesses and they had appeared with him in Court, he might have pleaded that they had put him at least in as good a position as he had been in in the Licensing Court, or even stronger. But they did not do so; they knew nothing about his appeal; they were not in Court; they were not cited as his witnesses; they were cited as the witnesses of his opponent, and they were prevented by Mr Kyle himself from being adduced in Court, and giving the Court any opportunity of knowing their frame of mind. It was further contended that they have homologated Mr Kyle's procedure by granting him mandates to defend the present actions of reduction. I make no comment on the manner in which this latter mandate was obtained, but I cannot find any justification in the authorities cited to me for holding that such ex post facto homologation can validate irregular and illegal procedure already closed.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Johnston.

Goodall v. Bilsland and Others. Cassidy v. Bilsland and Others. M'Lean v. Bilsland and Others.

The second question which I have to dispose of is, whether the decision of the Appeal Court was invalidated by the fact that the appeal having been truly taken and insisted in for and on behalf of the Citizens' Vigilance Association, certain members of and subscribers to said Association sat as members of the Appeal Court? I have already shewn that if membership required enrolment in the Association's roll of members, there were no members of the Appeal Court upon that roll whose names had not been deleted, and though the circumstance that they have been deleted is to my mind accompanied by the gravest suspicion, I take the case upon the footing that no members of the Court were in that sense members of the Association. On the other hand, I find that Bailie Stevenson, Mr Allan, Mr Murray, and the firm of which Lord Provost Sir William Bilsland was principal partner, were current subscribers, though Sir Samuel Chisholm and Mr Wallace had ceased for more than a twelvemonth to be such. And I hold, as I think I have already said, that in respect of the present objection, the position of subscriber to is the same as that of member of this Association. Now, even though, contrary to my opinion, Mr Kyle, by the mandates which he originally obtained, was clothed with a legal right to represent qualified objectors in the Licensing Court, and even if the difficulty of his want of mandate in the Appeal Court could be got over, it appears to me that neither of these things would alter the fact that the Citizens' Vigilance Association was the real and true objector and appellant, and by the whole history of its action was deeply committed, however laudable its motive and beneficial its action may have been, to a crusade against licences of which the episode into which I have been enquiring was a mere incident. This crusade was made possible only by the subscriptions of the gentlemen I have mentioned and others interested, and they must have known, or must be held to have known, that it was to prosecute this crusade that the moneys to which they contributed by their subscriptions were to be so applied. Was the position, therefore, of these gentlemen not substantially that of sitting in judgment in a case in which they were themselves the prosecutors?

I was referred to a great number of English authorities bearing on this subject. These appear to me to fall into three categories.

First, the class of cases, where from the interest of the member of the Court bias may be inferred. Such cases are: Reg. v. Meyer, 1875, L.R. 1 Q.B.D. 173; Reg. v. Milledge, 1879, L.R. 4 Q.B.D. 332; Reg. v. Handsley, 1881, L.R. 8 Q.B.D. 383; Rex v. Justices of Sunderland, L.R. [1901], 2 K.B. 357; Reg. v. Taylor (1898), 14 Times L.R. 185; Rex v. Tempest (1902), 18 Times L.R. 433, and they were followed by Lord Stormonth Darling in the only Scottish case quoted, viz. Blaik v. Anderson, 1900, 7 S.L.T. 299. Of these I think I may take the Sunderland Justices case as the leading one, and the principle it embodies is that pecuniary interest is enough to disqualify, but if the interest is not pecuniary, then the liklihood of bias in the circumstances must be substantial. The existence of bias is a question of fact for the Court, who must determine whether there was or was not under the circumstances a real likelihood that there would be a bias on the part of the member of the Court challenged. Further, it has been laid down that, assuming that bias is to be inferred in the circumstances, the mere presence of the interested party on the Bench is enough to vitiate the proceedings, whether he takes part in the vote or not (Reg. v. Justices of Hertfordshire, 1845, 6 Ad. and El. 753, and L.J. 14 Mag. Cases 73). It is indeed immaterial what part he takes in the proceedings (Reg. v. Meyer, supra).

Second, the class of cases in which a member of the Court is directly or indirectly a party to the prosecution, using that term for convenience in a comprehensive sense. It is said to be a principle, founded on the very essence of justice, that a person who is connected with the prosecution, using the word in such comprehensive sense, should not take part in the decision. And if an individual who assumes the position of prosecutor directly, as in Reg. v. London County Council, L.R. [1892], 1 Q.B. 190, is debarred, so also is a member of an Association which promotes and initiates such prosecution, as Reg. v. Allan, 1864, 4 B. & S. 915, and still more pertinent to the present case, Reg. v. Fraser (1893), 9 Times L.R. 613, where one out of three magistrates was a member of an Association very similar to the Vigilance Association, whose object was almost identical, though it may not have been actuated by the same breadth of view. The Association had resolved to oppose, and instructed the solicitor who did oppose, the licence, and it was of no avail to sustain the judgment that the vote of the individual magistrate challenged was not necessary for a majority, as the Bench was unanimous.

I should without hesitation follow the broad general principle of this latter class of cases, but for the third class of cases to which I was referred. But I venture to think that these improperly and inconsistently attempt to combine the principles of decision of the first two classes, and make the question of disqualification depend upon the likelihood of bias arising, not from interest, but from the quality or degree of the relation to the prosecution. These cases are Leason v. The Medical Council (1889), L.R. 43 Ch. Div. 366; Allinson [1894], 1 Q.B. 750, another Medical Council case; and Reg. v. Burton [1897], 2 Q.B. 468, the Incorporated Law Society Case. It may be that these cases may be supported on the view of the remoteness of the relation between the member of the Court challenged and the prosecuting body. But if it be not so, I should respectfully adopt the dissentient view of Fry, L.J., in the case of Leason (supra), in preference to the reasoning of his colleagues, and I cannot distinguish the present case from that of Reg. v. Fraser (supra), following which I think that the decision of the Appeal Court in question was vitiated by the presence on the Bench of subscribers to the Citizens' Vigilance Association.

The third and last question which I have to consider is whether the decision is also vitiated by the fact that two members of the Court who took part in it had not been present during the whole progress of the case, Mr Ross having joined the Court during the cross-examination of the second witness, and Mr King at a considerably later stage. I do not find any precedent directly applicable, but I think that it is a broad general principle that, unless the absence can be regarded on the principle of de minimis, which it cannot be here, whoever takes part in the decision of a Court or body of men, who, if not a Court properly, are bound to act judicially, must have been present during the hearing of the case and the whole case. Further, I think that on the analogy of Reg. v. The Justices of Hertfordshire (supra) and Reg. v. Meyer (supra), it is immaterial how far the vote is affected by counting or discounting that of the member disqualified by partial absence. The only circumstances in which a decision taken part in by a disqualified member can stand that I know of, are those exemplified by Livingstone v. Presbytery of Hamilton (1849), 6 Bell's Appeals 469.

Accordingly I shall sustain the second, third, and fifth pleas for the pursuers in Goodall's case, and grant decree as craved.

The same result will follow in Cassidy's case, except that the pleas to be sustained will be the second and third only, as I think it makes no difference that objection was not taken in the Appeal Court to Mr Kyle's position as not truly representing the nominal appellants, but representing an outside body, and I shall reserve to hear parties as to expenses.—29*th January* 1908.

FIRST DIVISION.

(The Lord President, Lords M'Laren and Kinnear.)

316. Malone v. Cayzer, Irvine & Company.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), Sch. I (1) (a)—"Where Death Results"—Injury to Eye—Insanity Consequent on Loss of Sight—Suicide—Averment that Death Due to Accident—Relevancy—Averments which were Held Relevant.

Stated Case.

In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, between Mrs Mary Ann Mullen or Malone, 401 Rutherglen Road, Glasgow, Pursuer, and Cayzer, Irvine & Co., shipowners, 109 Hope Street, Glasgow, Defenders, the pursuer made, inter alia, the following averments (as set forth in the stated case):

"(1) The pursuer, the said Mrs Mary Ann Mullen or Malone, is the widow of the deceased John Malone, hammerman. The respondents are shipowners, and also carry on, for the purpose of their said business, a ship-repairing shop at Finnieston Street, Glasgow.

"(2) On or about 25th May 1907, and for some months prior thereto, the said deceased John Malone was in the employment of the respondents at their said repairing shop in Finnieston Street as a hammerman. Said repairing shop is a factory within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

"(3) On said date, about 7.30 a.m., the said deceased John Malone was engaged in the course of his employment in said repairing shop cutting an iron ladder. Another of respondents' workmen was holding a chisel against said ladder and the deceased was striking the chisel with his hammer when a piece of said iron ladder flew off, penetrating his right eye.

"(4) The said deceased John Malone was taken to the Eye Infirmary, where his eye was treated and he was then sent home. About twenty years before the date of said accident the said deceased John Malone had met with an accident which caused him to lose the sight of his left eye, and when he was injured on 25th May 1907 the sight of his right eye immediately began to fail, and became gradually worse until he was rendered almost blind.

Malone v. Cayzer, Irvine & Co.

"(5) In consequence of the said injury the said John Malone received a severe shock, and his nervous system completely broke down. Owing to the gradual loss of sight in his right eye and consequent blindness, the said John Malone's mind became affected, and he became insane, and on 20th August 1907 he committed suicide in his house at 401 Rutherglen Road.

"(6) The death of the said John Malone was due to the foresaid accident, which arose out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents in their said factory at Finnieston Street."

The defenders pleaded, inter alia, that the application was irrelevant. This plea the Sheriff-Substitute (Davidson) sustained, and dismissed the application with expenses.

A case for appeal was stated.

The Question of Law was:—

Whether in the circumstances set forth in the case, the application was rightly dismissed?

Argued for Appellant: The appellant was entitled to prove her averments that her husband's insanity and consequent death were due to the accident. The deceased's insanity was brought on by loss of sight. Such a form of insanity was recognised by medical science and by such leading alienists as Dr Clouston. The question at issue was whether the suicide was a natural result of the injury, apart from whether it was a probable consequence of it or not. That was a pure question of fact on which the appellant was entitled to a proof (Dunham v. Clare, 5th June 1902 [1902], 2 K.B. 292, per Collins, M.R., p. 296). Reference was also made to Golder v. Caledonian Railway Co., 14th November 1902, 5 F. 123.

Argued for Respondent: The decree of the Sheriff was right. Malone's death was due to his own act. His suicide could not be regarded as the natural consequences, or even as the probable result, of the accident. It was not directly traceable to the injury, and if it were so traceable there was, in the words of Collins, M.R., a new act giving a fresh origin to the after-consequences (Dunham, cit. supra). The damages were too remote to justify enquiry. Suicide was not an "accident" in the sense of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Hensey v. White, 2nd December 1899 [1900], 1 Q.B. 481 (opinion of Collins, L.J.)). The primary and efficient cause of Malone's death was the diseased condition of his brain. In any event, that was novus actus interveniens. Reference was made by way of contrast to Lloyd v. Sugg & Co., December 1899 [1900], 1 Q.B. 486.

The Court answered the question in the case in the negative; recalled the determination of the arbiter, and remitted to the Sheriff-Substitute as arbiter to allow parties a proof of their averments, and to proceed as accords.

The Lord President.—My Lords, the facts which give rise to the controversy here are certainly somewhat out of the common. It is an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, the claimant in it being the widow of a workman called Malone, who was in the employment of the respondents, Cayzer, Irvine & Co. The averments of the claimant and appellant set forth that while Malone was at his work in May a splinter of iron flew into his right eye. That of course was an ordinary accident in the course of his employment, which, had he survived, would have entitled him to make a claim for compensation in the ordinary way. It seems that he had many years before lost the sight of his other eye, and the injury was such that the sight of his remaining eye, according to the averments, immediately began to fail, and became gradually worse until he was rendered almost blind. Then, continues the claimant—I now read textually: "In consequence of said injury the said John Malone received a severe shock, and his nervous system completely broke down. Owing to the gradual loss of sight in his right eye and consequent blindness, the said John Malone's mind became affected and he became insane, and on 20th August 1907 he committed suicide in his house at 401 Rutherglen Road. The death of the said John Malone was due to the foresaid accident, which arose out of and in course of his employment with the respondents."

Now upon that statement of the facts the learned Sheriff-Substitute, before whom the case came as arbiter, dismissed the application as irrelevant. The claimant has appealed to your Lordships, and the motion before us is to send the case back to the Sheriff and tell him to allow a proof of those averments which I have read. Of course there can be no question, I take it, as to the accident having actually happened—that is to say, the splinter going into his eye; but what happened afterwards is evidently matter upon which there may be controversy.

My Lords, the expression in the statute is that the death must be the result of the injury; and really the views which I hold have been so extremely well expressed by Lord Collins, when he was Master of the Rolls, that I prefer to take what he has said rather than try to re-express them myself. The passage which I am going to cite is taken from the case of Dunham v. Clare, L.R. [1902], 2 K.B. p. 292. The state of the facts in that case was that a man was carrying some heavy pipes, one of which slipped and fell on his foot, inflicting a wound in his toe. He was put into an hospital, and a disease called phlegmonous erysipelas supervened. The evidence was that erysipelas of this description was a very unusual consequence of a wound of the kind, and that, according to the theory which at present obtains, it was caused by the introduction somewhere or other of a germ. Lord Collins said this: "The applicant for compensation, therefore, has to shew an accident causing injury, and death or incapacity resulting from the injury. In the present case there was admittedly an accident causing injury, and the only question is whether death in fact resulted from the injury. If death in fact resulted from the injury, it is not relevant to say that death was not the natural or probable consequence thereof. The question whether death resulted from the injury resolves itself into an enquiry into the chain of causation. If the chain of causation is broken by a novus actus interveniens, so that the old cause goes and a new one is substituted for it, that is a new act which gives a fresh origin to the after-consequences. In dealing with an obligation created by the Act, we are not dealing with a case of contract or tort or with a liability of a criminal nature. In the case of contract, a person who commits a breach of it is liable for the consequences which naturally follow from the breach. So, too, in cases of tort, when the question arises whether a person is liable in respect of a breach of some duty imposed upon him, he probably, and in some cases certainly, comes under a somewhat larger liability than would be the case if it were a breach of contract, but still the liability is measured by what are the reasonable and probable consequences of his breach of duty. That lets in the consideration of reasonableness. No question of reasonableness comes into the present discussion. The Act has imposed the liability irrespective of any error of judgment or negligence on the part of the employer. The only question to be considered is, Did the death or incapacity in fact result from the injury?" That exactly expresses my opinion, and if that is so I think that the Sheriff-Substitute was too quick here in dismissing this case as irrelevant upon the face of it.

My Lords, I do not think I ought to say much more, except to explain that I am very far from saying that upon the face of this pleading there is evidently made out a case, because the question is whether causation is or is not made out, and it may be a somewhat uphill matter for the claimant to prove her case. I should like to say that she will have to do something more than say simply that there was a possibility of death arising from such an injury in such a way; she must shew that it was in fact the result of the injury. I have some doubts as to whether the state of knowledge of cerebral pathology is so fixed as, in circumstances like this, to enable one to reach such a conclusion; but I do not think we could try the matter from our own ideas on such subjects. Therefore, my Lords, I am of opinion that we should remit the case to the Sheriff-Substitute and order him to allow an enquiry into the matters averred.

Lord M'Laren.—If we were to criticise the statements of facts in this case with the same strictness which we do in questions of relevancy in actions in this Court, there is a great deal, I think, to be said against the relevancy of the averments; because I cannot gather from the Sheriff-Substitute's statement anything more than this, that the man committed suicide in consequence of the depression of mind brought on by his blindness. There is no averment of insanity in the physiological sense of a result of disease of the brain, but merely that a man has committed suicide and is supposed to have done so under some insane impulse. It seems to me that in construing the Act of Parliament, and particularly the beginning of the first schedule, we must hold that when the Act prescribes as a condition of compensation that death results from the injury, what is within the contemplation of the statute is a material injury with death materially resulting from it. To explain what I mean regarding insanity—if a person, being a workman, were to receive a blow or a wound on the head which set up inflammation of the brain, and a medical expert came to the conclusion that the injury to the brain was the result of the blow on the head; and if the injury went on and left the man in an insane condition from which eventually he died, then I should not for a moment doubt that the man's death was the result of the accident. But, on the other hand, it is easy to figure cases of death resulting only from the moral effect of an accident. If, for example, a man, in consequence of the loss of his sight, took to drinking and shortened his life by intemperance, that would be a very clear case for not giving compensation; because, although in a sense his death was the result of the injury, it was not a material, but a moral result. Now in this case I am not disposed, any more than your Lordship, to construe the statement of the Sheriff-Substitute, which is merely an echo of the averments of the party, with great strictness. I think there ought to be a proof; and as the parties might wish to bring the case before us again, I hope the Sheriff-Substitute will direct his attention to the point whether this is insanity that would be proved by medical evidence of the symptoms, or whether it is anything more than just a mode of stating the supposed cause, because there must be some cause for the suicide. I agree that it is desirable to have the facts brought before us; and I notice that in the case of Dunham, L.R. [1902], 2 K.B. 292, which your Lordship cited, there had been an inquiry, and the judgment of the Court proceeded upon a statement of the facts proved in the case.

Lord Kinnear.—The question whether death has resulted from an accident is always a question of fact. Therefore I think it is indispensable that the arbitrator should have the facts ascertained before he decides it. I therefore agree that the case should go back to the learned Sheriff in order that the petitioner may have an opportunity of proving her case if she can. That being so, I think the less one says about the prima facie aspect of the statement of the facts probably the better; but one cannot help seeing that there may be a difficulty in connecting the accident with the alleged result by an unbroken chain of connection. The exact point where the difficulty may arise I do not know; but speaking for myself I do not think I have sufficient knowledge of the pathology of insanity to form even a provisional opinion. Therefore I think it better to say that I agree with your Lordships that the facts must be ascertained.—23*rd January* 1908.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Guthrie.

The defenders reclaimed. The case was ordered to be heard before a Court of Seven Judges.

Argued for Reclaimers: (1) The issue proposed for the defenders should be allowed. Fault was admitted, and therefore the only question for the jury was, How much ought the pursuers to be paid? i.e. What was the injury suffered? Esto that under the defenders' issue the cause of the accident might be relevantly proved, the scope of such an enquiry ought to be determined ab ante, otherwise "exceptions" would be taken. Esto that the practice since Cooley's case (cit. infra) had been to allow a pursuer to lead evidence as to the whole circumstances of the case, that rule was inapplicable here, as there was no duty on the defenders' part towards the pursuers, and therefore no culpa quoad them. The duty, and therefore the culpa, were towards the deceased. The present action was based, not on fault towards the pursuers, but (1) on their nearness of relationship to the deceased, and (2) on his liability to support them. The loss of their husband and father was the sole loss suffered by the pursuers. That being so, any culpa or carelessness on the defenders' part towards the deceased was not a relevant subject of enquiry. It would not be relevant, for example, for the widow to prove that the deceased was badly treated by the defenders, or that he suffered great pain owing to their neglect, or that their treatment of him caused her considerable suffering. (2) In the present circumstances there was no claim for solatium. The law could not, and did not, assess compensation for mere laceration of feelings. The early cases in which reparation for injury to feelings was allowed were really actions of assythment, e.g. Black v. Caddell (cit. infra). Neither Stair nor Erskine dealt with solatium as an element distinct from reparation for the injury suffered, e.g. Stair, I. 9, 4; I. 9, 6; I. 9, 7; Erskine, III. 1, 14 (the only mention of solatium there being in a footnote, viz. Note 13). The earliest use of the term, as far as counsel were aware, was in Brown v. Macgregor & Others, 26th February 1813, F.C. That, however, was an action of assythment pure and simple, so also was Black v. Caddell, 1804, M. 13,905, affd. 1812, 5 Pat. App. 567. Solatium as something sui generis, distinct both in nature and origin from assythment, was first recognised in Greenhorn v. Addie, 1855, 17 D. 860, and Eisten v. North British Railway Co., 1870, 8 M. 980. The case of Cooley v. Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway Co., 1845, 8 D. 288 (relied on by the pursuers) was really founded on assythment. That element, however, was eliminated by the two subsequent cases of Greenhorn (cit. supra) and Eisten (cit. supra), and finally disappeared. No doubt Cooley's case had been followed in Dobie v. Aberdeen Railway Co., 1856, 18 D. 862, and Cunningham v. Duncan & Jamieson, 1889, 16 R. 383, but in both these cases solatium was really used as equivalent to damages and meant nothing more. It was so used in Dow v. Brown, 1844, 6 D. 534, and Elder v. Croall, 1849, 11 D. 1040. Reference was also made to Darling v. Gray & Sons, 1892, 19 R. H.L. 31; and to Hillcoat v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., 1907, 15 S.L.T. 433. As to the practice in England, reference was made to Blake v. Midland Railway Co., 1852, 18 A. & E. 93 (21 L.J. Q.B. 233). In assessing damages under Lord Campbell's Act (9 & 10 Vict. cap. 93) the jury were confined to the pecuniary loss sustained, and could not take into consideration mental suffering. Exemplary damages could not be awarded here, for that principle of assessment applied only to actions against wrongdoers, and not to actions against those who were only consequentially liable (Beven on Negligence, 8th ed., p. 42–3).

Argued for Respondents: (1) The Lord Ordinary was right. The degree of culpa was a relevant subject of enquiry. (As to its degrees reference was made to Bell's Com. I. 483, note.) The degree of negligence would affect the amount of compensation (Auld v. Shairp, 1874, 2 R. 191). That being so, the circumstances of the injury and the degree of fault fell to be laid before the jury (M'Master v. The Caledonian Railway Co., 1885, 23 S.L.R. 181). This was a motion to vary an issue, and on a question of procedure the practice of the Court was conclusive. The respondents were entitled to prove their averments in Cond. 4. The rule in Cooley's case was not only sound in principle, but had become so settled in practice that it was now part of our law. (2) There were two elements for which our law gave compensation, pecuniary loss (for which damages were given) and injury to feelings (for which solatium was given) (Dow, cit. supra; Horn v. North British Railway Co., 1878, 5 R. 1055). A claim for solatium was known to the law of Scotland, and even though founded on nothing better than usage and inveterate custom, was firmly fixed in practice. As to its history not much was really known. It was used in the Roman law as equivalent to compensation (Dig. 8. 4. 13; 26. 7. 33). It was recognised as fully known to our law in Neilson v. Rodger, 1853, 16 D. 325, and in such recent cases as Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co., 1891, 18 R. H.L., and Darling (cit. supra). Cases of assythment proper were clearly distinct, for they involved the element of crime (Bell's Prin. 2029). The English practice was not adverse, for though Lord Campbell's Act (cit. supra) only allowed compensation for pecuniary loss, in actual practice the elements considered in assessing damages were the same as were considered here (Phillips v. London and South-Western Railway Company, 1879, L.R. 5 Q.B.D. 78). A fortiori, therefore, by our law, which allowed both elements to be considered, both ought to be remitted to proof. As to the elements involved in damages for seduction reference was made to Fraser, Husband and Wife, pp. 500, 505, 1204. It was immaterial whether the injury suffered had been caused by the defender or those for whom he was responsible. Gross negligence, if proved, would entitle the pursuers to a larger measure of damages (Beven on Negligence, 8th ed., 42–3; Sedgwick on Damages, 7th ed., I. 53, II. 330).

The Lord President.—This is an action raised by the widow and children of the deceased Mr Black against the North British Railway Company. The deceased gentleman lost his life owing to injuries received in a collision while travelling as a passenger in a train of the defenders; and the summons concludes for very considerable sums of money to each of the pursuers. The condescendence sets forth that the collision in question was caused by the gross negligence of the defenders, the specification of said negligence consisting in setting forth alleged faults of the driver of the train which ran into the train in which Mr Black was seated, and of the station-masters at two stations. The sums concluded for are said to be due to them as reparation and solatium for the injury done to them by the death of Mr Black through the fault of the defenders. The defenders, while not admitting the particular fault condescended on, put in the following statement: "Explained that the defenders for the purposes of the present action admit liability for the injuries sustained by Mr Black."

Technically the only question raised in the case is the form of the issue. But really the controversy between the parties goes deeper, and is concerned with the question of what are, if I may so express it, the true ingredients of the damage suffered by the pursuers; and the form of the issue is only material in so far as it lends itself to the proper or improper admission in evidence of circumstances which, according to the one view or the other, are relevant to the question of what the damage amounts to.

Viewed as upon authority I do not think we could, so far as form is concerned, go back on the case of Morton, 8 D. 288, followed by the case of Dobie, 18 D. 862. The defenders, however, have frankly stated that they wish to take the opinion of the House of Lords on the subject, and it therefore seems right that we should not send up the case without considered opinions. But besides that, there is another reason why I think it desirable that we should state our views apart from authority. Though Morton's case has ruled the form of the issue, I cannot say that I think the opinions of the majority in Morton's case have ruled the directions given by judges to juries. Further, I think there has been the unfortunate effect that directions in the matter have varied according to the views of individual judges. The Lord Ordinary has called attention to this by comparing what was said by Lord Shand and by Lord Adam in the case of Cunningham, 16 R. 383. It seems expedient, therefore, that true principles should be laid down by the Court of highest resort, and that they should then be followed in all cases.

Court of Seven Judges.

Black and Others v. The North British Railway Company.

The Lord President.

There is no question as to the liability of the defenders to compensate for direct patrimonial loss which the widow and children have suffered by the death of the husband and father viewed as the breadwinner of the family. The question in dispute arises in considering what are the matters which it is relevant to consider in estimating what is due in name of solatium, and they really resolve into two points. First, are the pursuers entitled to enhanced damages if they shew that the deceased was subjected to pain and suffering before his death; second, are they entitled to enhanced damages if they shew that the negligence of the Company was gross negligence? If they are, then it is evident that the pursuers are entitled to insist on proving first, the circumstances of the collision so far as they affected Mr Black; and second, the circumstances of the collision so far as shewing the causes which led to it.

I cannot say that I have been able to find any authoritative pronouncement on what is the true definition of solatium. The word occurs in the Digest in two places—VIII., 4, 13 and XXVI., 7, 33—but not in a sense which is in the slightest degree technical or calculated to throw any light on the subject. In the first passage it is used for the payment which must be made if one wishes to take stones out of another man's quarry; in the second it is used as an equivalent to "solarium," which, in fact, is the word in some of the MS. There seems, therefore, little doubt that the word had not a technical origin, but was used, as was often the case, by the old Scottish lawyers as a convenient Latin tag to express what might have been expressed, but with less conciseness, in English. We were told at the Bar that the first time the word appears is in the case of Brown v. M'Gregor, 26th February 1813, F.C.—the case which may be, I think, taken as the first instance of the modern actio injuriarum. I quote the words of Lord President Inglis in Eisten, 8 Macph. 980, as contrasted with the older action of assythment. This is, however, not so. The word is used as far back as 1741 in a case of Moodie v. Sir James Stuart, reported by Monboddo, and to be found in 5 Brown's Supplement, p. 709. The report is so short and to the point as to be worth quoting: "The question here was about the quantity of an assythment, whether it contained only the expenses laid out by the relations of the defunct in the prosecution of his death, together with an aliment to those of his relations who stood in need of being alimented, and whom the defunct would have been obliged to aliment; or whether it did not likewise contain something in solatium to the relations for the loss they had sustained. This last the Lords found." And the word is also used by Lord Kames in his Law Tracts discussing assythment.

It seems, therefore, tolerably certain that it had its origin in the action of assythment, and probably without very much consideration found its way into the action of damages. As to the modern action I do not think I can add to what is said by Lord President Inglis in the case of Eisten. Originally I take it the two actions stood side by side—at least that is what I should gather from the way in which Stair treats the subject in Book I. Title 9, sects. 4, 6 and 7. And probably the change from the old to the modern practice was not very well marked. The civil action could, of course, be in the Session alone, while assythment might be in Justiciary or modified in Exchequer or by action in the Session. But Justiciary and Exchequer came to be abandoned (see Lord Deas in Greenhorn v. Addie, 17 D. at p. 862). The transition stage is, I think, well marked by comparing Black v. Cadell, M. 13,905, which seems to go on assythment alone (and is accurately reported in Morrison under the heading of assythment), with Brown v. M'Gregor, which, although professedly based on Black v. Cadell, is clearly an actio injuriarum and not assythment. For the test I think is not doubtful, being that laid down in Eisten—viz., Was the act complained of a crime? In Black's case conceivably the defender might have been indicted for culpable homicide, though I infer that the chances of a conviction would have been remote. In Brown's case it would have been impossible. The end of it all is that, I think, solatium, borrowed from the action of assythment, has in the actio injuriarum come to mean reparation for feelings—in short, all reparation which is not comprehended under the heading of actual patrimonial loss. And as such it is, I think, a legitimate ingredient to consider the laceration of the feelings of the widow and family in contemplating the pain and suffering to which the deceased was exposed before death actually supervened. This answers the first question put, in the affirmative.

Turning now to the second question, I first enquire what are the supposed grounds on which the contention for enhanced damages rests, and I find they are two. Certain judges in Morton's case countenanced the idea that damages are partly imposed in pœnam, and that consequently if the fault is gross the penalty ought to be great. I do not think this view will bear a moment's examination. Take an accident like the present, where there were over a score of sufferers. What is to be the province of each particular jury? Are the rights of each set of pursuers to depend upon the accident whether the defenders have been already sufficiently mulcted by a former jury? The whole argument seems to me so faulty that, if it were not that it has had the sanction of very eminent men, I should have used the term absurd.

The other ground is that, where fault is great, damages ought to be what is termed "exemplary." I am bound to say I find no authority for any distinction between damages and "exemplary damages" in the law of Scotland. The very heading under which it is treated in our older books, "Reparation," excludes the idea. There is, however, a great deal of authority in the law of England. I do not feel entitled, sitting in this Court, to review the English judgments. But I will permit myself two remarks. In the first place I will take as a specimen what is said in a well-known work, Mayne on Damages:—"If, then, malice can render an innocent act wrongful, it must therefore render a wrongful act more wrongful, and therefore be provable in aggravation of damages." It seems to me that the basis of this reasoning needs to be reconsidered in the light of the House of Lords' decision in Allan v. Flood, L.R. [1898], A.C. 1. In the second place, it seems to me that malice is the foundation of the doctrine, and that its application to the present class of cases is because culpa lata dolo æquiparatur. If, then, malice is the foundation, it surely cannot apply to cases where the person sued is not the actual wrongdoer, but is only held liable on the ground of respondeat superior. In the present case there is no averment of fault of system which could be laid at the door of the directors of the railway company. The "gross negligence," as alleged, is negligence of three separate officials, as to none of whom it is said that they were improperly selected for their posts.

I should like to add that I cannot agree with the Lord Ordinary when he says: "It is, I imagine, a fact in human nature that grief may be aggravated and loss embittered by the knowledge that the slightest care on the part of those causing the injury would have prevented the accident. On the other hand, if the case is only by a technicality outside the category of inevitable accident, the situation is accepted with greater resignation and the mind sooner recovers calmness." It seems to me that this all depends on the particular mind. To many it might be as the Lord Ordinary says. But to others it might be different. They would feel more acutely such a case as, e.g., when a loosened brick from a bridge happened to fall on the head of a passenger at that moment looking out of the window. At any rate I do not think there is any general consensus of feeling on which a rule for awarding increased damages could be founded.

I therefore come to the conclusion that it is not relevant to enquire whether the accident was caused by gross or by ordinary negligence—in other words, that, if the defenders admit negligence, no more proof on the subject of the cause of the accident should be allowed, as to do so would tend to confuse the jury. If this is clearly understood by the presiding judge I think the form of the issue immaterial—I mean as between the two competing forms before us. Were the slate absolutely blank I might perhaps prefer that tendered by the defenders, and the reasons for doing so are well stated in a judgment of Lord Johnston in the case of Hillcoat, 15 S.L.T. p. 433. But, as I have already said, I think we are bound by authority to adopt the form proposed by the pursuers; and that form will not prevent me, if I am trying the case, from giving effect to the views I have already expressed in the admission or rejection of evidence. It will be for the House of Lords to approve or disapprove of these views, and I need scarcely say I shall hold myself bound to follow what is laid down by them, whether it does or does not agree with the opinion I have just delivered.

Lord M'Laren.—I agree with your Lordship's exposition of the principles upon which damages should be assessed in this case. With reference to the form of the issue, if we were not bound by precedent I should be disposed to prefer the form suggested by the defenders—what is the damage—on this ground, that I think that in our system of sending a question for the consideration of the jury it is always an advantage if the form of the issue comes as near as possible to the actual question which the jury have to try; first, because the form of the issue itself fixes the attention of the jury upon the precise question submitted to them, and also because it may have a restraining effect in preventing the jury from taking into account any extraneous considerations which they might imagine to be covered by an issue of a more general form. But I agree with your Lordship that the practice has been in favour of the issue proposed by the pursuers, and that the advantage of altering the form would not be sufficient to outweigh the general objection to altering forms that are well established.

Lord Kinnear.—I concur.

Lord Low.—I had the advantage of considering the opinion which has been read by his Lordship in the chair, and I entirely concur.

Lord Ardwall.—I concur in the judgment delivered by the Lord President, and have little to add.

I think that the degree of negligence or fault in cases of the class presently under consideration ought not to form an element in arriving at the amount of damages. It would be considered

Court of Seven Judges.

Black and Others v. The North British Railway Company.

Lord Ardwall.

wrong that any judge should direct a jury who are trying an action of damages in respect of the death of a man killed in a railway accident, to the effect that they should find small damages because the fault which led to the accident was a slight one; and I think it would be equally wrong if, on the other hand, the judge should direct the jury that because there had been gross negligence on the part of the railway company's servants the amount of damages to be awarded ought to be increased. But while this is my opinion, I do not think it necessary or expedient to change the form of issue which has been found to work well in practice since 1845.

I may be allowed to add that in the course of thirty-five years' practice at the Bar it so happened that I was engaged at first as junior and latterly as senior counsel in a large number of actions of damages for injuries or death caused by alleged fault on the part of the defenders in such actions; in the great majority of these cases I acted for the defenders, and I cannot recal any case where an admission of liability having been made on record but not in the issue, time was wasted in the leading of unnecessary evidence. The usual course in such trials where the liability was admitted was that the narrative of how the accident occurred—which I think the jury are always entitled to hear so as to enable them to know the circumstances out of which the action arose—was allowed to be taken from one or, if necessary, more witnesses, and thereafter the judge stopped all further examination on the matter. If this be recognised as the proper practice, I think the want of an admission in the issue will not lead to any unnecessary prolongation of trials or waste of time in their conduct.

Further, I cannot recal any trial where the judge, if it was suggested by the pursuer's counsel that the jury should take into consideration in fixing the amount of damage the gravity of the fault on the part of the defenders or their servants, did not direct the jury that that was not a matter for them, but that what they had to assess was simply the loss, injury and damage caused to the pursuer. It may be that the experience of others may have been less fortunate than mine, but if that has been so, and if there has hitherto been any dubiety as to the judge's duty in this matter, that will be set at rest by the judgment in this case.

Further, I may point out that it is by no means impossible that if a rule such as the defenders contend for regarding admissions being inserted in issues were adopted, it might lead to some undesirable consequences. I may illustrate this from the present case. The issue proposed by the defenders contains an ample admission of fault, but as I read their answers on record there is no such admission of fault on record, but only an admission of liability for the purposes of the present action, and I would not approve of an issue consisting of a mere admission to the effect that the defenders admitted liability for the purposes of the action, followed by the bald question of amount of damages being sent to a jury; and it is possible that if the rule as to admissions proposed by the defenders were adopted, there might be frequent disputes and discussions as to the form that the admission should take. In the next place, I think that an issue in the form proposed by the defenders might have the effect of leading to captious objections to the admissibility of evidence which might be led for the legitimate purpose of putting the jury in possession of the facts out of which the action arose, and that the time of the Court and of the jury might thereby be wasted. I prefer that the issue should be kept in the established form, and that the judge presiding at the trial should, whenever necessary, direct the jury in the manner pointed out in the opinion just delivered by the Lord President.

The Lord President intimated that Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Pearson, who were absent at advising, also concurred.—18*th January* 1908.

318. Clark-Kennedy v. Clark-Kennedy.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Citation of Defender—Failure to Serve Personally—Evidence That Defender's Address Unknown.

This was an undefended action of divorce by a wife against her husband on the ground of adultery. The defender was designed in the summons as "Arthur John Clark-Kennedy, formerly of Knock Grays, Kirkcudbright, but whose present address is to the pursuer unknown."

The summons had been served edictally on the defender.

To prove the adultery the pursuer adduced (1) one woman who deponed that the defender in 1906 occupied a bedroom with one bed in a hotel in Bury St Edmunds, along with a woman not the pursuer; (2) a waiter in another hotel in Bury St Edmunds, who deponed that the defender and a woman, not the pursuer, occupied two rooms in the hotel in the spring of 1906; (3) another witness, who spoke to two visits by the defender and the same woman to the latter hotel.

Extracts were also produced from the hotel books corroborating the statements of these witnesses.

The managing clerk of the pursuer's agent deponed that he had great difficulty in trying to serve a summons on the defender. He had applied to the defender's solicitor for his address, which was refused; but the defender's solicitor had written a letter to the effect that his client was aware of the divorce proceedings, and that they would come before the Court shortly; and that he would not appear to defend the case.

The Lord Ordinary continued the case until the letter from the defender's agent was produced, there being only a copy in Court.

Lord Salvesen said that there seemed to be an impression that it was enough for a party to an action of divorce to come and say that the defender could not be found, and that he or she did not know where that defender was. That was not enough. Edictal citation was the merest form, and there must be evidence upon which an interlocutor could be pronounced that it was proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the person could not be found.

Later in the day the principal letter was produced in Court, and decree of divorce was granted. — 25*th January* 1908.

319. Collumb v. Turners Limited.

Reparation — Relevancy — Negligence — Child Killed While Playing With Trucks in Quarry—Trucks Safely Secured if Left Alone—Trespassers or Licensees—Action Dismissed as Irrelevant.

This was an action of damages brought by a quarryman against the quarry owners on account of the death of his son, a boy of six years of age. The pursuer's house opened into the public road, which was separated from the defenders' quarry by a branch line of railway properly fenced. A wicket gate in the railway fence gave access from the public road across the railway to the quarry. Some children, including the pursuer's son, crossed the railway and were playing in the quarry. The defenders' servants had left some bogie trucks loaded with stones standing on a sloping line of rails in the quarry; the trucks were secured by "sprags," or wedges inserted between the wheels of the trucks and the rails. One of the children intentionally or by accident knocked away the sprags so that one of the trucks rolled down the slope and pursuer's child was killed. The allegation of fault was that the defenders knew that the children from the quarrymen's houses on the public road would, unless prevented, come to play in the quarry. The wicket gate in the railway fence was left open by defenders' servants, therefore the pursuer's child was a "licensee"—that is, a person not invited but suffered to come upon defenders' premises. The pursuer's child was, in these circumstances, entitled to reasonable care and foresight on the part of defenders to avoid danger. He did not deny that if left alone the trucks were quite safe, but contended that defenders, knowing that children would come there to play, were negligent in leaving the trucks in such a position as to be easily set in motion by such conduct as would naturally be expected from young children. The fact that the fault of a third party had to intervene in order that the accident should happen did not excuse the defenders, if their original negligence was the real cause of the accident.

The defenders maintained that there was no relevant statement of fault. The pursuer's child was a trespasser, the trucks were properly spragged, and the accident was directly due to the fault of the child's companions. The wicket gate in the fence belonged to the railway company, therefore the defenders could not, if they wished, lock it as suggested by pursuer. Even if the child were treated as an invited person there was no relevant averment of fault.

In addition to cases referred to in the Lord Ordinary's opinion the pursuer cited Findlay v. Angus, 1887, 14 R. 312, and Beveridge v. Kinnear, 1883, 11 R. 387; and the defenders cited Balfour v. Baird & Brown, 1857, 20 D. 238; Stark v. Garland & Roger, 1905, 13 S.L.T. 422; Hastie v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 1906, 14 S.L.T. 208.

The Lord Ordinary dismissed the action as irrelevant.

Lord Guthrie.—The defenders say that, on the pursuer's own averments, the child who was killed was a trespasser, in whose favour they could have no obligation in law to take the precautions desiderated in Condescendence 3. The pursuer's counsel founded on the following averment in Condescendence 3:—"These defenders and their workmen were well aware of the fact that children were in the habit of crossing the railway line, and using defenders' ground and bogie line as a playground." He did not maintain, however, that this averment, coupled with the averment in the same condescendence that the wicket gate leading on to the siding was habitually used by the defenders' workmen and was habitually allowed to stand open, would raise a case of invitation. It is not necessary, therefore, to consider such cases as Ross v. Keith, 1888, 16 R. 86; Prentice v. Assets Company, 1889, 17 R. 484; Johnston v. Stewart & Sons, 1897, 25 R. 103, 5 S.L.T. p. 188, Horsburgh v.

Columb v. Turners Limited.

Sheach, 1900, 3 F. 270, 8 S.L.T. p. 321; Devlin v. Jeffray's Trs., 1902, 5 F. 130, 10 S.L.T. p. 375; Cummings v. Darngavil Coal Company, 1903, 5 F. 513, 10 S.L.T. p. 660. I think the pursuer's averments do not raise any case of invitation. The ground where the child was killed was isolated from the road by an intervening North British Railway branch line, which line was fenced off from the road. The wicket gate alleged to have been habitually used by the defenders' workmen and alleged to have been left by them, or in their knowledge, habitually open, was in the North British Railway Company's fence. The defenders are blamed for not having had a proper lock and bolt fixed in this wicket gate. Obviously, however, they would not have been entitled to interfere in any way with the gate. But if the child was not on the spot by the defenders' invitation, the pursuer's counsel maintained that he was at least there as a "licensee"—that is, one whose habit of resort is known to the defenders and has not been objected to by them. If so, the pursuer says that the defenders were bound to have seen that the premises were in a condition of reasonable safety for such licensees. In the case of Tolhausen v. Davies, 1888, 57 L.J. (Q.B.D.) page 392, quoted by the pursuer, the law was thus laid down by Mr Justice Smith: "The owner of premises is under no liability to a licensee unless something in the nature of a trap or concealed danger exists, for the licensee must take the premises as he finds them, and there is no obligation to alter the premises for his safety or convenience. He must take them as they are for better and for worse. Where, however, misfeasance is what is complained of, it is the duty of the owner of the premises not to neglect to use ordinary care and skill towards the licensee in what the owner is doing, so that the licensee may not thereby be injured. If the owner does so neglect and the licensee is thereby injured, the owner is liable."

In my opinion the pursuer's averments disclose that his son had not only been a trespasser when crossing the North British Railway Company's branch line, but that he was on the defenders' premises as a trespasser, and I doubt whether the category of "licensee" is one recognised in Scots law. But assuming that the law of Scotland recognises the licensee as a class midway between the trespasser and the person invited, and assuming that the boy was on the spot in question not as a trespasser but as a licensee, then I am of opinion that the pursuer's averments do not come up to such a case of neglect of ordinary care and skill towards the licensee as would entitle him to an issue. It is said that the accident happened because "another boy of the same age, who was playing at the side of the said bogie, either removed a piece of wood used as a sprag from the front of one of the wheels of the said bogie, or accidentally struck the same with his foot." But it is not alleged (a) that anything of this kind had ever taken place before; or (b) that the sprag which the boy removed or loosened was unsuitable for the purpose or had not been driven home; or (c) that the method of spragging employed is not the usual method for securing waggons in similar circumstances. It is not denied that but for the interference of the other boy no accident would have happened. The pursuer founded on the series of cases where it has been held that the mere fact that a defender's negligence would have been harmless but for the intervention of a third party does not prevent liability attaching to the person guilty of initial negligence (see Clark v. Chambers, 1878, L.R. 3 Q.B.D. 327; Englehart v. Farrant [1897], 1 Q.B. 240; M'Dowall v. Great Western Railway [1902], 1 K.B. 618, [1903], 2 K.B. 331; Gallagher v. Humphrey, 1862, 6 Law Times N.S. 684; Campbell v. Ord, 1 R. 149; Sullivan v. Creed, 1894, 2 I.R. 317). But in all these cases the original negligence was relevantly stated. Here I see none such averred. And, further, in none of these cases was the person injured in the position of a licensee. He was either in a public place, or present by the defender's express or implied invitation.—31*st January* 1908.

(Lord Guthrie.)

320. Pybus v. Mackinnon.

Slander — Relevancy — Factor Accused of Being "Unfaithful" — "The Unjust Steward" — Innuendo of Dishonesty — Issues Allowed.

This was an action of damages brought by a factor against his employer for slander, and, separatim, for assault. The pursuer had the management of the defender's estate during his absence abroad. The pursuer averred that on his return the defender accosted him, the pursuer, asked him if he were an honest man, then told him he was a liar, accused him of being "unfaithful" as a factor, and likened him to "the unjust steward" in the parable; and that he also told third parties that the pursuer had been "unfaithful" to him. He also alleged that the defender had made an unprovoked assault upon him, after he had resigned his position as factor and when he was superintending the removal of his own furniture from the factor's house which he had formerly occupied. The defender did not dispute the relevancy of the averments with regard to the assault.

The issues as adjusted by the Lord Ordinary shew the incidents founded on by the pursuer as constituting the slander complained of.

1. Whether, on or about the 29th day of April 1907, and in or about the stableyard at Lanfine, Newmilns, Ayrshire, the defender asked the pursuer whether he was an honest man, and on the pursuer answering that he was, said to the pursuer that he was a liar; whether, time and place aforesaid, the defender also asked the pursuer if he knew the story of the unjust steward, and said to the pursuer that he had been an unjust steward; and whether, time and place aforesaid, the defender also said to the pursuer that he had been unfaithful; or whether the defender did, time and place aforesaid, utter to the pursuer words of a like import and effect; and whether the said statements falsely, calumniously, and maliciously represented that the pursuer, in administering the defender's estate, had been unfaithful to his trust, and had been dishonest, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

2. Whether, in or about the beginning of September 1907, and at Lanfine aforesaid, the defender said to Robert Gibb, farmer, Newfield, that the pursuer had been unfaithful to him, or used words of a like import and effect, of and concerning the pursuer; and whether the said statement falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer, in administering the defender's estate, had been unfaithful to his trust, and had been dishonest, to the loss, injury and damage of the pursuer?

3. Whether, on or about the 13th day of September 1907, and in or near the factor's house at Lanfine aforesaid, the defender said to George Adams, inspector of police, Newmilns, that he had unsettled claims against the pursuer, and that the pursuer had been unfaithful to him, or used words of a like import and effect of and concerning the pursuer; and whether the said statement falsely and calumniously represented that the pursuer, in administering the defender's estate, had been unfaithful to his trust, and had been dishonest, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer?

The defender argued that the word "liar" was not actionable, especially when spoken in rixa, as was clearly the case here. The word "unfaithful" was not in itself actionable. The incident referred to in the first issue was clearly all in rixa, the statements in the second and third could not reasonably bear an innuendo of dishonesty, and the pursuer was not entitled to bolster them up by a reference to the first (Cockburn v. Reekie, 1890, 17 R. 568; Watson v. Duncan, 1890, 17 R. 404; Christie v. Robertson, 1899, 1 F. 1155; Agnew v. British Legal Life Insurance Co. Ltd., 1906, 8 F. 422; Broomfield v. Greig, 1868, 6 M. 563).

The pursuer maintained that a factor is in a position of trust, and that a charge of unfaithfulness, combined with express questioning of his honesty, was manifestly injurious to his professional reputation as a factor, and therefore actionable. He admitted that malice must be proved in the first issue, because the relation of factor and proprietor was privileged in the circumstances alleged, but that did not apply to the second and third issues. The pursuer referred to Ritchie & Co. v. Sexton, 1891, 18 R. (H.L.) 20; Dunn v. Bain, 1877, 4 R. 317.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Guthrie. — Pybus v. Mackinnon.

The Lord Ordinary allowed the issues as adjusted supra.

Lord Guthrie.—The defender raises no question on the last issue, that relating to the alleged assault. He objects to the other issues on the ground that the construction put by the pursuer on the words alleged to have been used is forced and unreasonable. Clearly, such an expression as "you are a liar," spoken in rixa is not actionable (Watson v. Duncan, 1890, 17 R. 404; and Agnew v. British Legal Life Assurance Co. Ltd., 1906, 8 F. 422; see also Cockburn v. Reekie, 1890, 17 R. 568, and Christie v. Robertson, 1899, 1 F. 1155). But the comparison, by a landlord to his factor, of that factor to "the unjust steward," and the charge of unfaithfulness brought by a landlord against his factor, are reasonably capable of a slanderous meaning. Some might think that the actings of the unjust steward, not having been beyond his mandate, and not involving any immediate pecuniary benefit to himself, were nothing more than astute, while others might consider that these actings, resulting as they did in nothing but loss to the employer and in indirect advantage to the steward, were in breach of trust and dishonest. As to the charge of unfaithfulness, it may merely mean that the factor has been careless and neglectful, or it may mean that he has been dishonest (Mitchell v. Grierson, 1894, 21 R. 367, per L.P. Inglis, 369, middle). The pursuer innuendoes dishonesty on record. He now proposes to confine the innuendo in his issue to unfaithfulness to trust, and not to include dishonesty. I think, on the lines suggested by the Lord President in Mitchell's case, that dishonesty should go into the innuendo.—1st February 1908.

The Bank of Scotland presented this petition for sequestration of the estate of Robert Youde, who had carried on business as an advertising agent in Edinburgh and resided in Portobello, within one year of the date of presentation. On 20th December 1907 the Lord Ordinary made the usual order for intimation and service, and granting diligence to the petitioners "... to recover evidence of notour bankruptcy and of the other facts necessary to be established. ..."

Appearance was entered for the respondent, who was furth of Scotland at some address unknown to the petitioners. He pleaded, firstly, no jurisdiction, because no proof was produced by the petitioners that he had been resident in Scotland within forty days of the date of presentation of the petition. He was admittedly English by origin, and there was no other ground of jurisdiction averred.

Secondly, he was an undischarged bankrupt in England, and although the trustee in that bankruptcy was discharged in 1894, the bankruptcy was still alive in the hands of the official receiver by reason of sect. 82 (4) of the English Bankruptcy Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. cap. 52) which enacts —

> Where the trustee has not previously resigned or been removed his release shall operate as a removal of him from his office, and thereupon the official receiver shall be the trustee.

The respondent referred to the cases mentioned by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion and to sect. 18 of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict. cap. 79) which enacts as follows :—

> ... Provided that no sequestration shall be awarded by any Court after production of evidence that a sequestration has already been awarded in another Court and is still undischarged.

The petitioners offered to prove that the English sequestration was practically dead. The trustee was released in 1894, and in 1897 the bankrupt, having paid off all his creditors privately, applied for his discharge, which was not opposed by the official receiver or any one else, but was refused by the Court on the ground that the bankrupt having failed to lodge accounts as ordered, was "in contempt of Court." To allow this dead English sequestration to stand in the way of the present application was to enable the debtor to avoid his Scottish creditors under cover of his own offence against the English Court. There was nothing incompetent in concurrent sequestrations (Kellock v. Anderson, 1875, 3 R. 239 ; Taylor v. Charteris, 1879, 7 R. 128 ; Abel v. Watt, 1883, 11 R. 149 ; Gibson v. Munro, 1894, 21 R. 840).

The Lord Ordinary sustained the second objection and refused to grant sequestration.

Lord Guthrie. — The respondent objects to sequestration on two grounds. First, he pleads no jurisdiction. He points to the opening words of sect. 13 of the 1856 Bankruptcy Act: "Sequestration may be awarded of the estate of any person in the following cases ; first, in the case of a living debtor subject to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Courts of Scotland," and he submits that there is no evidence before me to shew that he, admittedly of English origin, not alleged to be the owner of any Scotch heritage, and who left Scotland more than forty days before the service of this petition, is subject to the jurisdiction of the Scotch Courts. It is clear that evidence on this point is as necessary as evidence of notour bankruptcy and residence or possession of a Scotch dwelling-house or place of business within a year before the date of the presentation of the petition. Evidence that the respondent was subject to the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts was "one of the other facts necessary to be established" referred to in my interlocutor of 20th December 1907. No such evidence has been produced, and I therefore cannot award sequestration.

Second, the respondent is admittedly an undischarged English bankrupt. He was adjudicated a bankrupt in England in 1891. The trustee was discharged in 1894 ; but the only effect of this under the English Bankruptcy Act of 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. cap. 52) was to throw the matter into the hands of the official receiver. The petitioners offer to prove that the English sequestration is at present what they call "a dead letter." But so far, at least, as the Scotch Courts are concerned, there is either an English sequestration or there is not. It is admitted there is such a sequestration. If so, that is a sequestration which must affect the whole estates of the bankrupt wherever situated, and therefore leaves no room for a Scotch sequestration (Goetze v. Aders, Preyer & Co., 1874, 2 R. 150 ; Phosphate Sewage Co. v. Lawson, 1878, 5 R. 1125 ; Young v. Buckel, 1864, 2 M. 1077).—1st February 1908.

I. PROCESS — PETITION — INNER OR OUTER HOUSE—DISTRIBUTION OF BUSINESS ACT 1857 (20 & 21 VICT. CAP. 56), SECT. 4 —PETITION FOR JUDICIAL FACTOR ON PARTNERSHIP ESTATE—ACTION BETWEEN PARTNERS PENDING IN SHERIFF COURT—PETITION HELD COMPETENT IN OUTER HOUSE.

II. PROCESS—PETITION FOR JUDICIAL FACTOR —COMPETENCY—PETITION MUST CONTAIN CRAVE FOR SEQUESTRATION OF ESTATE EXCEPT IN CASE OF LAPSED TRUST.

Arthur Booth and Archibald Mackinnon were partners carrying on a licensed business in Glasgow. This was a petition brought before the Lord Ordinary on the Bills for appointment of a judicial factor on the co-partnery estate. Arthur Booth provided the most of the capital, Mackinnon was the practical manager, and the licence for the partnership premises was issued in his name. On 19th December 1907 Booth presented a petition in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow to interdict Mackinnon from preventing him (Booth) exercising his rights as a partner, averring that he, Mackinnon, claimed that the business was his own, and refused to allow him access to the premises or books of the co-partnery. Interim interdict was granted in the Sheriff Court on that date. On 24th December 1907 Arthur Booth presented this petition for a judicial factor, averring that the respondent Mackinnon made it impossible to carry on the co-partnership business, that he, the petitioner, was raising an action in the Court of Session for dissolution of the partnership, and that meanwhile it was necessary to appoint a judicial factor to take over the management of the co-partnery affairs in order to protect the interests of the petitioner and the goodwill and assets of the business. The prayer of the petition did not conclude for sequestration of the co-partnery estate. The respondent objected on the following grounds:—

1. The petition being incident to an action presently depending, cannot be competently brought before the Junior Lord Ordinary under sect. 4 of the Distribution of Business Act 1857.
2. The appointment of a judicial factor is incompetent so long as the partners are vested in the partnership's business and property.
3. The licence for carrying on the business being in the respondent's name, the appointment of a judicial factor would involve the closing of the business premises, and the probable loss of the licence, being the main asset of the business.
4. A judicial factor could not competently carry on the business of the co-partnership.
5. No reason exists for superseding the respondent in the management of the business; and
6. The respondent is, and has all along been, ready and willing to fulfil the terms of the co-partnership agreement.

Sect. 4 of the Distribution of Business Act 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. cap. 56) enacts as follows: "All summary petitions and applications to the Lords of Council and Session which are not incident to actions or causes actually depending at the time of presenting the same shall be brought before the Junior Lord Ordinary. . . ."

The Lord Ordinary held that the section of the Distribution of Business Act founded on only referred to actions in the Court of Session; but that the estate must in any event be sequestrated before a judicial factor could be appointed, because awkward questions might arise between the officer of the Court and "trustees whose management had not been formally suspended or superseded."

The Lord Ordinary further held that he could not appoint a judicial factor on the information before him in the petition, answers, and replies for petitioner; he therefore allowed parties a proof of their averments.

Lord Guthrie.—The respondent objected to the competency of this petition on the ground that, being incident to an action of interdict actually depending at the time of presenting the petition in the Sheriff Court of Glasgow between the same parties, it could only be brought, under the Distribution of Business Act (20 & 21 Vict. cap. 56), sect. 4, in the Inner House. It appears to me that the section of the Act relied on, like the whole other sections of the Act, refers only to actions or causes in the Court of Session. I therefore repel this objection.

The respondent also objected to the petitioner's original proposal that the Court should appoint a judicial factor without sequestrating the estate. I think this objection is sound. So far as can be ascertained, the practice on appointments of judicial factors, except in the case of lapsed trusts, is to sequestrate the estate. The objection to this being done seems merely sentimental, and the absence of sequestration might lead to awkward questions between trustees whose management had not been formally suspended or superseded and the officer of Court. But this objection has been cured by amendment.

The respondent also objected to the petitioner's proposal for the appointment of a factor whose only duties should be to receive the drawings from the licensed business, and to consult with the respondent, the holder of the licence in trust for the co-partnery, in regard to all orders for stock. But the petitioner did not confine himself to this limited crave; but, if it is refused, he asked for the appointment of a judicial factor with the usual powers, the result of which would be that the factor would be entitled to displenish the licensed shop, so far as stocked with partnership goods, and the respondent, being the only licensee, could restock the shop out of his own funds and carry on the business until the termination of the licence.

In any view of the rights of parties, I do not see my way to dispose of this petition without enquiry. I could not appoint a factor, either with full or with limited powers, without evidence of the accuracy of the petitioner's averments. No doubt the respondent makes certain qualified admissions, and his conduct in relation to the Sheriff Court interdict seems to have been indiscreet enough. But neither the evidence nor the admissions before me would warrant the appointment of a judicial factor. I have in view the dependence of the action before Lord Salvesen for dissolution of the co-partnery. The proof ordered by me may shew that the partnership estate is in such danger as to necessitate the appointment asked, pending that action. On the other hand, it may appear that the explanations given by the respondent in his answers are well founded and sufficient.—1*st February* 1908.

323. The American Mortgage Company of Scotland Limited v. Sidway and Another.

Diligence—Arrestment—Arrestment Ad Fundandam Jurisdictionem — Subjects Arrestable—Held that Shares in a Company Were Arrestable to Found Jurisdiction.

(Reported ante, Vol. XIV. pp. 521, 924; supra, p. 687.)

The Defenders reclaimed against the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary repelling their first plea in law, "No jurisdiction."

Argued for Defenders and Relaimers: Arrestment was not competent diligence. Shares in a limited company were in a different position from shares in an ordinary partnership. In the former case the shareholders had no right in the Company's assets. These belonged only to the Company, not to the individual shareholders (Lindley on Companies, I. 544, 6th ed.; Lee v. Neuchatel Asphalte Co., 1899, 41 Ch. D. 1, per Lord Lindley at 23; Foster & Sons Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1894], 1 Q.B. 516, per Kay, L.J., at 530; In re Newmann & Co. [1895], 1 Ch. 674 at 685). There were four essentials to the arrestability of a subject: (1) The arrestee must be under a direct obligation to pay or deliver the subject arrested. (2) He must be a debtor at the date of the arrestment. (3) The arrestee must have possession of the subject arrested. (4) The subject must be capable of being made available in a furthcoming. There were two qualifications to these rules: (a) A claim for an accounting was allowed. (b) Joint property was not arrestable for the debt of one of the co-owners (Lucas's Trs. v. Campbell & Scott, 1894, 21 R. 1096). The authorities for these propositions were Ersk., III. 6, sects. 6, 8, 15–17; Bell's Com., II. 69, 71; North v. Stewart, 1890, 17 R. (H.L.) 60, per Lord Watson at 63, 64; Heron v. Winfields Ltd., 1894, 22 R. 182, per Lord Kinnear 185; Wyper v. Harrison, Carr & Co., 1877, 4 R. 444, per Lord President Inglis 446; Leggatt Bros. v. Moss' Empires Ltd., 1907, 15 S.L.T. 533, per Lord President 536, and Lord Kinnear 538; Bell's Prin., sect. 2283. An arrestment of a contingent claim was the same in substance as that of the arrestment of a share in a company. A person buying a share in a company bought a chance of sharing in the capital of the company in the event of it being wound up, or a chance of a dividend in the event of profits being earned and a dividend being declared. There was no obligation which might be made furthcoming at the date of the arrestment. It was distinguished from a share in a partnership in this, that a partner was always entitled to call his co-partners to account, and an accounting might be ordered at any time. That could not be done in a company. Therefore in a partnership there was an arrestable interest which did not exist in a company (Douglas v. Jones, 1831, 9 S. 856; Baines & Tait v. Compagnie Général des Mines d'Asphalte, 1879, 6 R. 846; Napier, Shanks & Bell v. Halvorsen, 1892, 19 R. 412; Lucas's Trs. v. Campbell & Scott, cit., per Lord Kinnear 1106). With reference to arrestment of current rents see More's Notes, p. 286. As to the cases cited for the pursuers in the Outer House, In re National Bank of Wales [1897], 1 Chan. 298, and Lindsay v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 1860, 22 D. 571, did not affect the question either way, so far as the decisions went, although in the latter case the judges assumed that shares were arrestable. But in neither that case nor Sinclair v. Staples, 1860, 22 D. 600, was the question argued as it was being argued now. The proper and competent diligence against shares was adjudication, which extended to moveables when arrestment was not competent (Stair, III. 2, 48; More's Notes, p. 299; Ersk., II. 12, 48; Parker on Adjudications, p. 16; Barbour v. M'Minn, 1826, 4 S. 806; Morrison v. Harrison, 1876, 3 R. 406, per Lord Justice-Clerk Moncrieff at 409).

Counsel for the pursuers and respondents were not called on.

The Lord President.—My Lords, in this case jurisdiction is alleged to have been founded against the defenders by the arrestment of certain shares belonging to them in a limited company registered in Scotland under the Companies Act 1862 and the subsequent Acts; and the objection made is that, inasmuch as in the case of this particular company no dividend was at that moment payable and unpaid, there was nothing due by the Company to the common debtor, who was the shareholder, and that consequently there was nothing arrested. We have had a very ingenious and a very interesting argument from Mr Watson, and indeed it needed one. It is a somewhat startling proposition to find at this time of day, over forty years after 1862, that the practice, which has certainly been going on all this time, of arresting shares of limited companies, is radically wrong. Although there may not have been many cases of arrestment of shares juridictionis fundandæ causa, there certainly have been countless cases of arrestment in execution; and it is quite evident that the two matters depend upon the same principles. If this is a bad arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, it would have been an equally bad arrestment in execution. I think that, as a mere matter of authority, the question is decided by the case of Sinclair v. Staples, 1860, 22 D. 600. Sinclair v. Staples was decided no doubt upon an earlier Act—before the Companies Act of 1862—but the provision of the earlier Act was the same as in the present series of Acts—namely, that shares in a joint-stock limited liability company are declared to be personal property. Accordingly the decision directly applies. The case there was put, so to speak, the other way. The action was one of adjudication, and the first plea stated by the defenders was against the competency of the action, the defenders saying that adjudication was wrong because arrestment was the proper diligence. Accordingly the whole argument turned upon that matter, and the action of adjudication was dismissed upon the ground that arrestment was competent. The mere statement of the case shews that it is a direct authority. Mr Watson, however, says, and I think says truly, that so far as one can gather from the report the point was not argued in precisely the same way as it has been argued to-day.

But, my Lords, I do not think that the argument to-day alters the authority of that case. I think the matter is exceedingly well put by the Lord Ordinary. After stating that the objectors here do not deny that it is quite competent to arrest in the hands of a partnership the right, whatever it is, of the partner in an ordinary partnership, the Lord Ordinary goes on to say this: "But the defenders deny that the rule regulating ordinary partnerships applies to shares in limited joint-stock companies. They found on the principle enunciated in many English cases, such as that of In re George Newman [1895], 1 Ch. 674, per Lord Justice Lindley, at p. 685: 'An incorporated company's assets are its property, and are not the property of the shareholders for the time being.' From this they argue that no debt was due by the Missouri Land Company Limited to the defenders at the date of arrestment, and therefore their shares in that company could not be arrestable. This seems to me to involve a confusion of ideas. As Mr Bell put it (II. Com. p. 71), 'It is the obligation to account which is the proper subject of attachment.'"

Now, my Lords, I think that is the whole substance of the matter. It seems to me there is an obligation to account, in the sense in which Mr Bell puts it, between the limited company and the shareholders of that company, and that this obligation is not at all touched by the doctrine laid down by Lord Justice Lindley as to which I take it there is no doubt whatsoever. It must be remembered that Lord Justice Lindley was speaking as an English lawyer, and naturally had before his mind the fact that according to the English law of partnership what one might call the partnership assets really belong, in a way which we should call pro indiviso property, to the various partners. My Lords, there will be found a learned judgment of my brother Lord Kinnear in the case of Parnell v. Walter, 1889, 16 R. 917, which describes the nature of the rights that a partner in England has in the assets of the partnership. Lord Justice Lindley points out that that is altered when you come to an incorporated company where the property in any particular asset does not belong to the shareholders of the company but belongs to the company. That, in Scotland, is a very familiar notion, because in our law in an ordinary common law partnership the partnership has always been considered a separate persona. Accordingly the doctrine that the partnership assets do not belong to the partners but belong to the partnership has always been held quite consistent with our well-established Scottish doctrine that a share of a common law partnership is perfectly well arrestable. My Lords, it seems to me that the point put by Mr Bell is the true criterion. It is the obligation to account which is the subject of attachment, and the obligation to account does not mean that there is then and there a debt due in the sense of something due and payable. That will depend upon circumstances, and the circumstances will vary according to the particular deed of partnership, or according to the particular constituent deed which makes the limited company. I am aware that the right of the shareholder to have a payment made to him (in proportion to his share) of profits that have been earned in the limited company is not a direct right, because, before he can get it, these profits have to be declared as a dividend, and the declaring as dividend is an operation which rests on the will of the properly constituted authorities of the company according to the company deeds, that is to say, its memorandum and articles of association. In the same way in a private partnership the particular time at which a partner might say, "Now you have made profits; give me my share," will depend entirely upon the provisions of the partnership deed. There might be a partnership deed in which it was covenanted between the partners that they should not draw any profits until the expiry of the partnership. There might, on the other hand, be a stipulation, and it is a very common one, that the drawings during the currency of the partnership should be limited to a certain amount, and there would be no objection to adding to that stipulation that the payment of the certain amount should only be at certain seasons of the year. So that it would be perfectly possible to put your finger upon a date in a private partnership when it would be impossible for a partner to say, "Pay me something"; and yet, notwithstanding, there has never been any doubt in our law that the obligation to account is an arrestable subject.

The truth is that any difficulty which exists is really a metaphysical one, and is, I think, satisfactorily dealt with by Lord Cowan in the case of Sinclair v. Staples, and the metaphysical difficulty seems to me precisely the same whether you take the case of a private partnership in Scotland, or the case of shares in a joint-stock company, because there is a separate persona in a Scottish partnership which corresponds exactly with the separate persona of an incorporated company. I am of opinion that it would be a great pity to alter the law, and I do not think there is any reason for doing so. The case of Sinclair v. Staples, which has ruled the practice for nearly half a century, ought, I think, to be followed here. Accordingly I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is right, and ought to be adhered to.

Lord M'Laren.—I think the Lord Ordinary's decision is right, and put on the right grounds. The nature of the subject arrestable is not always the same. Some things are arrestable upon one ground and others upon a different ground. In this case the subject is said to be arrestable in the hands of the company because of the principle of accountability to a shareholder by the company. In Scotland we are not embarrassed by a distinction which exists in the law of England—I mean the distinction between a private partnership and a public company, because the law of Scotland recognises a separate persona in a private partnership: so much so that in an action against a social firm it is not even necessary to call one of the partners. In this respect I think there is nothing but a formal difference between the right of a partner in a private partnership and the right of a shareholder in a company incorporated under the Companies Acts. Of course, if it could be shewn that there was no way in which the company could be made responsible to its shareholders, in an action for the protection of their interests, then the substratum of the doctrine that these shares are arrestable would be gone. But then that is not the law, because although no doubt the determination of the rights of the shareholders rests with the company itself, either through the directors, or in certain matters through meetings of the whole body of shareholders, yet a company managed by dishonest directors, or a dishonest majority of the shareholders acting oppressively and in such a way as to prejudice the legal rights of a minority of the shareholders, or the legal rights of even a single shareholder, can be compelled to give redress. That, I think, shews that the interest or right of the shareholder is always something which, though held by the company, must be administered for his behoof. I think it also shews that the relation between the company and the shareholder is not merely a theoretical but a very real and practical one, that, when necessary, the rights of the shareholders are under the protection of the law. It is true that in the ordinary case the shareholder can only establish his interest through the company, yet, if the company refuse redress, his interest does not fail but can be made effectual through the Court. I agree that the question is exactly the same whether we are dealing with an arrestment to found jurisdiction or an arrestment in execution. In either case the arrestment of shares in a company registered in Scotland is a sufficient ground for putting diligence in force.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with your Lordships. The question, like every other question of diligence, is highly technical, and therefore we are all the more bound to follow the decisions which have stood for a long series of years and have fixed the practice. Nobody disputes that a share in a joint-stock company is attachable for the debt of a shareholder, and the only question is whether the proper diligence to attach to it is arrestment or adjudication. I say that is the only question, because it has not been suggested that it can be reached by poinding or that it is protected from attachment altogether. Now I think there is a series of decisions which would govern this case even apart from the decision in Sinclair v. Staples—I mean decisions to the effect that the interest of a partner in an ordinary copartnery is attachable by arrestment even although it may be said that there is no money due at that moment to the partner, and although upon an accounting it might be found that there was no balance in his favour. I should have thought these cases in point; but any doubt I should have had is entirely removed by the decision in Sinclair v. Staples, which is to my mind a decision directly in point, and which I think we are bound to follow.—31*st January* 1908.

324. Rudman v. Jay & Company.

REPARATION—WRONGOUS USE OF DILIGENCE—DECREE AD FACTUM PRÆSTANDUM OBTAINED IN ABSENCE—PARTY DECERNED AGAINST IMPRISONED FOR FAILURE TO IMPLEMENT DECREE—ACTION OF DAMAGES—AVERMENT THAT PARTY IMPRISONED UNABLE, TO KNOWLEDGE OF PARTY DOING DILIGENCE, TO IMPLEMENT DECREE WITHOUT COMMITTING CONTEMPT OF COURT—AVERMENTS WHICH HELD INSUFFICIENT TO SUPPORT ACTION OF DAMAGES.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

This was an action of damages for wrongous use of diligence brought by Trevor Inglis Rudman, civil engineer, Edinburgh, against Jay & Co., furniture dealers, Glasgow.

The following narrative of the pursuer's averments is taken from the judgment of the Lord Ordinary.

This is an action for damages for wrongous arrestment and imprisonment, on a warrant to imprison obtained after an expired charge ad factum præstandum. The alleged circumstances are these:—The pursuer Rudman states that in November 1905 he obtained from the defenders Jay & Company, cabinetmakers, Glasgow, upon a hire and purchase agreement, No. 7 of process, certain articles of furniture, which in November 1906 were still in his possession, and constituted the whole plenishing of his house, 12 Inverleith Gardens, Edinburgh. At the latter date the pursuer was in arrear both with the rent of his house and with the instalments due under the hire and purchase contract. Accordingly, on 20th November 1906, his landlord sequestrated the furniture in said house for rent past due and to become due. There was included in the inventory under this sequestration the whole of the articles belonging to the defenders, and possessed by the pursuer under said hire and purchase contract. They remained under the sequestration till a point of time posterior to the circumstances upon which this action of damages is founded. The pursuer next states that, in the end of November and after the landlord's sequestration had attached, the defenders, as they were entitled to do, he being in arrear with the instalments under the hire and purchase contract (see head 3 of No. 7 of process), sent their representative with a waggon to his, the pursuer's, house to remove their furniture, but that, on his wife informing him of the landlord's sequestration, and exhibiting to him the schedule of sequestration, their representative declined to intermeddle with the furniture. The pursuer further states that on 20th November 1906 one of his creditors presented a petition for cessio against him in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh, on which decree of cessio was pronounced on 22nd January 1907. The pursuer alleges that in consequence of the said decree of cessio he left his house at Inverleith Gardens, leaving the furniture in question in it, and informed the trustee in his cessio that he had done so. This, however, was not sufficient to vest the trustee in the cessio in possession of the furniture, or in any way to vest him with a title to it. It is not averred that the pursuer has executed a disposition omnium bonorum, nor that the trustee has actually taken possession of the furniture.

In these circumstances the defenders, on the 4th February 1907, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Edinburgh against the pursuer for decree, ordaining him to deliver the articles of furniture in question to them. That the pursuer was personally served with this summons he impliedly admits, as he alleges that he handed the citation to the trustee in his cessio, and did not himself defend the action. It is common ground that the trustee in the cessio was sisted in this action, and, for his interest, consented to decree being pronounced as concluded for, and that decree in absence was pronounced against the pursuer, with £18, 1s. 10d. of taxed expenses. On 3rd May 1907 the defenders gave the pursuer a charge on the decree, and he, not having implemented the decree, they, on 13th May, applied for a warrant of imprisonment, which they obtained on the same day and executed on 14th May 1907, and the pursuer was imprisoned accordingly. He at once presented a note of suspension and liberation, when the defenders consented to liberation, and the note was dismissed, the Lord Ordinary finding the respondents, the present defenders, entitled to expenses. These expenses have not been paid.

The pursuer further averred:

COND. 9. At the time of obtaining and executing the said warrant, implement by the pursuer of the said decree was, to the knowledge of the defenders, impossible, and arrest and imprisonment of the pursuer was wrongously and unjustifiably caused by the defenders. The defenders knew that the pursuer could not personally give delivery as he was not in possession. The defenders, after notice of the transfer of possession to the trustee by the decree of cessio, were bound to take delivery in his hands, but the defenders have refused to take such delivery. The defenders also arrested and imprisoned the pursuer under the said warrant in the knowledge that the pursuer could not intermeddle with the said articles without being guilty of contempt of Court, both for breach of poinding and for breach of the decree of cessio. The defenders also acted in bad faith in imprisoning the pursuer. He intimated to them that he wished to suspend the decree and charge if they were to enforce the charge by imprisonment, and he relied on their answering his letter of 11th May in order to do so. No answer of any kind was sent. The defenders in hiring the furniture undertook the risk of its being sequestrated under the landlord's hypothec, and of its being affected by the pursuer's bankruptcy, and the liability of the pursuer under the said agreement was qualified by that fact as an implied condition thereof; and the defenders were not entitled to execute the said warrant after the sequestration and cessio. Further, the use of the said diligence was an unwarrantable device to force the pursuer to pay his rent, and when it was no longer possible for him to do so, the defenders persisted in the said diligence, and the arrest and imprisonment of the pursuer was part of a scheme to annoy and injure the pursuer. It was not diligence carried out in good faith to enforce the said decree, but imprisonment used to compel payment of rent, and it was due to malice, and was without probable cause.

47*a* AND 48*a*

The defenders pleaded:

"2. The averments of the pursuer being irrelevant and insufficient in law to support the conclusions of the summons, the action should be dismissed.

"4. The pursuer having been arrested and imprisoned under a legal warrant regularly obtained and executed, the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor."

On 18th December 1907 the Lord Ordinary (Johnston) allowed a proof.

He added the following note:

Lord Johnston [after the narrative above quoted].—The present action is for damages for wrongous imprisonment. To the relevancy of the action the defenders object. They maintain that they acted within their legal rights; that they personally served this action on the pursuer, and, he not opposing, obtained the decree of a competent court, and followed up that decree by legal and competent diligence, everything being done regularly and with judicial authority. And they maintain further that there can be no actionable wrong in following out a legal right (Allen v. Flood, L.R. [1898], A.C. 1), and that it is no answer on the part of the pursuer that it was impossible for him to implement the decree, without breach of the standing sequestration, for it was always open to him to pay his rent and free the sequestrated articles from the nexus laid on by the landlord. They say that there can be no wrong in putting a man in prison on a competent decree, followed by a competent warrant of imprisonment, though there may be good ground, in the discretion of the Court, for letting him out, if he applies in the recognised way for liberation.

I agree with the defenders that their case is quite different from that of a defender who has proceeded on ex parte diligence. I also discard consideration of certain averments of the pursuer founded on his cessio. His cessio, there being no divestiture by disposition omnium bonorum, or even possession given to and taken by the trustee, was no bar to the pursuer implementing the decree. The effect of cessio and of sequestration are quite different in the matter of divestiture of the bankrupt and investiture of the trustee (Simpson v. Jack, 1888, 16 R. 131). Still I am not able to sustain the defenders' contention, as I think their argument misses the true ground of action.

The case of Graham v. Dundas, 1829, 7 S. 876, indeed lays down in unmistakable terms that if a party has "right to obtain decree, he must also be entitled to enforce that decree by the forms and executorials allowed by law," without being liable in damages. This was followed in Aitken v. Finlay, 1837, 15 S. 683. In both these cases the original decrees were found ultimately to have been erroneous on the merits, but it was held that this did not give relevancy to the claim. In Bell v. Gunn, 1859, 21 D. 1008, the same conclusion was arrived at, though the decree, which was the foundation of the diligence, was found not erroneous on the merits, but on a technical objection to the instance, which had not been stated by the defender, who made no appearance, though personally cited. See also Kinnes v. Adam & Sons, 1882, 9 R. 698, and other cases referred to. But in Wolthekker v. Northern Agricultural Co., 1862, 1 Macph. 211, the Lord Justice-Clerk (Inglis) predicates an important condition to the freedom from consequences of the litigant who uses any legal right or remedy to which he is absolutely entitled, in these words, "unless he was shewn to have resorted to it maliciously and without probable cause," and less definitely where he speaks of such litigant using "his legal right moderately and in good faith."

It is there that the true case of the pursuer arises. He cannot and does not object to the defenders having taken decree against him, nor can he object to their following up the decree by personal diligence per se, but he does object to their doing so in the circumstances in which they and he found themselves, which he says was not the following out their legal rights moderately and in good faith, but oppressively and maliciously.

What, then, are the circumstances alleged? The defenders were apprised of the sequestration. Apart from averments of special intimation at an earlier date, they admit that they did learn of the subsistence of the sequestration on 12th May 1907, the day on which they applied for their warrant for imprisonment, and two days before they executed it. They also knew at the time, 19th March 1907, when they took the decree, which was the foundation for the warrant to imprison, that the pursuer was under cessio, for the trustee was a consenting party for his interest to their taking such decree. They must further be held to have known that it was an incident of their contract of hire and sale, of which they took the risk, that their furniture in the pursuer's possession would be subject to the hypothec of the pursuer's landlord. They must therefore have known that their debtor, the pursuer, could not, unless he was able to pay the rent, implement the decree without breach of the landlord's sequestration, and that being a bankrupt under cessio he could not be expected to pay the rent in order to release the furniture. This seems to me a relevant averment to distinguish the case from the general rule of Graham v. Dundas and the other cases above quoted, and from which it is possible to infer the malice which is averred.

I do not think that it is necessary to follow the interesting argument which the defenders maintained, on the question whether the impossibility of fulfilment excused from contract liability (Gillespie & Co. v. Howden & Co., 1885, 12 R. 800; Jones v. St John's College, Oxford, 1870, L.R. 6 Q.B. 115; Lord Clifford v. Watts, 1870, L.R. 5 C.P. 577). There are cases in which undoubtedly it does not. But they depend on the terms of the contract and the cause of the impossibility. But while in many such cases the impossibility of performance will form no defence to an action for breach, it would, I think, form an adequate defence to an action for specific implement, and even if a decree for specific implement was obtained, I think it would be a very dangerous proceeding to attempt to enforce it by personal diligence.

The case is in some of its aspects not unlike that of Bot'ger v. The Globe Furnishing Co., decided by me in June 1906, 14 S.L.T. 117, to the judgment in which I refer. But I desire to add that I had not the benefit in that case of such a full argument and such an exhaustive citation of authority, and to admit that consideration of the question of malice, to which no argument was addressed, escaped me. I understand that the case did not go further.

I am unable, as I think there is a sufficient foundation laid for the pursuer's averment of malice, to sustain the defenders' plea to the relevancy. The action must therefore go to proof. But I do not think that in the exercise of my discretion I should send the case to a jury. There are, to my mind, several reasons why it will be better disposed of by a proof before a judge.

There remains to consider the defenders' contention that the case should not be allowed to proceed without the pursuer as an undischarged bankrupt being required (a) to find caution, and (b) to pay the expenses found due in the note of suspension and liberation. As regards the first point, I accept as the general rule of practice, what is stated by the Lord President (Inglis) in Clarke v. Muller, 1884, 11 R. 418, and acknowledge that though exception from the general rule is in the discretion of the judge, that discretion should be sparingly exercised. But I think that in this case there are circumstances which justify the exercise of that discretion in favour of the pursuer. And as regards the second point, while I think it doubtful whether on the information before me expenses should have been given in the suspension and liberation, I think the case bears to be distinguished from the cases of Irvine v. Kinloch, 1885, 13 R. 172, and M'Murchy v. Maclullich, 1889, 16 R. 678.

The Defenders reclaimed and argued: The defenders having obtained a decree which was ex facie valid, were entitled to enforce it by appropriate diligence (Graham v. Dundas, 1829, 7 S. 876; Aitken v. Finlay, 1837, 15 S. 683; Bell v. Gunn, 1859, 21 D. 1008). In the case of a decree ad factum præstandum the appropriate diligence was imprisonment, and the defenders were entitled to obtain a warrant for imprisonment just as they might have enforced a decree for payment by a charge (Personal Diligence Act 1838, 1 & 2 Vict. cap. 114, sect. 11). It was not suggested that the procedure was irregular, and there was thus no actionable wrong. Even if the pursuer were unable to implement the decree, that could not affect the defenders' right to enforce it (Gillespie & Co. v. Howden & Co., 1885, 12 R. 800). Even if the defenders had acted maliciously, that would not help the pursuer. The exercise of a legal right plus malice did not amount to an actionable wrong (Allen v. Flood [1898], A.C. 1). Kinnes v. Adam & Sons, 1882, 9 R. 698, and Wolthekker v. Northern Agricultural Company, 862, 1 M. 211, were special, and the dicta in these cases must be read in the light of the special circumstances. But, further, malice was not relevantly averred. Even if the defenders had known that the pursuer could not implement the decree, they were not acting maliciously in putting the matter to the test. In fact, the defenders did not know whether the pursuer could implement the decree or not. The cessio was six months old, and acquirenda did not fall under it. The defender might have obtained money since the date of the cessio, or his friends might be willing to help him. In either event the pursuer would have been able to take the furniture out of the sequestration by paying the rent, and he would then have been in a position to implement the decree without being in breach of the sequestration. If the pursuer's averments were relevant, he should not be allowed to proceed except on conditions (a) of finding caution for expenses (Clarke v. Muller, 1884, 11 R. 418) and (b) of paying the expenses of the suspension and liberation (Irvine v. Kinloch, 1885, 13 R. 172; M'Murchy v. Maclullich, 1889, 16 R. 678).

Argued for the Pursuer: The pursuer's averments were relevant. The defenders had obtained the decree ad factum præstandum by means of ex parte statements that the furniture was in the pursuer's possession and that he had refused to deliver it to the defenders. These statements the defenders knew to be unfounded, because they knew that the furniture had fallen under the sequestration for rent, and that if the pursuer had interfered with it he would have been guilty of contempt of Court. In doing diligence on a decree so obtained the defenders were in the same position as if they had obtained a wrongous interim interdict. While the defenders were undoubtedly entitled to enforce a decree lawfully obtained, they were not entitled to use diligence unfairly or oppressively (Wolthekker v. Northern Agricultural Co., cit.; M'Gregor v. M'Laughlin, 1905, 8 F. 70; Sturrock v. Welsh & Forbes, 1890, 18 R. 109). Here the diligence had been abused. It was an implied condition of a decree ad factum præstandum that the party decerned against should be able to implement it. The defenders knew that the furniture was under sequestration, and that the defender could not have delivered it without being guilty of contempt of Court. It would not do to say that the pursuer might have got rid of the sequestration by paying the rent, because the defenders knew that the pursuer was under cessio and was not in a position to pay the rent. As to the suggestion that the pursuer's friends might be induced to pay the rent, that was not a legitimate use of the diligence of imprisonment. It was not legitimate to use a decree ad factum præstandum to operate payment of a money debt (Mackenzie v. Balerno Paper Mill Co., 1883, 10 R. 1147). The fact that the furniture fell under the sequestration for rent was the legal result of the contract between the pursuer and the defenders. The defenders were not entitled to use the diligence of imprisonment for the purpose of avoiding the consequences of their own contract. If it were necessary to aver malice, malice was well averred, because the diligence had been used with a wrong motive and with a gross disregard of the pursuer's rights. As to finding caution, that was a matter in the discretion of the Court. In the circumstances of the present case, it would be a denial of justice to ordain the pursuer to find caution. Payment of the expenses of the suspension and liberation should not be made a condition of allowing the pursuer to proceed (Stuart v. Moss, 1886, 13 R. 572). Irvine v. Kinloch (cit.) was special. Counsel also referred to Personal Diligence Act 1838, sect. 6; Lindsay v. Earl of Wemyss, 1872, 10 M. 708.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, sustained the second and fourth pleas in law for the defenders, and assoilzied them from the conclusions of the action.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—This case is somewhat peculiar. The defenders are furniture dealers who supplied certain furniture to the pursuer on the hire-purchase system. When the instalments due for the furniture were not paid, the defenders sent to the pursuer's premises and demanded re-delivery of the furniture. They were met by production of a decree of Court, by which the furniture was sequestrated for rent due for the house in which the furniture was. No doubt that took the furniture out of the control of the pursuer. Then the present defenders, as pursuers, brought an action against the present pursuer as defender, and took a decree in that action for delivery of the furniture. They were quite entitled to take such a decree. That is shewn conclusively by the fact that no one opposed the granting of the decree—neither the present pursuer nor the trustee in his cessio nor any one else. We must assume that this decree was rightly granted. No one has impugned it. Having a decree ad factum præstandum, the present defenders—then pursuers—proceeded to enforce it, and the only way open to them for enforcing it was imprisonment. Accordingly the present pursuer was imprisoned under the decree. He was liberated the next day. The question now is whether the person who was so imprisoned has a good claim of damages in respect of such imprisonment. A number of ingenious arguments have been stated to us in support of the pursuer's case, but I am satisfied that none of these arguments are well founded, and that the pursuer has no relevant case. Further, I am satisfied that the pursuer was imprisoned under a legal warrant, regularly obtained and executed, and that the defenders are entitled to decree of absolvitor. I do not go further into details, except to say this, that I do not think there is any relevant averment of malice in the pursuer's record, and there is nothing alleged from which malice could be inferred. I think therefore that we should recal the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, sustain the second and fourth pleas for the defenders, and assoilize them from the conclusions of the action.

Lord Stormonth-Darling and Lord Low concurred.

Lord Ardwall.—I agree with your Lordship in the chair that the pursuer has set forth no relevant case, and that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled, the second and fourth pleas in law for the defenders sustained, and the defenders assoilzied.

The facts are sufficiently set out in the Lord Ordinary's opinion, and it is unnecessary to recapitulate them at any length.

The defenders, who are furniture dealers in Glasgow, raised an action against the pursuer for delivery of articles of furniture which belonged to them. The present pursuer did not appear to defend the action, but the trustee in his cessio was sisted in the action, and for his interest consented to decree being pronounced as concluded for. The pursuer in the present action not having appeared at all, decree for delivery ad factum præstandum in absence was pronounced against him, with expenses. The defenders gave the pursuer a charge on this decree, and he having failed to implement the decree within the days of charge, on 13th May 1907 they applied in ordinary course for a warrant for imprisonment, on which the pursuer was imprisoned. What the present defenders did was entirely within their rights. They merely carried out the decree that they had obtained without objection on the part of the pursuer. The whole proceedings were orderly proceeded, and perfectly regular.

This is not one of the proceedings which the party setting them in motion is held to adopt suo periculo, such as a summary application for interdict or the arrest of a person in meditatione fugæ; and although it is said that the diligence was due to malice and was without probable cause, yet there are no relevant averments of malice or want of probable cause. The pursuer's allegations, so far as they have even a semblance of relevancy, seem to be founded on this, that there was no reason for the diligence of imprisonment being put in force, because the furniture in question being sequestrated, the pursuer did not have it in his power to deliver it to the defenders; and being under a cessio, he had no money wherewith to pay his rent and release the furniture from the landlord's sequestration.

I cannot accept this view of the situation. Under the old law of imprisonment for debt, debtors were frequently put in prison although they had no effects or money in their possession, simply as a compulsitor to make them or their friends find the money to pay the debt, and in the same manner the defenders in this case used imprisonment as a compulsitor to induce the pursuer, by raising money, to get rid of the landlord's sequestration and to deliver the furniture in terms of the decree. This was a perfectly intelligible piece of procedure, and was, as I have said, entirely within the rights of the defenders; and while I am not prepared to say that in no case might it be possible that malice could be relevantly averred against a person using such diligence, such averment would require to be very distinct and specific, and I do not think that any such exists in the present action. I regard it as wholly out of the question that any person should be subjected to an action of damages for executing the appropriate lawful diligence following on a decree ad factum præstandum of a competent Court on bare averments that the diligence was used maliciously and without probable cause.

It is unnecessary to consider the other question as to whether the pursuer is bound to pay the defenders' expenses in the suspension and liberation as a condition of being allowed to proceed with the action.—7th February 1908.

Appeal against an Interlocutor of the Second Division (The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Kyllachy, Stormonth-Darling and Low) reversing an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

The claimants, the next of kin, appealed. The arguments and facts of the case and the terms of the bequest sufficiently appear from the previous reports.

The House dismissed the appeal.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, the question in this case is whether a charitable bequest is to be treated as void for uncertainty. The bequest was of an unusual kind. Its object, according to the will, was to benefit persons who had shewn practical sympathy in the pursuits of science. A number of conditions were prescribed. The recipients of this bounty were, among other things, to be widowers or bachelors of fifty-five years of age or upwards, whose lives had been characterised by sobriety and other specified virtues. They were to be indigent—a provision which stamps the bequest as charitable. These conditions were not really canvassed in argument and need not be further considered, for no one of them is such as to impart to the bequest an uncertainty which will vitiate it in law.

House of Lords.

Murdoch's Trustees v. Weir and Others.

The Lord Chancellor.

The only point seriously made against this clause in the will is that the recipients of this charity were to be persons who had "shewn practical sympathy in the pursuits of science." These words have been subjected to a rigorous criticism. What is science, it was asked, and how are we to know its bounds? What is sympathy in the pursuits of science, and when and how does it become practical? What are pursuits of science in the plural as distinguished from pursuit in the singular? The thought underlying this current of observation seems to be that, if a bequest is to a class of persons, the class must be capable of being defined, and be defined so precisely that there can rarely be a doubt who does or who does not fall within it.

Now there is no better rule than that a benignant construction will be placed upon charitable bequests. It is difficult to imagine a construction less benignant than that suggested by criticisms such as those to which I have alluded. Few indeed are the charitable bequests that could survive such an ordeal. The fact is, that whenever anyone wishes to describe a class of people otherwise than by referring to their age, sex, birthplace, or similar facts capable of precise ascertainment, the language used must of necessity be general, and there must always be numerous cases on the border line. Deserving literary men who have not been successful, poor members of a particular trade, reduced gentlewomen, are examples of classes of persons who may certainly be benefited; but in each case exactly the same reasoning might be used as was used in the present case to destroy the validity of the will. There is no law requiring that kind and degree of certainty. All that can be required is that the description of the class to be benefited shall be sufficiently certain to enable men of common sense to carry out the expressed wishes of the testator. I have no doubt that this can be done here. Persons who have shewn practical sympathy in an object obviously are persons who have given time or money or made some sort of sacrifice to further it. I am satisfied that the trustees, or, failing them, the Court, would find no difficulty in giving effect to the bequest. Accordingly I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed. The parties have agreed that the appellants are to have their judicial expenses of appeal out of the trust funds; the expenses as awarded in the Court of Session to remain unaltered. I think your Lordships may properly act upon this agreement.

Lord Macnaghten.—My Lords, to my mind the difficulty in this appeal—and it is, I think, a real difficulty—is to discover any substance in the appellants' case.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Murdoch's Trustees v. Weir and Others.

Lord Macnaghten

The gift is a gift in perpetuity, to be administered by trustees for the benefit of bachelors and widowers, poor and aged, whose lives have been characterised by sobriety, morality and industry, "and who have shewn practical sympathy in the pursuits of science in any of its branches." This gift, it is said, is void for uncertainty. Why? The relief of those who suffer from the ills of poverty and the weight of advancing years is, by common consent, the peculiar province of charity in its popular as well as in its legal sense. Unhappily it is only too easy to recognise the aged and the poor who are always with us. Then, I suppose, it has happened to most men to have formed an opinion, satisfactory at least to themselves, as to the moral and the general character of some applicant for some employment or other. Notwithstanding the ingenious argument of the learned counsel who spoke second, I cannot think that the task is really beyond the capacity of any ordinary individual.

There remains one other qualification to be considered. What is science? and what is "practical sympathy in the pursuits of science"?

Science, it was said, is so vague and comprehensive a term as to be unmeaning. In the view of the Lord Ordinary, "'Science' is a term of no definite or 'particular' meaning." That is certainly not the view of the Legislature. There are, for instance, many enactments in favour of institutions formed for the advancement of "science." The generality of the word has never prevented the Court from applying to the particular case before it the provisions of the Act under its consideration. But what is "practical sympathy"? "An altogether nebulous phrase," says the Lord Ordinary. It is not, perhaps, a happy expression. But if you follow the directions of the testator with a willing mind it is, I think, perfectly intelligible. The wish of the testator was to help those who are in need of help, and who may have done something, much or little, in the way of promoting some branch of science. Within the realms of science the field of choice is wide. But the testator has taken pains to provide competent judges. It is for the trustees to consider and determine the value of the service on which a candidate may rest his claim to participate in the testator's bounty.

I think that the case is much too clear for argument, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Robertson.—My Lords, I must own that I think this a perfectly clear case. If it is said of anyone that he has shewn practical sympathy in the pursuits of science, this is merely a roundabout way of saying that he has helped the pursuits of science; just as to shew practical sympathy in A. B. means to help A. B. Again, the word science embraces a wide but perfectly ascertainable range of subjects. Accordingly, I consider the meaning of this testator to be plain and intelligible.

Report by Lord Ordinary on the Bills.

This was a petition presented by the Earl of Mansfield for authority to disentail the lands of Logiealmond in Perthshire.

The Lord Ordinary (Guthrie) having appointed a curator ad litem to Lord Scone, the pupil son of the petitioner, who was the heir next entitled to succeed to the entailed estate, remitted to Mr Alexander Wallace, W.S., to report. The questions involved in the decision are set forth at length in Mr Wallace's report, which, after stating that the petition was otherwise in order, proceeds in the following terms:—

It humbly appears, however, to the reporter that the granting of the prayer of the petition by your Lordship depends upon whether the petitioner is right in saying that for the purposes of the petition the date of the entail is 18th February 1840. If he is right, then the petitioner, having been born after the date of it, is entitled to disentail without any consent. But if the entail falls wholly or partly to be dealt with according to its actual date, namely, 2nd February 1866, then as the petitioner was born in 1864 he cannot disentail (wholly or in part as the case may be) without the consent of the nearest heir; and as the nearest heir is a pupil such consent can only be given by his tutor ad litem after the value of his interest has been fixed and provided for. When an entail is granted in terms of a trust there seems no doubt that, for the purposes of an application like the present, the date of the entail is the date when the trust comes into operation—this apparently being quite clear from the Act 11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36, sect. 28, and the decision in Black v. Auld, 1 R. 133. But the circumstances of the present case are somewhat peculiar, and the reporter thinks it his duty to direct your Lordship's attention to them.

By a codicil to the last will and testament of the Right Honourable William, Earl of Mansfield, bearing date 11th June 1838, the testator gave and bequeathed to Sir George Clerk, Baronet, William John Law and Cuthbert Ellison the sum of £150,000 in trust, that they or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, should, as soon as a proper and convenient purchase or purchases could be found, lay out and invest the money in the purchase of hereditaments in England or Scotland, of a clear and indefeasible estate or inheritance in fee simple, either freehold or copyhold or both, and settle and assure the same or cause the same to be conveyed, settled and assured so and in such manner as that the same might go along with and be holden and enjoyed by such person or persons as for the time being should, as heirs-male of his body, be entitled to the peerage, honour and title of Earl of Mansfield, in the county of Middlesex, which he then had, and was entitled to so far, and to be unalienable and inseparable therefrom so far as the rules of law or equity would permit. . . . The codicil further provided that Sir George Clerk, William John Law and Cuthbert Ellison, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, should invest the money or such part as should remain in their hands, and declared that any profits arising from such investments should be added to the capital sum directed to be entailed, and that the dividends, interest, and annual proceeds arising or accruing should be paid to the person or persons as would be entitled for the time being to the rents, issues, and profits of the lands, tenements, and hereditaments so to be purchased, in case the same had been purchased and settled as aforesaid; it also contained various other clauses not material to the present question.

The disposition and deed of entail of the estate of Logiealmond is dated 2nd February 1866, and was registered in the Register of Entails on the 16th day of May 1893. It is granted by William David, Earl of Mansfield, son of the said William, Earl of Mansfield. It proceeds on the consideration that the said William, Earl of Mansfield, by his last will and testament, dated 11th June 1838, nominated, constituted, and appointed the said William David, Earl of Mansfield, his sole executor, and on consideration of the foregoing first-mentioned codicil, which is fully narrated. It then proceeds: "Considering further that the said William, Earl of Mansfield, my father, having died on or about the eighteenth day of February, eighteen hundred and forty, and his said last will and testament having been duly proved in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury on the twenty-eighth day of March thereafter, I as sole executor thereby appointed, proceeded to realise the personal estate of my said deceased father, and in that character acquired and became possessed of funds to an amount exceeding the said sum of One hundred and fifty thousand pounds given and bequeathed by the before-recited codicil to the said Sir George Clerk, William John Law, and Cuthbert Ellison as trustees for the purchase and settlement of lands and heritages as therein directed; and whereas the said trustees did never accept or act in the execution of the said trust, and I did not pay over to them the said sum of One hundred and fifty thousand pounds, but have retained that sum and have been in the enjoyment of the interests and annual proceeds thereof since the time when the same came into my hands, and I am still a debtor to the said trustees therefor; and whereas at the term of Martinmas Eighteen hundred and forty-six I purchased and acquired in fee-simple the lands, baronies, and others hereinafter described and disponed, commonly called the lands and barony of Logiealmond and others, at the price of Two hundred and three thousand pounds, conform to disposition in my favour by James Brown, accountant in Edinburgh, and James Condie, writer in Perth, factors, commissioners and attornies nominated and appointed by Sir William Drummond Stewart of Grandtully and Logiealmond, Baronet, dated the fifteenth day of May Eighteen hundred and forty-seven and the third day of August Eighteen hundred and forty-eight, and instrument of sasine following thereon, registered in the General Register of Sasines, at Edinburgh, on the twenty-first day of May Eighteen hundred and fifty-two, and that I have been in possession of the said lands, baronies, and others since the said term of Martinmas Eighteen hundred and forty-six, but no conveyance thereof in favour of the said trustees, nor deed of settlement or entail, in terms of the said codicil, has yet been executed by me, and now seeing that I am willing and desirous to carry the trust committed to the said Sir George Clerk, William John Law and Cuthbert Ellison, trustees foresaid by the codicil before narrated, into execution, in so far as the same relates to the application of the said sum of One hundred and fifty thousand pounds in the purchase of lands and heritages to be settled and entailed as aforesaid, by conveying and settling or entailing the said lands, baronies, and others, in manner herein underwritten, and whereas the said Cuthbert Ellison, one of the trustees named in the before-recited codicil, died on the day of , and the said Sir George Clerk and William John Law, being now the only surviving trustees, have declined to accept of or act in the said trust, and have devolved the whole purposes of the said trust and of the execution of the same, and of the whole powers and instructions specified and contained in the said codicil, upon me, conform to their declinature and devolution of trust dated the thirtieth day of July and third day of August, both in the year Eighteen hundred and sixty-three; therefore, in implement of the trust created by the said codicil, I have assigned, disponed, and conveyed, as I by these presents assign, dispone, and convey."

It thus appears that on the death of William, Earl of Mansfield, his son William David, Earl of Mansfield, as his executor, entered upon and realised his estate; and that, had the terms of the codicil of 11th June 1838 been then carried out, he would, as executor, have paid to Sir George Clerk, William John Law and Cuthbert Ellison the sum of £150,000, with which to purchase lands to be entailed. That he received, as executor of his father, more than the said sum. That in 1846 he purchased, at the price of £203,000, the property of Logiealmond. That in 1866, nothing having been done to implement the codicil, and one of the trustees appointed by the codicil having died, the other two trustees refused to accept the trust and devolved the purposes of it upon William David, Earl of Mansfield, who, "in implement of the trust created by the said codicil," executed an entail of the property which, in 1846, had cost £203,000. The cost of the estate was thus £53,000 more than the sum directed to be dealt with, making it doubtful if the entail was granted wholly in execution of the trust. The deed of entail was granted by William David, Earl of Mansfield, as an individual, so that there is no intervention of any trustee who in an independent capacity might have acquired the estate from him for £150,000 (even if that were less than its true value) and thereafter entailed it in terms of the trust created by the codicil. It may be, therefore, that the entail as a whole, or so far as the value of the estate was in excess of £150,000 at the date when the entail was granted, must not be looked upon as dating for the purposes of the present petition from 13th February 1840, when the codicil came into operation, but as dating for all purposes from 2nd February 1866, when it was executed.

The reporter therefore humbly considers it necessary that your Lordship should decide whether for the purposes of the present petition the date of the entail is 13th February 1840, when by the death of William, Earl of Mansfield, the codicil referred to came into operation; or whether the date must, as regards the whole estate or the amount (if any) by which when entailed its value exceeded £150,000, be held to be 2nd February 1866, when the deed of entail was granted.

On 25th June 1907 the Lord Ordinary made a verbal report to the First Division, and after a hearing the case was appointed to be heard before Seven Judges.

Sect. 2 of the Entail Amendment Act 1848, inter alia, enacts: "Where any estate in Scotland is held by virtue of any tailzie dated prior to the said first day of August One thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, it shall be lawful for any heir of entail born on or after the said first day of August, being of full age and in possession of such entailed estate, by virtue of such tailzie, to acquire such estate in whole or in part in fee simple by applying to the Court of Session for authority to execute, and executing and recording, in the Register of Tailzies, under the authority of the Court, an instrument of disentail in the form and manner hereinafter provided."

The other sections of the statute on which the question turned are sufficiently set forth in the opinion of the Lord President.

Argued for the Petitioner: It was clear that the entail of the estate made in 1866 was in execution of the trust which became operative in 1840, and therefore the entail must be reckoned to have been made in 1840 (Entail Amendment Act 1848, sects. 27 and 28; Black v. Auld, 1873, 1 R. 133). To hold otherwise would be against the whole policy of the Act, which was aimed at entails made after its passing and the evasion of its provisions by means of trusts, and all that would be requisite to defeat the statute would be an option given to trustees to buy land for entail in England or Scotland. Here the respondent relied on such an option, but once the election was made and the entail executed according to Scots law, its date must be determined by that law also (sect. 28, and Black v. Auld, cit. supra).

The deed of entail in 1866 was, in fact, an execution of the trust of 1840, and though it might be informal as a deed of devolution, such informality could be condoned by the beneficiaries.

As to the value of the lands entailed, they were bought in 1846 for £203,000, but there was nothing to shew their true value then or in 1866, nor could that be ascertained. There was nothing to raise a presumption that the entailer meant a double transaction in 1866, or to do anything but expressly to implement his father's directions. The prayer of the petition should be granted.

Argued for the Respondent: The date of the entail in question was the actual date, viz. 1866. It was not de facto in implement of the trust direction coming into operation in 1840, either in form or substance. Sect. 28 did not apply, for it referred back to sect. 27, which was directed to land to be purchased in Scotland only, which alone was in fact entailable. Now here the trustees might in their option have purchased land in England (Lord Advocate v. Stewart, 1902, 4 F. (H.L.) 11, Lord Robertson at p. 18, Lord Lindley p. 19), where a radical distinction was drawn between money subject to the jurisdiction of the Scots Courts, and money which possibly might become so subject. That point was not raised in Black v. Auld, cit. supra; had it been raised, the decision would have been different. Sect. 28 allowed a certain type of entails to be reckoned as of an artificial date, viz. those described in sect. 27, of which this was not one. Further, the entail was not entitled so to be reckoned, not being "in execution of the trust" in the strict sense. The trustees had never elected as between Scottish and English lands, and also the maker of the entail made himself institute instead of liferenter. (In answer to the Court, Studd v. Cook, 1883, 10 R. (H.L.) 54 was referred to.) The mere fact that the object of the direction had now been achieved could not bring the transaction within sect. 28. In any case, as to the excess in value of the lands entailed over the original trust fund of £150,000, the date of the entail must be held to be 1866.

The Court remitted to the Lord Ordinary to grant the prayer of the petition.

The Lord President.—William, third Earl of Mansfield, died in 1840. Part of his testamentary writings consisted of a codicil by which he left the sum of £150,000 to trustees whom he named. The trust purpose was to buy land in England or in Scotland and settle it as therein prescribed upon a series of persons who may be described as in the first instance the persons entitled in their order to succeed to the earldom of Mansfield. The phraseology used is technical and appropriate to English conveyancing; but it may be taken in accordance with the decision of the House of Lords in Studd's case, 10 R. (H.L.) 54, that, had the trustees bought land in Scotland, they would have appropriately complied with the direction by executing a Scotch deed of strict entail.

William, third earl, was succeeded in the title by his son William David, fourth earl, who was also his general representative. The general succession greatly exceeded £150,000. The trustees named in the codicil did not accept office, and nothing was done. So matters stood till 1866. In that year the fourth Earl of Mansfield executed a deed of entail of the estate of Logiealmond, which he at that time held in fee-simple, having purchased it for a sum exceeding £150,000. The narrative of that deed was as follows. [His Lordship read the narrative quoted above.]

By this time the state of the family was that the fourth earl had an only son, Lord Stormont, who had three sons, of whom the third, born in 1864, is the present and sixth earl. As such he has succeeded under the destination in the said entail, and he presents this petition to disentail the said estate. Appearance has been made for his only son Lord Scone, born in 1900, a pupil, and his curator ad litem. The son is heir apparent under the entail. The point, therefore, to be decided is what is the date of the entail. If the date is the date of the execution in 1866, then, as the petitioner was born before that date, he can only disentail by having his son's consent valued and dispensed with; but if the date of the entail is the date when the trust deed first came into operation, viz. 1840, then the petitioner, being born after that date, can disentail without consents.

The petitioner relies on the 28th section of the Rutherfurd Act, which is as follows:—"And be it enacted, that for the purposes of this Act the date at which the Act of Parliament, deed, or writing placing such money or other property under trust, or directing such land to be entailed, first came into operation, shall be held to be the date at which the land should have been entailed in terms of the trust, and shall also be held to be the date of any entail to be made hereafter in execution of the trust, whatever be the actual date of such entail." The expression "such money . . . . such land" refers us back to the 27th section, the opening words of which are: "Where any money . . . . has been or shall be invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed, or where any land is or shall be directed to be entailed, but the direction has not been carried into effect," etc.

The first answer that is made to the petition is that in this case the entail was not made in execution of any trust. I do not think this view is correct. It is true that the actual trustees did not accept and proceed to entail. But what was the position in 1866? The fourth earl was still debtor in the sum of £150,000. It seems to me that at any time from 1840 till the expiry of the period of the long prescription the machinery of the trust could have been reconstituted, the fourth earl, or his representatives if he had died, been made to pay the £150,000, and the lands been bought and the deed executed. If, then, the fourth earl, knowing all this, chose as he did to execute the entail himself, he being proprietor of the land to be entailed, and the value being admittedly over £150,000, I do not think that the transaction altered its quality because of that fact. Suppose the trustees had accepted, been paid the £150,000, and bought land of a third party. It would have been a perfectly competent form of conveyancing to execute the entail in the form of a disposition and deed of entail by that third party, leaving out altogether any conveyance to the trustees. That being so, can it be said to alter the matter because Lord Mansfield, the debtor in the £150,000, does the whole thing himself without going through the form of going to the Court to appoint trustees, who would then merely ask him to execute precisely the deed which he did execute? And, further, that Lord Mansfield thought that the entail was being made in execution of the trust is clearly shewn by the narrative of the deed itself. Another test is this: if the entail is not in execution of the trust deed, then up till 1880 the trust deed could still have been made available. Suppose the trustees, if alive, had tardily accepted, or if new trustees had been appointed by the Court, could they after 1866 have sued Lord Mansfield for £150,000? Surely the execution of the entail would inevitably have furnished a sufficient defence.

The second argument for the respondents raises a more general point. They call attention to the fact that the expression "the trust" in sect. 28 refers you back to sect. 27, and they say that "in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed" must necessarily mean Scotch land, for that alone can be "entailed"; and that, inasmuch as this trust permitted of the purchase of English land, it cannot be a trust of the kind contemplated; and they rely on the case of the Lord Advocate v. Stewart, 4 F. (H.L.) 11.

So far as decision goes this case seems ruled in terms by the case of Black v. Auld, 1 R. 133. A reference to the report will shew that in the trust deed in that case there was an option to buy either English or Scottish land. But we must face the fact that, first, this point does not seem to have been argued; and, second, the judgment of the House of Lords in the Lord Advocate v. Stewart had not yet been pronounced. I am, however, of opinion that Black v. Auld was rightly decided, and that the principles there laid down rule this case.

COURT OF SEVEN JUDGES.

The Lord President.

The question in the Lord Advocate v. Stewart was whether money held in trust did or did not answer the description of "entailed land" in the Finance Act, and was or was not liable to settlement duty. Now, inasmuch as money is not land, it could only become "entailed land" by force of statutory definition. The House of Lords held that whether money destined by trust purpose for the purchase of land to be entailed was entailed land or not—as to which there was a difference of opinion between the judges of the Court of Session and certain of the noble and learned Lords—that could never be predicated of money which under the terms of the trust might never purchase lands which could be entailed, but which might purchase lands in a country other than Scotland to be settled by other forms not those of Scotch entail; and, in accordance with the clause of limitation of all taxing statutes, unless the property was specified as falling under the tax it must go free.

But the question here is what is the date of the entail for all the various requirements of the entail statutes, and I think that sect. 28 takes entails as it finds them and fixes an artificial date. And where I think Black's case comes as an authority is not because it also affords an example of a trust deed where land other than Scotch might have been bought (for, as I said, that point was not argued), but because it fixes a date, the entail once having been made, in a case where antecedently it might have been truly said that there was no certainty that the entail ever would be made. In Black's case the entail was not to be made until Captain Black reached at least the age of twenty-five; it was to be made before he was thirty. Antecedently, therefore, it was not certain till Captain Black became twenty-five that the entail ever would be made. Nevertheless, the time having come when it ought to have been made—i.e. Captain Black having passed the age of thirty—it was held that the date was the date of the trust deed and not the date when Captain Black became either twenty-five or thirty. I refer especially to the remarks of Lord President Inglis, which are too long to quote in full, but which shew clearly that the whole difficulties of the situation were present to his mind. I quote, however, his conclusion:—"The words in the section which probably create the greatest difficulty are those which enact that that date shall be held to be the date at which the lands should have been entailed in terms of the trust deed; and it does seem a little startling at first sight that when, according to the directions of the truster, it is not possible that lands should have been entailed in terms of the trust for a long period after the trust deed came into operation as a trust deed, yet still that the date of the trust deed is to be held to be the date at which the lands ought to have been entailed. It seems as if in a case like this it was a provision of the statute that the direct contrary of what the truster provided shall be carried into effect. But that is really not so, because it is a mere artificial date that is here created, and created for a special purpose—for the purpose of securing the full and effectual operation of the disentailing clauses of the statute. And it was a provision of a very necessary kind, because if this clause were to be read otherwise, a man might succeed, by means of trust directions, in keeping up the money or the land for so long a period before it was actually entailed, that there should be parties in the enjoyment of the money or the land substantially under all the restrictions and fetters of an entail, although the entail has not been executed down to a very late period, it may be for two or three generations. The consequence of that, in regard to such a trust deed, would be to defeat the leading object of the statute, and to enable a truster to bind a succession of persons not born at the date of his trust deed. Now that, I think, is a conclusive argument against the construction of the 28th section contended for by the respondents; and upon that ground I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor."

Upon that I make two remarks. First, that in one sense Black's case was a fortiori so far as difficulty was concerned, because while there was impossibility during the period up to the vesting of the entail to be executed, here there is only uncertainty; and second, that so far as defeating the statute is in his mind it would indeed be an easy way to defeat it by inserting a power in a trust deed to make it optional to buy foreign land. Put in its simplest form my opinion comes to this, that sect. 28 applies to all entails as it finds them; and that if an entail has been de facto made in virtue of the directions of a trust, then sect. 28 settles the date as the date of the trust first coming into operation, even although there may have been contingencies which, if they had operated, would have prevented an entail ever being executed at all.

Last of all, the respondents argue that in so far as the estate of Logiealmond exceeds £150,000 in value it must be held to be entailed for the first time in 1866. I do not think we can enquire into that matter. It seems to me by the narrative of the deed the fourth earl was content, so to speak, to give up Logiealmond as in exchange for the discharge of his debt of £150,000, and that we cannot go into the question of the exact value as at that date.

I am therefore for granting the prayer of the petition.

Lord M'Laren.—I am afraid I am unable to concur with the majority of the Court in this case. The case has been reported by the Lord Ordinary to this Division of the Court on the question whether the petitioner, the Earl of Mansfield, is entitled to disentail the estate of Logiealmond without consents, or whether he is in the position of being unable to disentail without the consent of the nearest heir, in which case, as the nearest heir is a pupil, the required consent can only be given by his tutor ad litem, after the value of his interest has been fixed and provided for. This question again depends on the date, actual or constructive, of the entail under which the lands are held. The estate is held under a disposition and deed of entail made by William David, fourth Earl of Mansfield, bearing date 2nd February 1866, and registered in the Register of Entails 16th May 1893. If the date of the deed of entail (1866) is to be taken as the true or legal date of the entail, then the petitioner, who was born on 25th October 1864, is not in a position to disentail without consent. But the theory of the petition is that the deed of entail was executed in fulfilment of a trust constituted by the testamentary writings of William, third earl, who died in the year 1840, which we are asked to hold to be the date of the entail. If it is so determined, Lord Mansfield would be entitled to disentail the estate without his son's consent, because on that assumption he was born after the date of the settlement.

The question arises in this way. By a codicil to the last will of the third earl, the testator gave and bequeathed to three trustees (who did not accept the trust) the sum of £150,000, in trust, to lay out and invest this sum of money in the purchase of lands and estate in England or Scotland, and to cause the same to be settled and assured so as to be holden and enjoyed by such person or persons as, for the time being, should be entitled to the peerage, honour, and title of Earl of Mansfield. The codicil prescribed certain further limitations which it is not necessary to repeat, and it directed that the annual proceeds of the invested money should be paid to the persons who would be entitled to the rents of the lands to be purchased, in case the same had been purchased and settled as aforesaid.

The testator made another codicil, dated 11th June 1838; but I understand that, in the events which have happened, this codicil does not bear upon the question under consideration.

It appears from the narrative clause of the deed of entail of 1866 that the granter, the fourth earl, was his father's sole executor, and that in that character he had acquired and become possessed of funds to an amount exceeding the prescribed sum of £150,000; that, as the entailer narrates, "the trustees did never accept or act in the execution of the said trust, and I did not pay over to them the said sum of £150,000, but have retained that sum and have been in the enjoyment of the interests and annual proceeds thereof since the time when the same came into my hands, and I am still a debtor to the said trustees therefor." It is then narrated that in 1846 Lord Mansfield had purchased Logiealmond at the price of £203,000, and that he was desirous to carry the trust into execution by conveying and settling or entailing this estate in manner underwritten. He accordingly assigned and disponed Logiealmond in terms of his father's trust destination, and under the fetters of a strict entail.

The determination of the date of the entail for the purposes of the Entail Amendment Act (11 & 12 Vict. cap. 36) depends on sect. 28; but the 27th section has also to be considered. The effective date, according to the 28th section, is "the date at which the Act of Parliament, deed, or writing, placing such money or other property under trust or directing such land to be entailed, first came into operation." The part of sect. 27 which bears on the construction is the introductory expression, "where any money or other property, real or personal, has been or shall be invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed"; in the case there defined the party who would be the heir in possession of the lands may get payment of the money in question under the same conditions as would apply to the acquisition of lands in fee-simple.

As affecting the legal date of the entail under consideration three questions arise: (1) Considering that under the codicil which directed the settlement of landed estate, the trustees had an option to purchase lands either in England or in Scotland, can it be held that a trust for the execution of a Scottish entail came into operation until an election was made as between English and Scottish estate? (2) Can it be held that there was in any true sense an investment in trust for the purposes of the codicil until the estate of Logiealmond was settled by a deed of entail? (3) If these questions are answered in favour of the petitioner, is not 1866 the true as well as the actual date of the settlement as regards the excess of the value of the lands over £150,000?

On the first question my opinion is that it ought to be answered in the negative. The hypothesis of the 28th section is that there is a deed or writing placing money under trust, and by referring back to the 27th section we see that the trust in contemplation is a trust "for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed." No other species of trust are contemplated except a trust of purchase money, or a trust of lands to be entailed. I think it is also clear that the entail considered in sect. 28 is an entail of Scottish estate, because the provisions of the statute have exclusive reference to Scotland. On this hypothesis the 28th section provides that the date when the deed or writing "first came into operation" shall be held to be the date of any entail to be made thereafter in execution of the trust. Now, to put the case most favourably for the argument of the petitioner, let it be supposed that Lord Mansfield's trustees had accepted the trust, that the money had been paid over to them, and that in the year 1866 the entail of Logiealmond was executed by the trustees. At any time before 1866 it would have been open to the trustees to purchase and settle a landed estate in England, and I do not see how in the case supposed the codicil could be said to have come into operation as a trust for the purchase and entailing of lands in Scotland until the trustees had made their election. At most it was only a power or an alternative direction. But then the alternative direction only comes into operation as a Scottish trust, when the trustees have elected between the two members of the alternative. This brings the case within the principle of the case of Lord Advocate v. Stewart (Sprot's trustee), where it was held by the House of Lords that an alternative direction of this nature did not bring the money into the category of "entailed estate" (1902, App. Cas. p. 344). The fact that the second alternative is the purchase and settlement of lands in England does not seem to be very material to the question. The case would be just the same if the alternative had been to establish a picture gallery or to make provisions for the family of the heir. Again, I think that it makes no difference in this question that the money was never paid to trustees. The fourth Lord Mansfield took it upon himself to administer the trust, and his administration has been accepted. But if it is granted that he was a virtual trustee, then he had an election as between English and Scottish estate; and if he was not a trustee, then the entail is his own act, and the date of the deed is the date of the entail.

Court of Seven Judges.

Earl of Mansfield v. Lord Scone.

Lord M'Laren.

It is necessary, however, to attend to the principle of the decision in Black v. Auld, 1 R. 133, because there the testator had directed an entail which could not come into operation so as to confer a benefit on anyone until the institute of entail (the testator's second son) had attained the age of twenty-five, and yet it was held that the date of the testator's death was the date when the trust first came into operation. This is a decision of a Court of Seven Judges, and the leading opinion, that of Lord President Inglis, proceeds largely on the policy of the Entail Amendment Act and the obvious motive of the 27th and subsequent sections, which was to prevent evasion of the enactments restricting the duration of entails by the instrumentality of trusts, liferents in succession, or other limitations in perpetuity. But then I think the determining element in Black v. Auld was this, that by the death of the testator it was irrevocably fixed that there should be an entail, if there were heirs to take, though the benefit to be taken by the institute was postponed. As it happened, the institute was the only person in existence taking benefit under the trust, and he was thus enabled successfully to claim the fund; but that circumstance was not allowed to affect the construction of the Act of Parliament, and the entail was held to have come into operation when according to the conception of the will there was an unqualified, though postponed, trust purpose for constituting an entail. In the present case there was not an unqualified purpose or direction for the entailing of land in Scotland; and while it is easily seen that by means of alternative directions the duration of a proposed entail may be prolonged to an extent somewhat exceeding the contemplation of the Entail Amendment Act, yet, if this result follows, it is only because the Act of Parliament has not explicitly dealt with this particular mode of prolongation. The statutory provisions are altogether within the domain of positive law, and I do not think we can be guided by analogy or can hold that a Scottish trust had come into operation at a time when consistently with the testator's wishes his money might have been diverted into a different channel of investment.

If my opinion is well founded, the date of the entail is 1866, and the petitioner will be under the necessity of purchasing the consent of his pupil son. But it is proper that I should also answer the other questions that arise. On the second of these questions, and reading the 27th and 28th sections together, I think the 28th section presupposes that there is "money invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed." The words I am quoting are in the 27th section, but I think that in sound construction they must be read into the 28th; because the 28th section is to some extent of the nature of a proviso to the 27th, and does not profess to repeat in words at length all the conditions of the cases with which it deals. Now in the present case there never was any specific investment of money for the purpose of providing an entailed estate in favour of the Earls of Mansfield in their order. On the declinature of the appointed trustees it would have been open to any of the prospective heirs of entail to have the trust constituted by the appointment of new trustees or a judicial factor. Or again, the fourth Lord Mansfield might have voluntarily put the sum of £150,000 beyond his control so as to impress it with a trust for the purposes of the codicil. But neither of these things was done, and until the year 1866 the money, or its equivalent in land, remained subject to the order and disposition of Lord Mansfield. I consider therefore that there was no effective trust in the sense of the statute during the period antecedent to 1866.

On the third of the questions I have stated, I think it is perfectly clear that in so far as the value of the estate of Logiealmond exceeded the sum of £150,000 plus any profits derived from investments of that sum before the purchase, the surplus value of the entailed estate must be taken to be properly settled by the fourth Lord Mansfield. To the extent of such surplus value the entail is not an instrument in execution of any antecedent trust, and in any view of the case this value would not be acquired in fee simple by the present earl except on the basis of the consent of the next heir.

Lord Kinnear.—I agree with the Lord President. The question really is whether the petitioner holds the estate of Logiealmond under an entail executed in terms of a trust for the purchase of land to be entailed. If he does, then upon the plain terms of the 27th and 28th sections taken together, the date of the entail, under which he holds, must be the date of the deed which put the money in trust. It is beyond all question that the third earl, by his will, which came into force in 1840, did put a sum of £150,000 in trust in order that it might be applied, either in the purchase of land in Scotland to be entailed according to the law of Scotland, or else in the purchase of land in England to be entailed on the same series of people according to the law of that country; and it is beyond question that the deed upon which the present earl holds, purports in terms to be executed by the fourth earl in performance of the trust created by his father's will. If that is a true recital, then the question is plainly answered in favour of the present earl.

But then it is said that that is not a correct recital, and that in truth the estate of Logiealmond was not entailed in execution of any trust, but for some other cause, which I understand to be the mere will and pleasure of the fourth earl to settle his own estate upon a series of heirs of his own selection. There are two points taken by the respondent in support of his contention. In the first place, it is said that the trust undoubtedly created by the third earl will never come into operation. The trustees declined to act, nothing was done in execution of the trust; and the fourth earl, who made the deed of entail, was not acting in the execution of a trust, because although he was the heir and executor of the truster, no trust had been committed to him. It is quite true that the trustees declined to accept, but then it is elementary and fundamental that the failure of trustees to accept does not affect the beneficial interests of the objects of the testator's bounty. There can be no question that the failure of the trustees to take up the trust did not relieve the sole executor and heir of the truster of the obligation to account for the £150,000 to be applied in terms of the trust. If any application had been made to this Court to supply the defect of administration arising from the failure of the trustees, there would have been no difficulty in giving effect to it; and if any person entitled to benefit under the entail directed by the third earl had brought an action to compel the fourth earl to account for the £150,000, and put it into the hands of a judicial factor or trustees appointed by the Court, there could have been no good answer to such an action. Therefore I think that the fourth earl was stating his own position perfectly correctly when he said: "I have obtained this money, and being in possession of the money my father destined for the purchase of entailed estate, am bound to carry out the purpose defined in his will"; and if he had thereupon said, "I therefore put the £150,000 into a trust or into the hands of a judicial factor in order to carry out the directions of the truster," there could have been no further question. It makes no difference that, instead of paying the money to purchase land, he gave the land he had already purchased to be entailed in accordance with the directions of the trust deed. It was given as an estate of the full value of £150,000; and I think it must be held that it was a perfectly sufficient surrogatum for the money. Nobody has taken any objection to the method of satisfying the fourth Earl's obligation by the transfer of land instead of the payment of money, and I think if any objection were taken it would be too late to raise it now. We must take it as the consequence of the whole treatment of the situation by all the parties interested in it that the estate of Logiealmond is a good and sufficient surrogatum for the £150,000; and I can see no reason for disputing the assertion that it was settled in performance of the obligation to provide that sum of money for the purchase of land to be entailed. Therefore we must take the entail made by the fourth earl as truly an entail in execution of the trust created by his father.

Court of Seven Judges.

Earl of Mansfield v. Lord Scone.

Lord Kinnear.

But then, if that be so, it is said that there is a greater difficulty, because the third earl never created a trust which answers the description in the 27th section of the Entail Act at all. He did not put money in trust for the sole purpose of buying and entailing land in Scotland, but put it into the hands of trustees who had a discretion either to buy land in England and settle it according to the law of England, or to buy and entail land in Scotland; and it is said that during the whole period which might elapse between the date of the trust deed coming into force and the date when the fourth earl made his entail, there was no Scotch entailed estate which could be brought within the scope of the Entail Act of 1848.

Now I entirely agree that so long as the money remained in the hands of the trustees to be ultimately appropriated either to the purchase of land in England or to the purchase of land in Scotland, there was no Scotch entailed estate. That is quite clear. Money is not entailed estate, and nothing that was said in the House of Lords in the case of the Lord Advocate v. Stewart, 4 F. (H.L.) 11, at all suggests anything to the contrary. The Lord Chancellor, I think, puts it quite clearly that nobody can call money entailed estate except by the application of some interpretation clause in the Finance Act which the House of Lords was then considering. But apart from verbal criticism I think it clear enough, upon the authority of the Lord Advocate v. Stewart, and for my own part I should say that it was clear upon the plain construction of the statute—even if we had no authority to guide us — that so long as money remains subject to a discretion vested in trustees to buy land in Scotland or to buy land in England, it cannot be treated as if it were already converted into entailed land in Scotland so as to support a claim for immediate payment under the 27th section of the Entail Act, because such a claim would be completely defeated by a resolution of the trustees to buy land in England. So long, then, as the destination of the money is in suspense, the right given to a future heir of entail by the 27th section cannot be put in force. I think this follows from the judgment of the House of Lords in the Lord Advocate v. Stewart. But the moment the suspense is determined by the purchase of land and the execution of a deed of entail, it is ascertained at the same time that land has been purchased and entailed in the due performance of a trust. It is nothing to the purpose that an alternative course might have been followed. The trustees have none the less executed a trust by which money was put into their hands for the purchase and entail of land in Scotland. If this be so, the fact that during the interval while the final destination of the money was uncertain, the person who ultimately became heir of entail could not require immediate payment to himself, does not create the slightest difficulty, to my mind, in referring the terms of the 28th section to the terms of the 27th section for the mere purpose of ascertaining what is meant by "the deed placing such money under trust." Any difficulty which might have arisen in the construction of the 28th section itself is removed by the decision in Black v. Auld, 1 R. 133, which, I agree with the Lord President, is directly in point. It must be kept in view that the artificial date which is created by the 28th section is not the date of the performance of the particular trust. It is the date when the deed itself comes to be operative, and therefore there can be no difficulty in the application of that enactment owing to any lapse of time, or any contingency which might postpone the specific performance of the trust to buy and entail land. It is just because such purchase and entail may be indefinitely postponed that the statute creates an artificial date for determining the conditions of disentail. The date to which the statute refers is the date when the deed came into operation, and I apprehend that the deed comes into operation, when it is a testamentary deed, on the death of the testator, and that nothing which happens afterwards can alter that condition of things.

COURT OF SEVEN JUDGES.

Earl of Mansfield v. Lord Scone.

Lord Kinnear.

I cannot say that I think much difficulty arises from the phrase "the date at which the land should have been entailed in terms of the trust." I do not say that I have no difficulty in fixing the exact meaning of that phrase. But I take it to be clear that it does not refer to any date at which it can be found that the trustees ought in fact, and in the due execution of their duty, to have made a deed of entail, because that time never can by any possibility coincide with the date when the deed creating the trust comes into operation. There must always in the nature of things be an interval of time, less or more, between the coming into force of a trust deed and the time when the trustees proceed to carry out their trust; and it seems to me obvious that the contingency for which the enactment provides is not only an undue delay by trustees to perform their duty, but also any indefinite postponement contemplated by the truster himself. The general meaning of the words seems to be that we are to assume that instead of putting his land or his money in trust for the purpose of an entail, the truster should have made the entail himself. But any practical difficulty is entirely removed by the subsequent part of the clause, which really does not admit of more than one construction, and it is that the date of the trust deed coming into operation shall be held to be the date of any entail to be made hereafter in execution of the trust, whatever be the actual date of such entail. The true answer to all the criticisms which have been made upon the 28th section seems to me to be that of Lord President Inglis,—that the statute for its own purposes has imposed an artificial date upon all entails of a certain class; and it is of no consequence that this artificial date may not square with the facts which have determined the actual date of a particular deed of entail. I therefore agree with your Lordship in the chair that the petition must be granted.

Lord Low.—I concur with your Lordship in the chair and with Lord Kinnear. Your Lordships have so fully expressed my views upon the case that I do not think I could usefully add anything to what has been said.

Lord Ardwall.—I also concur in the opinion expressed by your Lordship and Lord Kinnear.

The Lord President.—Lord Stormonth-Darling concurs in my opinion, and Lord Pearson concurs in the opinion of Lord M'Laren. We will remit to the Lord Ordinary to grant the prayer of the petition.—18*th January* 1908.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1 (1)—Accident Arising Out Of and In Course of Employment—Accident Caused by Act of Fellow-Workman — Workman Attempting to Recover Working Appliance Taken Away by Fellow-Workman—Injury Caused While Workman Trying to Avoid Missile Thrown by Fellow-Workman — Circumstances Where Held (diss. Lord Stormonth-Darling) that Accident Did Not Arise Out Of and In Course of Employment — M'Intyre v. Rodger, 1903, 6 F. 176, Distinguished.

Stated Case under Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

This was an appeal by way of stated case from the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute (Mackenzie) at Kilmarnock, in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), in which James Burley, miner, Galston, claimed compensation from Messrs William Baird & Co. Ltd., coalmasters, Hurlford.

The case stated:

This is an arbitration to fix the amount of compensation payable to the pursuer, in which I found the following facts proved, namely, that the pursuer is a drawer and was employed in the defenders' Maxwood Pit, Galston, which is a mine within the meaning of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887 and the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897; that on 31st May 1907, while in the course of his employment in said pit, he sustained an injury to his eye; that two other lads named Smith and Paton, who were also drawers in said pit, were taking an empty hutch to their own working place, Smith sitting on the front of said hutch and driving the horse, while Paton was sitting on the back of the hutch; that on passing the entrance to pursuer's working place, Smith and Paton found a hutch which pursuer had brought there for his own use, and that said hutch contained a tree or wooden prop about 7 feet long; that Smith and Paton took possession of this hutch and proceeded to carry it along with them by Paton holding it with his hands while he continued to sit on the first hutch; that when they had passed through a trap door near at hand, the pursuer, returning to his place, found the hutch gone and went in pursuit of Smith and Paton to recover it; that the pursuer passed through the trap door after them, and coming up to the hutch in which there was the said wooden prop he raised the end of this prop and pushed it with some force against the front of Paton's body in order to detach the hutch in dispute from his grasp; that Paton resenting this, took up a handful of dust or rubbish and threw it at the pursuer; that in avoiding this missile the pursuer struck his head against a rough or projecting part of the side of the narrow passage in which they were and received the said injury.

On these facts I found that the said injury having been sustained by the pursuer in the course of his employment with defenders, and it having arisen out of that employment, the defenders were liable in compensation to the pursuer, and decerned against them for the sum of 15s. 11d. per week from and after 14th June 1907, said weekly payments to continue till the further orders of Court.

The Question of Law for the opinion of the Court was:—

> Whether on the facts proved the personal injury to the pursuer was caused by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment within the meaning of the said Workmen's Compensation Act 1897?

The Defenders appealed and argued: No compensation was payable where the accident was due to the wrongous act of a fellow-workman which was outside the scope of his employment (Falconer v. London and Glasgow Engineering and Iron Shipbuilding Co. Ltd., 1901, 3 F. 564; Armitage v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company [1902], 2 K.B. 178). In the present case the cause of the accident was the throwing of dust by Paton. That was an act outside the scope of Paton's employment, and therefore compensation was not due. M'Intyre v. Rodger & Co. (1903, 6 F. 176), and Challis v. London and South-Western Railway Company ([1905], 2 K.B. 154), were distinguishable. In these cases it was held that the accident arose out of a danger which was truly incidental to the employment. It could not be said in the present case that throwing dust was incidental to the employment either of Paton or of the respondent.

Argued for Respondent: The question was whether the facts did not admit of the view taken by the Sheriff, that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment (M'Intyre v. Rodger & Co., cit.). There was nothing to suggest that the hutch was taken away for a "lark," or for any other purpose than the performance of the employers' work. The end which the respondent had in view was to get back the hutch for the purpose of proceeding with his work. That being so, the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment, even if it were assumed that the means which he adopted were objectionable. Challis (cit.) was a fortiori of the present case. Falconer (cit.) and Armitage (cit.) were distinguishable, because at the time of the accident work had been abandoned, at least by the workman by whose act the injury was caused.

The Court (diss. Lord Stormonth-Darling) found that the injury to the respondent was not one arising out of his employment, recalled the award of the arbitrator, and remitted to him to dismiss the claim.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—In this case I have come to an opposite opinion from that arrived at

2nd Div.
William Baird & Co. Ltd. v. Burley.

by the Sheriff-Substitute. The facts as stated by him are that two other men in the mine where the pursuer was employed carried off a hutch which the pursuer had brought to his own working place, by one of them sitting on their rake of hutches which was in motion and holding the pursuer's hutch by hand; that on the pursuer going forward and endeavouring to get possession of his hutch by pushing a prop against the man who held it so as to detach his hold, the other man took up a handful of rubbish out of the hutch and threw it at the pursuer, who, in avoiding being struck in the face by it, brought his head against the side of the passage and was injured. He was naturally alarmed by the other man's action, fearing to receive an injury by being struck by what was thrown, which might be a hard substance.

I am unable to hold that this injury was one arising out of or in the course of the pursuer's employment. What caused the injury was not in any sense an accident, but was a fault by a wrongdoer, who was acting in a wilful and unjustifiable manner, and the injury was caused by this wrongful personal act. It was not an accident occurring in the course of work. If a person throws a stone to strike another and he is injured, the fact that both men are workmen in the place of work where the injury is done will not make the injury one for which the master must pay compensation.

I am therefore of opinion that the question in the stated case should be answered in the negative.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I have the misfortune to differ from your Lordships. There is no dispute that personal injury by accident was here caused to a workman in the course of his employment; and the Sheriff-Substitute, holding that the injury arose out of as well as in the course of his employment, has awarded him compensation in terms of the Act. The sole question is whether the Sheriff was right in holding that the accident arose out of the employment. I am of opinion that he was, and therefore I should be in favour of sustaining his award.

The injury was to the workman's eye, and it was sustained by the man striking his head against a rough or projecting part of the side of the narrow passage through which he was then passing. No doubt he sustained this injury in trying to avoid a handful of dust and rubbish which another workman in the pit had thrown at the pursuer. And the Sheriff tells us very clearly how this came about. It seems to me that one difficulty in reversing a finding which the statutory arbitrator has come to on the facts—especially when he is so sound and sensible a judge of evidence, as we know from repeated experience this arbitrator to be—is that, in a matter like this, a very little difference in the precise mode of stating the facts may make all the difference in the proper conclusion to be drawn from them. Now I take the facts as stated here to be that the lads, who were all "drawers" in the pit, were not engaged in "horseplay" or anything of the nature of a "lark" at all, but were going about their proper business in the pit, though the lads called Smith and Paton had been guilty of a bit of mischief in carrying off a hutch which belonged to the pursuer—in the sense that he was entitled to the use of it—and that Paton was certainly in the wrong in throwing the handful of dust or rubbish at the pursuer, though the act might be very far short of a criminal act, as was suggested in the course of the discussion. To that extent I am willing to take the case, as I think the Sheriff-Substitute must have taken it, on the footing that Paton, in throwing the handful of dust or rubbish, was the aggressor.

But is it the law that the moment you find that an injury, sustained by a workman dutifully engaged in doing his master's work at the time when he received the injury, was caused at some link in the chain of causation by the act of a fellow-workman, the employer is relieved of all liability under the Act? I put the question in that form because the proximate cause—the causa causans—of the injury in this case was the striking of the pursuer's head against the projecting part of the narrow passage. If there had been no projection, there would have been no injury. But I am willing to take the case on the footing that what caused the pursuer to duck his head was the throwing of the missile. Even so, is it the law, taking the decisions both in England and Scotland as a whole, that the circumstance of the injury being caused, though not immediately caused, by the act of a fellow-workman, has the effect of relieving the employer from liability? Now, I must rather demur to decisions about a necessarily different set of facts being taken as if they ruled or governed the particular set of facts which are found by the arbitrator, and on which, so far as they are facts and not law, he is final. At all events these decisions can only be so taken so far as they can be said to lay down some definite and consistent rule of law.

What, then, are the decisions which are said to have this effect? There is first the case of Falconer, 1901, 3 F. 564, as to which I must be allowed to say that it was the judgment of two judges of this Division against one, Lord Young being absent and Lord Moncreiff dissenting. In the subsequent case of M'Intyre, 1903, 6 F. 176, Lord Young, at p. 178, confessed that he would have had very great difficulty in agreeing with the judgment in the case of Falconer, and said that if he had been present he would have been disposed to concur with Lord Moncreiff. That learned judge admitted in Falconer's case that the result might have been different if the proximate cause of the accident had been something wholly outwith the employment; and his Lordship's dissent was based on the ground, for which at least there was a great deal to be said, that the injured workman was engaged at his work, while the workman who caused the injury was engaged in something wholly different—viz. horseplay.

I admit that Falconer was approved of in the English case of Armitage [1902], 2 K.B. 178, in which it was decided that a workman who was injured through the tortious act of a fellow-workman, which had no relation whatever to their employment, had no claim against his employer because the injury did not arise out of the employment. The case was one of "larking" pure and simple, because the piece of iron which was thrown by one boy at another missed that other and injured the claimant. The accident was therefore treated as a tortious act, "having no relation whatever to the employment"; these are the very words of the present Master of the Rolls. I do not think, for the reason I have given, that that could be said of the accident in the present case.

But what is to be said of the subsequent case of M'Intyre, supra cit., in this Court? I greatly doubt whether the case of Armitage would have been decided as it was if the English Court of Appeal had had the case of M'Intyre before it, which it could not have, because it was later in date than Armitage. At all events, I think we are not bound, in deference to an English decision, to disregard a judgment of our own Courts. There the injury to the workman complaining was held to be one arising out of and in the course of his employment, though it was the direct result of a forcible act—pulling a brush out of the hand of the injured workman, which drew his hand across the sharp surface of a piece of machinery which was near, and so cutting his hand. Your Lordship in the chair, who had been one of the majority of this Court in Falconer's case, distinguished that case from M'Intyre's by pointing out that the workman whose act was the immediate cause of the injury had no intention of injuring M'Intyre; and Lord Trayner, who had been the other member of the majority, drew practically the same distinction, for he said that the act, however careless it was, might still be properly described as "incidental to the employment." That was undoubtedly a "fine distinction," as was admitted by your Lordship in the chair in M'Intyre's case; and I cannot doubt that the presence of Lord Young and Lord Moncreiff had something to do with the difference in result. But if the intention of the man who caused the injury had anything to do with the effect in law, what is to be said of Armitage's case, where there was no bad intention, for the man who threw the missile hit the wrong man?

What, again, is to be said of the later English case of Challis v. London and South-Western Railway [1905], 2 K.B. 154? There, a stone wilfully dropped on a train by a boy from an overhead bridge injured the driver of the train, and it was held to be an accident arising out of as well as in the course of the employment, because it was a matter of common knowledge and experience, in the opinion of the learned judges of the Court of Appeal, that boys should throw stones at passing trains; and therefore they held it to be a risk incidental to the employment of an engine-driver, although it was a matter over which the company had no control. But it was none the less a tortious act committed by a bystander, and therefore, if the element of tort was to decide the question whether an act was, or was not, to relieve the employer from liability, I do not see why the employer in that case should have been held liable. The case of M'Intyre does not appear to have been cited in Challis's case, although the older case of Falconer was.

On the whole matter I do not think that the cases cited, when viewed as a whole, lay down any definite or consistent rule of law, and therefore I think that we should sustain the Sheriff-Substitute's decision. If there be any coherent rule of law derivable from the cases, it must be subject to so many exceptions as practically to deprive it of all value as a working rule. For it can be no more than this, that an injury may arise out of, as well as in the course of, the employment, although the act which causes the injury may be the act of a fellow-workman or of a bystander, whether malicious or not, and may have no relation to the employment, except that it is one of the risks to which the injured workman is bound to submit, as being a risk incidental to the employment in which he is engaged.

Lord Low.—I am of opinion, in the first place, that it is immaterial that the injury which Burley sustained was occasioned not by his being struck by the missile which Paton threw at him, but by his head coming in contact with some projection when he was avoiding the missile. The question, in my judgment, would have been the same if the missile had struck him and caused the injury.

The question is whether this accident was one "arising out of" the employment, because it is not disputed that it arose "in the course of" the employment.

There are two decisions in which the meaning of the words "arising out of" the employment has been construed in reference to circumstances closely approaching those of the present case. The one is Falconer v. London & Glasgow Engineering and Shipbuilding Co. Ltd., 1901, 3 F. 564, which was decided in this Division, and the other is Armitage v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company [1902], 2 K.B. 178, which was decided in the Court of Appeal in England.

With the exception, perhaps, of Lord Moncreiff,

2nd Div.
William Baird & Co. Ltd. v. Burley.
Lord Low.

the learned judges in both of these cases took substantially the same view of the meaning and effect of the words "arising out of the employment," and I think that the result may be accurately stated thus: If an accident occurs by reason of a danger which is incidental to the employment, the workman will be entitled to compensation; but he will not be entitled to compensation if the accident is caused by something done by a fellow-workman outside the scope of the employment.

Now, for a workman to throw something at another is not a danger which is incidental to employment in a coal-mine, and it is certainly an act which is entirely outside of the scope of the employment. I am accordingly of opinion that the question of law should be answered in the negative.

Lord Ardwall.—The accident which gives rise to this case was a very regrettable one, but the question which the Court has to decide is whether, in the words of sect. 1 (1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, the accident was one "arising out of and in the course of the employment" in which the workman was engaged. There is no question that it arose in the course of his employment, but the difficulty is with regard to the additional condition, which must be established in order to entitle him to compensation against his employers, namely, that it arose out of his employment.

I am of opinion that it did not, for the reason that it arose directly from the boy Paton throwing a handful of dust or rubbish at the pursuer, in avoiding which the pursuer suffered the injury complained of. It was certainly no part of Paton's employment to throw a missile at any of his fellow-workmen, nor was his doing so a risk incidental to the pursuer's employment which the employers might be supposed to have undertaken the chance of when they employed him. On the contrary, the throwing of the missile in question was a gratuitous piece of mischievous folly on the part of the boy Paton, and I cannot hold that it was such a piece of folly as is common among boys employed in mines.

I may add that, in my opinion, the present question is covered by decided cases, for I am unable to distinguish it, so far as principle is concerned, from the cases of Falconer, 1901, 3 F. 564, and Armitage [1902], 2 K.B. 178. The latter case was very similar to the present, for there a boy named Smith pushed another boy named Harrop into a pit, and Harrop, becoming angry, picked up a piece of iron and threw it at Smith. It missed Smith and hit Armitage on the eye, causing him considerable injuries, and there it was held that Armitage had no claim against the employers.

In the case of Challis [1905], 2 K.B. 154, where an engine-driver was injured by being struck by the glass of the screen of the engine which had been broken by a stone wilfully dropped on a train by a boy from a bridge, the employers were held liable, on the ground that the risk of mischievous boys discharging missiles from bridges was a risk incidental to the employment of an engine-driver, and that the accident accordingly arose out of the employment; but I do not think that that case can be held to apply to the present, because, as I have already said, the throwing of missiles by boys or others in mines at miners is not, according to common experience, a risk incidental to a miner's employment.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the accident arose, not out of the employment in which the pursuer was engaged, but out of the mischievous and illegal act on the part of the boy Paton, and that accordingly the only remedy he can have is against the wrongdoer, and not against his employers.—7th February 1908.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling, Low and Ardwall.)

328. Lochee Sawmill Company Limited and Liquidator v. Stevenson & Johnston.

Company—Liquidation—Law Agent's Lien—Titles of Company's Heritage Produced by Agents Without Prejudice to Lien—Law Agents also Agents for Heritable Creditors and Trustees for Debenture-holders — Subjects Sold by Liquidator With Consent of Heritable Creditors—Price Realised Insufficient to Meet Bonds—Circumstances Where Held Agents Had No Effective Right of Lien and Not Entitled to Preferable Ranking.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

On 9th November 1906 a resolution was passed to wind up the Lochee Sawmills Co. Ltd., Lochee. On 6th December 1906 a supervision order was pronounced, and the liquidation proceedings were remitted to Lord Johnston.

Messrs Stevenson & Johnston, solicitors, Dundee, had acted as law agents to the Company from November 1904 to November 1906. They held the titles of certain heritable properties belonging to the Company, over which they claimed a lien for the amount of their business account.

By interlocutor dated 18th January 1907 the Lord Ordinary ordained John Laurence Stevenson and Peter Reid Johnston, the partners of the firm of Stevenson & Johnston (the claimants) to produce the title-deeds of the heritable subjects which belonged to the Company, "in terms of sect. 115 of the Companies Act 1862, without prejudice to any lien which the claimants or their said firm might have over the said title-deeds as provided by said section."

On 28th February 1907 Stevenson & Johnston lodged a claim in the liquidation for a preferable ranking for the sum of £216, 13s. 9d., the amount of their business account. The liquidator pronounced a deliverance whereby he disallowed certain items in the account, and allowed an ordinary ranking for the sum of £144, 16s. 8d. (subject to taxation).

The liquidator presented a note to the Lord Ordinary for, inter alia, approval of this deliverance. Stevenson & Johnston lodged answers.

It appeared that the heritable subjects in question were burdened (1) by a bond and disposition in security for £750 in favour of Stevenson & Johnston, and (2) by a bond and disposition in security in favour of a Mr Alfred Stevenson, for whom Stevenson & Johnston acted as agents. These bonds were guaranteed to the lenders by the General Accident Assurance Corporation Limited. Subsequently the General Accident Assurance Corporation repaid the sums in the bond to the bondholders, and took from them an assignation to the bonds.

The Lochee Sawmills Co. Ltd. had also issued debentures to the amount of £1130. By a relative disposition the Company disponed, inter alia, the heritable subjects in question to Mr J. L. Stevenson, Mr Johnston, and another as trustees for the debenture-holders. At a meeting held on 28th January 1907 the debenture-holders resolved that they were satisfied to leave their interests in the liquidation in the hands of the liquidator and to concur with him in bringing the heritable subjects to sale.

The subjects in question having been damaged by fire, the liquidator recovered from a fire insurance company the sum of £465, which he paid to the General Accident Assurance Corporation as being in right of the bonds. The sum due under the bonds was thus reduced to £1085.

On 19th February 1907 the subjects were exposed to sale by the liquidator at the upset price of £1250. On 3rd May 1907 they were re-exposed by the liquidator, with consent of the General Accident Assurance Corporation, at the upset price of £950. Ultimately the subjects were sold on 14th June 1907 for the sum of £902. This sum, less expenses, the liquidator paid to the General Accident Assurance Corporation. The Assurance Corporation recovered the sums in the bonds so far as not recovered from the proceeds of the security subjects from co-obligants (who claimed in the liquidation in respect of their loss).

On 20th November 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor whereby he, inter alia, found that in the circumstances in which the heritable property was realised there was no lien available to Stevenson & Johnston over the titles to the Company's heritage; and before dealing further with the claim remitted to the Auditor to tax Messrs Stevenson & Johnston's accounts, and to report.

He issued the following note.

Lord Johnston.—The liquidator has received and adjudicated upon claims in the liquidation to the number of forty-five, and his deliverance is No. 67 of process. Of these only two, viz. the adjudications on claims No. 36 and No. 37 in No. 67 of process, are objected to, and fall to be considered by me.

In regard to claim No. 36, apart from questions of taxation, there arises a question of agents' lien, which it is requisite that I should at once dispose of. The claimants Stevenson & Johnston, solicitors, Dundee, claim a preference for business accounts amounting to £216, 13s. 9d., in respect that the benefit of a lien, which they allege they had over the titles to the heritage of the Company in liquidation, was reserved to them, when they were ordered to hand over the titles to the liquidator.

The circumstances were these: Messrs Stevenson & Johnston were, for some time prior to the liquidation, the law agents of the Company, and at the date of the liquidation they were in possession of the title-deeds. While they were agents and in possession of the title-deeds, the firm made an advance to the Company of £750, in security of which the Company granted to Mr Stevenson and Mr Johnston, as trustees for the firm, a heritable security over their heritage, containing an assignation to the writs in the ordinary short statutory form, but I understand without an inventory. At the same time Mr Alfred Stevenson, a gentleman not connected with the firm, made another advance to the Company of £800, and also obtained security over the Company's heritage with the same assignation of writs. Messrs Stevenson & Johnston were, of course, in the position of agents for the lenders in relation to their own advance, and they were likewise agents for Mr Alfred Stevenson. Although the writs were assigned, there was no change in their custody. Early in the liquidation a note, No. 12 of process, was presented to me, craving that I should ordain Mr Stevenson and Mr Johnston and Mr Alfred Stevenson, or such of them as might have the custody of the title-deeds of the Company's heritage, to produce and exhibit the same to the liquidator in order that he might allow them to be examined by intending purchasers of the heritage, and in order that he might be in a position to meet a threatened claim by the over-superior. The parties appeared before me, and it was very soon seen, as stated in the note to my interlocutor of 18th January last, "that if the property of the Company in liquidation is not to be sacrificed, the parties concerned must meet one another with more reason than they have hitherto shewn," and accordingly I ordained Mr Stevenson and Mr Johnston and Mr Alfred Stevenson, or such of them as might have the custody of the title-deeds, not exactly in the terms of the prayer to the liquidator's note, but in terms which the discussion before me shewed were necessary in the interest of all concerned, "forthwith to produce the same in terms of sect. 115 of The Companies Act 1862, without prejudice to any lien which the said John Laurence Stevenson, or Peter Reid Johnston, or their firm of Stevenson & Johnston, may have over the said title-deeds, as provided by said section." And they have been produced accordingly.

2nd Div.

Lochee Sawmill Co. Ltd. and Liquidator v. Stevenson & Johnston.

Now there are two other circumstances which require to be noticed. The two bonds for £750 and £800 respectively were guaranteed by the General Accident Insurance Corporation Limited, and as it was perfectly clear that there was to be a deficiency in the heritable security, that Corporation paid up the sums contained in the bonds to the bondholders, and took from them assignations thereof, covering, of course, the right of the bondholders to delivery of the writs. It was also the case that the Company's heritage, subject to the bonds in question, was conveyed to Mr Stevenson and Mr Johnston as trustees for a debenture issue by the Company.

Now the liquidator could do nothing in the way of selling the heritage except under burden of the bonds, unless by arrangement with the bondholders—that is, he could only sell the Company's reversion. Had there been any reversion to realise, and had the liquidator realised it, there can be no doubt that as against him Messrs Stevenson & Johnston's lien would have been good, and that in respect of the condition under which the titles were handed over, he must have given Messrs Stevenson & Johnston a preference in lieu of their lien, not only over the proceeds of the reversion, but over the general assets in liquidation (Skinner v. Henderson, 1865, 3 Macph. 867). But there was no reversion to realise, and the liquidator could do nothing without the consent of the bondholders. The original bondholders having no longer any interest, but having transferred their interest to the Assurance Corporation, the liquidator, with consent and concurrence of the Corporation as assignees, and also of the debenture-holders of the Company, whom I caused to be consulted independently of their trustees Messrs Stevenson & Johnston, who had a hostile interest, has now realised the heritage and applied the net proceeds in payment pro tanto of the sums due to the Insurance Corporation as assignees of the original bondholders. There proved on realisation to be a considerable deficiency even to pay the Insurance Corporation. They have a considerable claim, as ordinary creditors in the liquidation, for balance due to them. And, of course, there was nothing from the proceeds of the heritage for the debenture-holders and a fortiori for the general creditors.

Now, in effecting the sale the liquidator was acting, it appears to me, by reasonable arrangement, primarily as agent for the secured creditors, though in his capacity as liquidator, and Messrs Stevenson & Johnston's lien must be considered as in a question with the secured creditors, and not as in a question with the Company, who were the debtors. From the moment the bonds were granted Messrs Stevenson & Johnston were holding the titles both as agents for the Company, the debtors, and as agents for the bondholders, their creditors, in respect that they were agents for both borrower and lender. They might plead their lien to effect against their clients the borrowers, but they could not plead their lien to effect against their clients the creditors (Drummond v. Muirhead & Guthrie Smith, 1900, 2 F. 585). The fact of their double agency, which is not affected by the further fact of their personal interest as one of the lenders, makes an exception from the ordinary rule. If this exception holds, it is impossible that they should be heard to set up their lien against their own assignees and the assignees of their clients. In the circumstances of the actual realisation, therefore, Messrs Stevenson & Johnston had, in my opinion, no effectual lien to reserve, and I am unable to listen to the contention that the mere fact of reserving a law agent's lien under the 115th section of The Companies Acts 1862, ipso facto, gives the law agent a preference over the general assets of the Company, irrespective of such circumstances as I have narrated. I shall therefore sustain the liquidator's deliverance on Claim No. 36, so far as the principle of his determination is concerned. But before I can deal with his deliverance in detail there must be an audit of the various business accounts involved.

The Respondents reclaimed and argued: (1) The titles having been delivered without prejudice to the respondent's lien, and having been used by the liquidator in effecting a sale, it followed that the respondents were entitled to a preference (Renny & Webster v. Myles & Murray, 1847, 9 D. 619; Jas. Donaldson & Co. Ltd. v. Thos. White & Park, 1907, 15 S.L.T. 578). No doubt an agent could not plead his lien against bondholders who were his own clients (Drummond v. Muirhead & Guthrie Smith, 1900, 2 F. 585), but here the bondholders had been fully paid. The debenture-holders had no interest to oppose the present claim, because they could get nothing out of the subjects until the bondholders were paid, and the bondholders here had carried off the whole proceeds. Further, neither the bondholders nor the debenture-holders appeared to oppose the present claim, and in their absence the liquidator could not plead their rights. (2) The agent's lien was a right to retain the titles until his account was paid (Bell, Prin., sects. 1438, 1441; Ferguson & Stuart v. Grant, 1856, 18 D. 536). The preference therefore extended over the whole assets of the Company and was not limited to the subjects contained in the titles (Paul v. Mathie, 1826, 4 S. 420, N.E. 424; Skinner v. Henderson, 1865, 3 M. 867).

Argued for Petitioner: (1) The respondents were admittedly not entitled to plead their lien against the bondholders or the debenture-holders, who were their own clients. Now the liquidator represented the whole creditors, secured and unsecured, in accordance with their rights and preferences. In selling the subjects he was acting on behalf of the bondholders and on their instructions—the sale was a proceeding in which the unsecured creditors had no interest, because it was plain that there could be no reversion. Further, if the respondents' present claim were upheld it would carry off the greater part of the Company's assets and would thus prejudice the debenture-holders. In these circumstances there was no effective lien at the time the documents were produced, and the fact that they had been produced without prejudice to a lien would not create a lien (Bell, Prin., sect. 1441; Goudy on Bankruptcy, p. 600; Gloag and Irvine on Rights in Security, p. 392; Skinner v. Henderson, cit.). If there was no lien there could be no preference. Renny & Webster v. Myles & Murray (cit.) was distinguishable. (2) In any view, if the respondents had a preference it was limited to the subjects included in the titles.

The Court adhered.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by Lord Ardwall.—On 18th January 1907 the Lord Ordinary in this liquidation required the reclaimers Stevenson & Johnston, who are a firm of solicitors in Dundee, to produce the title-deeds of the heritable subjects which belonged to the Company, in terms of the 115th section of the Companies Acts 1862, "without prejudice to any lien which the claimants or their said firm might have over the said title-deeds, as provided by the said section," and the question raised by this reclaiming note is whether, in respect of the said lien so reserved, the reclaimers are entitled to a preferable ranking in the liquidation. The Lord Ordinary has held that they are not, and I agree with him in that opinion.

The mere reservation of a law agent's lien under the section above quoted does not give them a preference over the general assets of the Company unless it can be shewn that, had the titles not been ordered to be delivered up by the Lord Ordinary, they would have had an effectual lien over them for their account.

Now, as pointed out by the Lord Ordinary in his opinion, which clearly and carefully recapitulates the whole circumstances of the case, Messrs Stevenson & Johnston held these titles, not only as agents for the Company, but also as agents for certain bondholders who had granted loans over the security of the subjects to which the titles refer. There were two bonds for £750 and £800 respectively, and these were guaranteed by the General Accident Assurance Corporation Ltd., and when it became perfectly clear that there was to be a deficiency in the heritable security, that Corporation paid up the sums contained in the bonds, and took assignations from the bondholders some time after the date of the liquidation. In addition to these bonds the Company had issued certain debentures, and in security of these the said subjects had been conveyed to trustees, of course under burden of the bonds. It appears that Messrs Stevenson & Johnston also acted as trustees for these bondholders, so here again they were holding the titles for postponed heritable creditors. Now, as pointed out by the Lord Ordinary, it is settled by the case of Drummond v. Muirhead & Guthrie Smith, 1900, 2 F. 585, that Stevenson & Johnston, though they might plead their lien with effect against their clients the borrowers, could not plead their lien with effect against their clients the lenders. Accordingly, either the bondholders or debenture-holders could have insisted on delivery of the titles at the date of the liquidation for the purpose of realising their security, and indeed the bondholders had taken steps towards such realisation by serving a schedule of intimation, requisition, and protest upon the liquidator on the 6th of February 1907. It was evident, therefore, that it was in the interest of all parties, both in the way of saving expense and otherwise, that the liquidator should be entrusted by the heritable creditors and bondholders with the realisation of these properties. With regard to the debenture-holders, they put all their rights and interests in the hands of the liquidator at a meeting held on 28th January 1907, and the subjects were exposed by the liquidator with the consent and concurrence of the said Corporation as heritable creditors, as appears from the Minutes of Exposure, No. 109 of process. But in so exposing them he was acting, not for the general body of creditors in the liquidation, but for these secured creditors, it being absolutely clear that there would be no reversion after satisfying their claims, so that the fact that the liquidator did make use of the titles in selling the properties does not in any way strengthen the reclaimers' case; and the suggestion that the properties were originally exposed at a price which would have left a reversion really does not matter, and, as I understand, is contradicted by the information which has been supplied to us since the discussion, and which shews that in addition to bonds the subjects were burdened with the debt due to the debenture-holders, amounting in all to apparently £1500.

Applying the principle of the case already quoted, it would appear that after the secured creditors were satisfied there was nothing against which the reclaimers' lien over the titles could be made effectual, as after the heritable creditors were satisfied neither the liquidator nor the shareholders nor the ordinary creditors of the Company had any interest whatever in the titles, nor could they have made any use of them. The right of lien as existing in Messrs Stevenson & Johnston would have therefore become of no effective value whatever; for a law agent's lien confers no active right, but merely entitles him to retain the papers until either his account shall be paid or a preferable ranking given him in case of bankruptcy or liquidation (Bell's Prin., 1441).

And supposing there had never been an order pronounced ordaining the law agents to deliver up the titles, they must have delivered them up to the bondholders and debenture-holders to enable them to effectuate a sale of the properties, and after that, as the titles were of no value whatever either to the liquidator or those interested in the remaining assets of the Company as creditors or shareholders, the liquidator would have left them alone and would never have come under an obligation to give Stevenson & Johnston a preferable ranking in return for the delivery of them. The lien would accordingly have been valueless, and it cannot now be treated as ever having been anything else. I am therefore of opinion that the reclaiming note should be refused, with expenses since the date of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.—8th February 1908.

329. The "Seaspray" Steamship Company Limited v. Tenant and Another.

I. REPARATION — RELEVANCY — COMPANY — MALICIOUS APPLICATION BY SHAREHOLDERS FOR COMPULSORY WINDING UP —ISSUE—MALICE AND WANT OF PROBABLE CAUSE — RELEVANCY — CIRCUMSTANCES WHERE HELD THAT MALICE SUFFICIENTLY AVERRED.

II. SLANDER—JUDICIAL SLANDER— STATEMENT IN PETITION FOR WINDING UP THAT COMPANY INSOLVENT — MALICE — RELEVANCY—FORM OF ISSUE.

In this action the pursuers sued James Tenant and Joseph Reid for £500 damages for having falsely, maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause presented a petition to have the pursuers' Company wound up under the Companies Acts; and for having in the said petition maliciously and without probable cause made false and slanderous statements of and concerning the pursuers.

The defenders were shareholders in the said Company.

The facts, as narrated by the Lord Ordinary in his Opinion, were as follows:—

"On 3rd May 1907 the defenders presented a petition to the Second Division of the Court of Session to have the pursuers' Company wound up by the Court under the provisions of the Companies Acts 1862 to 1900. The petition set forth some alleged irregularities on the part of the manager and secretary in vouching the account of the Company; and narrated its unsuccessful trading during the previous two years —which had resulted in a debit balance of £642, 7s. 4d. It averred that credit had been taken in the accounts for an alleged loan of £1200 to the 'Isobel' S.S. Co. Ltd. for which there was no voucher, and for two other loans of £800 each to the 'Gadeby' S.S. Co. Ltd. and the 'Robin' S.S. Co. Ltd., with regard to which it was said that they were believed to be of no value, as the finances of the two last-mentioned Companies were in a very unsatisfactory condition. The petition proceeded as follows: 'The Company, in this view, is accordingly insolvent and unable to pay its debts, or continue to carry on business.' Some further allegations were made as to the management of the Company, and the refusal of the manager to carry out a resolution passed by the shareholders to divide the reserve fund. Sect. 79 of the Companies Act of 1862 was then quoted in part, and the petitioners summed up their averments as follows: 'The said Company is unable to pay its debts; and, further, in the circumstances above narrated, it is just and equitable that the Company should be wound up.'

"No previous notice of this petition was received by the pursuers or their manager, and they did not know of its existence until its presentation had been publicly advertised. Answers were lodged by the pursuers, and the case was heard on 25th May 1907, when the Court, without calling on counsel for the Company, unanimously dismissed the petition."

The pursuers made the following further averments:—

COND. 4. Prior to the presentation of said petition, the defenders personally and through their law agents, Messrs G. H. Robb & Crosbie, writers, Glasgow, and also through Mr John Mann, junior, C.A., made repeated efforts to induce the pursuers or their said manager to purchase their shares. At first they tried to get a price above par, but, meeting with no success, they made the final proposal which is contained in a letter dated 15th February 1907 from Messrs Robb & Crosbie to Mr John E. Wilson, writer, Glasgow, who is the pursuers' law agent. The said letter contains the following passage. "Our clients, however, do not wish to stand on ceremony, and as a last attempt they have authorised us to say that they will accept 20s. per £1 on their shares, exclusive of course of the dividend and together with £10 10s. of expenses to Messrs Mann & Son and a like fee to ourselves." This proposal was rejected by the pursuers in terms of Mr Wilson's letters of 16th February and 4th March 1907.

COND. 5. At an adjourned general meeting of shareholders of the said Company held on 26th March 1907, the defenders, during the said manager's absence from the room, caused to be entered into the Minute-Book what purported to be a resolution proposed by the said John Mann, who represented the said Joseph Reid by proxy, and seconded by the said James Tenant, "that the reports and accounts be not accepted or adopted, and that the manager and secretary be instructed forthwith to divide the Reserve Fund amongst the shareholders." The said resolution was invalid because no notice had been given of it as required by the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the said Company, and was immediately repudiated by the said manager in a letter to Mr Mann of the same date.

COND. 6. It was upon the failure of the schemes condescended on in Articles 4 and 5 that the defenders resorted to the expedient of presenting said petition for the winding up of the said Company. They did so, it is believed, for the purpose of forcing the pursuers to purchase their said shares. In order to bring greater pressure to bear upon the pursuers or their manager to purchase the shares, they recklessly, and in the knowledge of the falsity of their statements, alleged that the pursuers' Company was insolvent and unable to pay its debts. In point of fact the pursuers' Company, as the defenders knew, was in a flourishing condition. It had since 1895 paid by way of dividend £107 per cent. on the capital of the shareholders; for the year 1906 it had earned 9 per cent., and no creditor was making any demand upon the Company for payment. These facts were all known to the defenders.

Cond. 7 contained averments of special damages suffered by the Company through the proceedings of the defenders.

Each of the defenders lodged defences, and they both pleaded that the action was irrelevant. The Lord Ordinary repelled the plea as to relevancy, and ordered issues.

The following issues were subsequently approved of for the trial of the cause.

1. Whether on or about the 3rd day of May 1907, the defenders maliciously and without probable cause presented to the Second Division of this Court a petition for the judicial liquidation of the pursuers, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?

2. Whether the statements contained in the schedule hereto appended are of and concerning the pursuers, and falsely, calumniously, and maliciously state that the pursuers are insolvent and unable to pay their debts, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?

Damages laid at £500.

The schedule annexed consisted of a copy of the said petition.

Lord Salvesen [after narrating the facts as quoted above].—The present action has been brought to recover damages from the defenders in respect of their presenting this petition, and for the slanderous statements which it contained. Cond. 7 contains an averment of special damage caused to the pursuers through their credit having been impaired by the presentation of the petition.

The defenders plead that the action is irrelevant, and founding on the case of Aitchison & Co. Ltd., 1903, 10 S.L.T. 501, they start with the proposition "that a petition for judicial winding up of a company is an action or judicial proceeding; and the general rule is that an action of damages on the ground that judicial proceedings have been instituted will not be relevant unless malice and want of probable cause are alleged." This proposition is so stated in Lord Low's opinion, with which I entirely agree. They next maintain that the present action contains no relevant averments of malice and want of probable cause against the defenders.

In my opinion there is sufficient material upon record from which the inference may be drawn that the petition was not merely presented without probable cause, but maliciously in the sense that the defendants were actuated, "not by a desire to benefit the shareholders, but by an indirect motive" (see Quartz Hill Consolidated Co., 1883, 11 Q.B.D. 674, per Brett, M.R., 687), namely, to concuss the pursuers into purchasing their shares. The negotiations which are narrated in Cond. 4 constitute prima facie evidence of both statements. It is hard to believe that shareholders who thought that the Company was insolvent should demand a price above par as the value of their holding in it; yet this, it is admitted, the defenders did only two or three months before the petition was presented. How in the face of such a demand, and in view of what is stated on record by the pursuers, the defenders can say that they had reasonable cause to believe that the Company was unable to pay its debts is difficult to understand; but it is not difficult to see how the presentation of the petition for winding up might be considered a means of compelling the pursuers to buy up their shares. The defenders now say that they really never meant that the Company was insolvent in the sense of not being able to pay its creditors; and the qualified statement of insolvency which I have already quoted from the petition might conceivably bear this interpretation. If that, however, was what they really meant, I think they had no justification for averring that the Company was unable to pay its debts, or demanding that the Company should be wound up on that ground. On the question of malice—apart from the indirect motive to which I have already referred—I think the averment made by the pursuers, that the defenders were well aware of the falsity of their statements as to the Company's insolvency when they presented the petition, is a sufficient allegation of their having acted maliciously. I am accordingly prepared at this stage to repel the first plea in law maintained by each of the defenders; and as both parties desire that the case should go before a jury, I shall appoint the pursuers to lodge the issue or issues which they propose for the trial of the cause.—1*st February* 1908.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Johnston.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the previous report.

On 4th December 1907 the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor whereby he, inter alia, reduced the ranking of the claimants Thomas Hudson Beare and others to the sum of £1000, and directed a deduction of £15, 15s. to be made from the fee to be allowed to the liquidator.

The claimants Thomas Hudson Beare and others reclaimed and argued: The claimants being directors of R. D. Simpson Ltd., were personally liable along with the Company to Van Berkel in damages and in the costs of the action Van Berkel v. R. D. Simpson Ltd., 1907, S.C. 165 (Frost's Patent Law and Practice, 1907, ed. Vol. I. p. 389). They had settled with Van Berkel by paying £1000 in return for an assignation of Van Berkel's claim (amounting to £4200) against the Company. They were therefore entitled to be ranked for £4200, and the liquidator could not resist a claim for £2000. No doubt while the Company was a going concern the directors were trustees of their powers for the Company, and might have been forced to communicate to the Company the benefit of their transaction with Van Berkel. But as soon as the Company went into liquidation the directors' powers, and of consequence their duties as trustees, came to an end (Companies Act 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. cap. 89, sect. 133 (5) and sects. 138 and 89). But even if they were still trustees the Company could force them to communicate, only on condition of keeping their trustees indemnis and of paying the £1000 which the claimants had paid to Van Berkel. In that view the claimants would be entitled to a preference for £1000, which would be much more advantageous than the ranking allowed by the liquidator. There was no collusion between the claimants and the liquidator, and no attempt had been made to conceal the facts from the Court. The Lord Ordinary's strictures were unwarranted. Counsel also referred to Companies Act 1862, sect. 158; Buckley on the Companies Acts (8th edition), p. 403; Imperial Land Company of Marseilles, 1877, L.R. 4 Ch. D. 566).

Argued for the Liquidator: It was not sound to say that this was a compromise. The liquidator had gone into the whole matter long before, and had satisfied himself that £2000 was the sum for which a ranking should be given. There was no concealment. The liquidator's motion was that the whole matter should be sent to an accountant for examination. The procedure adopted was the ordinary procedure in such cases. There was no ground for the allegations made by the Lord Ordinary or for making a deduction from the liquidator's fee.

The Court adhered to the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, except in regard to the deduction of £15, 15s. from the fee to be allowed to the liquidator, which finding was recalled; found the liquidator not entitled to charge his expenses in the reclaiming note against the estate in the liquidation, and the reclaimers not entitled to expenses in the cause since 4th December 1907.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—It is always a rather delicate matter for a court of review to interfere with the discretion exercised by a judge in the Outer House who has been charged with the supervision of the liquidation of a company. Not only is he more intimately acquainted with the details of the liquidation than any other judge can be, but his knowledge is derived from recurring experience of both the persons and the questions connected with it. I have come to the conclusion that in the particular question raised by this reclaiming note the Lord Ordinary has come to a right conclusion, although I cannot help wishing that his Lordship had remembered how heavily a judicial hand may fall on professional men when he has occasion to animadvert on their conduct.

The Lord Ordinary has correctly resumed the circumstances out of which the question has arisen. The Company in liquidation was practically brought down by an action of interdict at the instance of a foreign patentee and the Dutch company which worked his patent. On the successful result of the interdict by the foreigners, there arose a claim of damages for infringement in addition to the claim for costs under the suspension. Negotiations were entered into between the Company and the foreign litigants, and these had proceeded a certain length, but had not been finally adjusted when the Company found itself obliged, in March 1907, to go into voluntary liquidation, and Mr C. J. Munro, C.A., was appointed liquidator. On 19th March the liquidation was placed under Lord Johnston's supervision. Shortly after the date of liquidation the foreign complainers intimated to the directors of the Company that they held them personally liable for the expenses incurred in the interdict action, and also for the damage sustained by them through the infringement of their patent. This action was served on the directors as individuals on 17th April 1907, concluding for £4250, made up of £1250 for infringement of patent, and £3000 for costs said to have been incurred in the previous suit. Before the action was raised, and while it was still possible that the foreign patentees might sue the Company, a meeting of the general body of creditors was held in the liquidator's chambers, at which a state of the Company's affairs was submitted by the liquidator, estimating the Company's liability under an action by Van Berkel at the sum of £2000. When the action against the directors was actually launched, the individual directors, or at least those of them who are reclaimers in the present proceedings, being advised that they were personally liable, resumed negotiations with the foreign complainer, and finally on 30th July 1907 they settled the action in full by payment of £1000, taking in exchange for the money an assignation in their favour as individuals of all claims of damage and rights of action competent to the payees against the Company. It is upon this assignation, and this alone, that the claim of the individual directors against the Company in liquidation rests. The liquidator in his answers to Mr Scott Tait's report (App. A, p. 12) admits that he was "threatened with an action at the instance of the assignees, but negotiations took place between the assignees and the liquidator for the adjustment of the said claim."

It is here that Mr Tait's chief objection to the liquidator's action comes in. He states his opinion (App. A, p. 9), that "before the liquidator came to any bargain whatever with the claimants in respect of the amount of the claim for which they considered they were entitled to receive a ranking, he ought to have submitted the matter to the Court for sanction." With regard to Mr Tait's action in this matter I should like to express my entire concurrence with the commendation which the Lord Ordinary has bestowed on it, all the more that, as it happens, I myself was the Lord Ordinary on the Bills who made the remit to Mr Tait to examine the liquidator's accounts (I did so because I had confidence in Mr Tait's care and thoroughness), and it might quite well have escaped the attention of a less careful reporter that such comment was necessary in the interests of the liquidation. The Lord Ordinary is of the same opinion, and there, I think, his Lordship is unquestionably right. If the assignees were to receive anything more than a dividend on the £1000 which they had actually paid, there were only two ways of doing it. The transaction must have taken the form either of a preferable ranking for £1000, or of a compromise of the debt of £1000. The latter is the view which the liquidator takes of the matter in his answers (App. A, 14), where he says that "the compromise with the directors as assignees foresaid is conditional upon the Court's sanction being obtained thereto." In either case the attention of the supervising judge ought to have been pointedly called to the transaction, and most liquidators, for their own protection, would have taken care that a bargain should not be concluded with directors in the character of assignees without obtaining such permission and approval. It is certainly remarkable that not a hint was given by the liquidator either in the note presented to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills of 11th September 1907, or afterwards to the supervising judge, that any such sanction was necessary or would be asked for. I do not wonder, therefore, that the Lord Ordinary was seriously dissatisfied with this omission, although I do not share his Lordship's suspicions of the liquidator's motive in so acting, because it is to be observed that throughout the liquidation both the directors and the liquidator had every reason to suppose that the general body of creditors, who had the only adverse interest (for this was from the beginning what is called a creditors' liquidation) were quite satisfied. Even when the Lord Ordinary on 19th November last drew their attention pointedly to the whole matter (including Mr Tait's report) by ordering a circular letter to be sent to each of them, and appointing all parties interested to be heard, no appearance was made by anybody. I suppose the creditors' view was that the directors had lost enough through the ruin of the Company, and probably also they thought that the directors were not much to blame, so far as infringement went. In short, although I do not think that, strictly speaking, the liquidator was justified in acting as he did, yet I do think that both he and the directors may have supposed that in settling their own debt they were truly settling the debt of the Company, and were entitled to something more than an ordinary ranking, especially as the general body of creditors were not complaining, but were still apparently of the same mind as they had been in (under somewhat different circumstances) at the meeting of the creditors on 4th April 1907, when they passed an item of £2000 as an estimate of the Company's liability under the threatened action by the foreign patentees.

The Lord Ordinary at pages 4 and 5 of his opinion indicates a doubt as to whether the directors were personally liable at all, having acted honestly, carefully, and to the best of their judgment. Unfortunately I cannot find much support for this suggested legal doubt in the English cases on the subject. In Betts v. De Vitre (1868), 3 Ch. App. 430, it was held by Lord Chelmsford, sitting in the Lord Chancellor's Court, that in order to free directors of a company from personal liability, it was not enough to shew that acts had been done by servants of the company contrary to orders; the directors must see that their orders were obeyed; and the directors were personally ordered by the Lord Chancellor to pay the costs of an action of infringement which had been brought against the company itself. There cannot, therefore, be much doubt, I think, that the foreign patentees were entitled to proceed against the directors personally. At all events, they did so proceed, and the directors came to an arrangement with them in their individual capacity. The Lord Ordinary is satisfied that the directors are entitled to relief, and the only question is whether they can claim from the Company, now that it is insolvent, more than a dividend on what they actually paid. Now, the liquidator has admitted them to an ordinary ranking on £2000, apparently on the view that this sum would yield a dividend of something less than the sum they have actually paid, although more than if he had ranked them for that exact sum. We are not told what the actual calculation was, but, even apart from all questions as to the necessity of getting the approval of the supervising judge, I am of opinion that a liquidator is not entitled to enter with a creditor into any calculation as to what dividend an ordinary ranking will produce, and to concert with him the amount for which he is to be ranked accordingly. His duty is to treat a creditor who has a claim against the Company founded on assignation as a person to be dealt with at arm's length, because the ranking of his claim will proportionately diminish the dividend payable to each of the other creditors, and the primary duty of a liquidator is to distribute the property of the Company in satisfaction of its liabilities pari passu (see sect. 133 (1)). If, therefore, a creditor is only entitled to an ordinary ranking—and that was the legal position of the directors here—he must be content with the dividend which that ordinary ranking will afford.

I agree with Lord Ardwall that the disallowance of the liquidator's expenses of this reclaiming note as a charge against the funds of the liquidation will be sufficient reparation for any error which the liquidator has committed in the conduct of this liquidation, and that we should therefore recal that portion of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor in which he practically imposes a fine upon the liquidator by directing a deduction of £15, 15s. from the fee to be afterwards allowed to him.

Lord Low.—This does not seem to me to be purely a case of a proposed compromise of the claim of a creditor in a liquidation. If it were, I apprehend that the Court could only determine whether the compromise was or was not one which ought to be sanctioned, and could not say that the creditor must be content to be ranked for a smaller sum than that for which he was willing to compromise his claim.

It is, however, clear from the liquidator's answers to Mr Tait's report, that he regarded the negotiations which took place between him and the directors before the latter lodged a claim in the liquidation as being negotiations for a compromise (as no doubt in a sense they were) which actually resulted in a compromise, the directors agreeing to limit their claim in the liquidation to £2000, the amount at which the liquidator had previously estimated the liability of R. D. Simpson Ltd. to Van Berkel & Co. In these circumstances the liquidator might certainly, upon his own shewing, have submitted the matter to the supervising judge, and no very satisfactory explanation of his failure to do so has been given. At the same time, seeing that the directors accepted, and limited their claim to, the amount at which the liquidator had, before any question with them arose, estimated the liability of R. D. Simpson Ltd. to Van Berkel & Co., I see no reason to infer that there was anything of the nature of collusion between the directors and the liquidator, or that the failure of the latter to bring the matter pointedly to the notice of the Lord Ordinary was more than an error in judgment. I therefore agree with Lord Stormonth-Darling that there is no occasion to cut down his fee as proposed by the Lord Ordinary.

The true question which has to be determined appears to me to be, What is the nature of the claim which the directors have against R. D. Simpson Ltd.? If they are in the position of persons who have paid to Van Berkel & Co. a debt due to that company by R. D. Simpson Ltd., and who have obtained from the former Company an assignation of the debt, then they are entitled to claim and to be ranked in the liquidation for the full amount of the debt. I gather that that was the footing upon which the directors made their claim in the liquidation, and upon which the liquidator gave them a ranking.

I am of opinion, however, that that is not a sound view of the claim. The directors are not, in my judgment, in the position of a person who has paid the debt of another, or of a cautioner who has paid the debt of his principal and who has obtained an assignation of the creditor's right. The claim of Van Berkel & Co. against the directors was a claim against them personally, on account of what they had done when acting as directors. In short, I take it that the claim was founded upon quasi-delict on the directors' part. Now, if the directors had not compromised the claim, but if the litigation had gone on and Van Berkel & Co. had obtained decree for the amount which was ascertained to be the loss which they had sustained through infringement of their patent rights, and the costs which they had incurred in vindicating these rights, I do not think that the directors would have been entitled to claim relief—that is to say, total relief—from R. D. Simpson Ltd.; nor is it altogether clear that they would have been entitled to claim even partial relief upon the principle of contribution. No question of that kind, however, has been raised. The directors claim solely as assignees of Van Berkel; and no one is challenging their right to claim as such assignees. The only question is as to amount.

Now, for the purpose of this case the total loss and damage sustained by Van Berkel & Co. must be taken to be £2000. That is the amount estimated by the liquidator, and it has been accepted by all parties interested. One-half of that sum has been paid by the directors to Van Berkel & Co., but the latter have never discharged their claim against R. D. Simpson Ltd., but have assigned it to the directors. It seems to me that in the position of matters which I have explained, the directors, as such assignees, cannot claim in the liquidation more than the amount by which the debt to Van Berkel & Co. is still unpaid—that is to say, £1000. I have had the advantage of reading the opinion of my brother Lord Ardwall, in which he deals fully with the view of the case which I have indicated, and as I concur in that opinion it is unnecessary for me to say more on the subject.

I have only to add that I agree entirely with what Lord Stormonth-Darling has said in regard to Mr Tait's report.

Lord Ardwall.—I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be affirmed except in so far as it directs the deduction of £15, 15s. to be made from the fee to be afterwards allowed to the liquidator.

It is necessary to advert only shortly to one or two points of fact, as the Lord Ordinary has detailed them very thoroughly in his opinion.

The insolvency of the company in liquidation was principally caused by their having been unsuccessful in an action of interdict brought against them for infringement of the patent of Mr Van Berkel of Rotterdam. The case was a narrow and difficult one, and not the slightest blame attaches to the directors for having on behalf of the Company resisted the action as strenuously as they could. But the Van Berkel patent, the validity of which was questioned, was upheld by both Lord Dundas and the First Division on a reclaiming note, and perpetual interdict was granted on 20th November 1906. That action having been so decided, there arose a claim against R. D. Simpson Limited for the expenses of the suspension process and for damages. The Lord Ordinary in his note states that this claim for damages and expenses was before liquidation adjusted by the Van Berkel Company and R. D. Simpson Limited at £1000, but this, though so far correct, is somewhat misleading, inasmuch as the £1000 was only agreed to by the complainers in the suspension on the footing of the payment being adequately secured to the satisfaction of the complainers, and proportional instalments paid every quarter, but in reality the claim for damages amounted to at least £1440, and the expenses, on a very moderate computation, to about £600; and accordingly the liquidator, who very properly, and without being obliged to do so, called a meeting of creditors on 4th April 1907, laid before them a state of affairs, No. 34 of process, shewing the assets and liabilities of the Company, and amongst the liabilities there was the following entry: "Liability under action by W. A. Van Berkel estimated at £2000." This sum was mentioned and laid before a meeting of creditors nearly a fortnight before any action was taken against the directors of the Company, amongst whom are the three claimants, and there is therefore no room for the suggestion that this sum was long subsequently fixed between the liquidator and the said claimants collusively or clandestinely as the measure of the debt due to Van Berkel's company by R. D. Simpson Limited. On the 17th of April 1907 an action was raised against the directors of R. D. Simpson Limited, not as directors, but personally and individually, for £4250, being £1250 of damages claimed in respect of the breach of the pursuer's patent, and £3000, being the estimated costs, judicial and extra-judicial, of the action of suspension and interdict. It perhaps ought here to be noted that the voluntary liquidation was ordered to proceed under supervision of the Court on 19th March 1907. Accordingly at the time this action was raised against the individual directors, their powers as directors had, for the time, come to an end (see Companies Act 1862, sect. 133 (5)), although, as observed by the Lord Ordinary, they, for some purposes, remained officers of the Company. But, as has been laid down in a number of decided cases, they were liable personally as persons who had authorised an infringement of a patent for the damages, including expenses, occasioned to the complainers by the infringement (see Frost on Patents, I. 389). In this state of matters the claimants compromised the said action by a cash payment of £1000 in full of the conclusions of the summons, and under a settlement which exonerated them from all liability of any kind. They deemed it right, however, in their own interests, to obtain, as part of the settlement with the Van Berkel Company, an assignation of all claims for damages and rights of action whatever competent to the complainers against R. D. Simpson Limited, in respect of the infringement of patent or arising in the way of claims for expenses, and specially including £1100, being the amount of their judicial expenses in the said action. On this assignation such of the directors as are in right of it made a claim against the Company for which they were prepared to raise an action, but before doing so they quite properly submitted their claims to the liquidator, who went carefully into the whole matter, and the claim was adjusted at £2000, for which the liquidator arranged to give them an ordinary ranking, and thus obviated a litigation.

If the claimants had been persons wholly unconnected with the infringement of the patent, and had purchased the claims of the Van Berkel Company against R. D. Simpson Limited, before the former company had received anything to account of these claims, I think £2000 would have been a very fair and reasonable sum at which to estimate the debt and at which to compromise the claim. As has been already noticed, £2000 was the sum at which the liquidator had estimated Van Berkel's claim in the original state of affairs, and I think that this circumstance led the liquidator, mistakenly, as I think, in point of law, to consider the claimants entitled to a ranking for £2000.

But in my opinion the claim ought to be restricted to £1000, not exactly on the grounds stated by the Lord Ordinary, but for the following reasons:—

The directors did not intervene in the matter and pay the £1000 in order to free the Company from liability, nor did they pay that sum on behalf of the Company. They paid it in settlement of a personal action directed against themselves as persons who had authorised the infringement of a patent. This is clearly set forth in all the documents relating to the matter, and is common ground to both Mr Tait and the liquidator. This being so, it follows that the only right in virtue of which the directors were entitled to sue the Company is the right conferred by the assignation. Now what is the value of that right?

On the assumption that all that was due to the Van Berkel Company in respect of damages and expenses caused by R. D. Simpson Limited's infringement of their patent was fairly estimated at £2000, it was, in my opinion, only that sum, under deduction of the £1000 already recovered by the Van Berkel Company from the directors. It may make this clearer if we suppose that the Van Berkel Company, after receiving the £1000 from the directors in settlement of the personal action against them, had assigned their whole claims against R. D. Simpson Limited to some third person called "A" who was willing to speculate on the chance of recovering more than the price in the liquidation, and that "A" had raised an action against R. D. Simpson Limited in liquidation for £2000. It would have been an absolutely good defence to the extent of £1000 for the liquidator to plead that the Van Berkel Company had recovered £1000 from the directors as individuals, and were entitled to sue only for the balance of their claim of £2000, and that "A" as their assignee was in no better position. In my opinion the present claimants are in no better position—they are suing in right of the Van Berkel Company, who have already received £1000, and on the footing that £2000 properly represents the whole damages and expenses, that leaves only the remaining £1000 to be recovered in any action they might have raised, and accordingly I think that this is all that the liquidator ought to have ranked them for. If the facts had been different, and if the directors had paid the £1000 to the Van Berkel Company on behalf of R. D. Simpson Limited, and were entitled on that ground to be relieved of loss by the Company, the pecuniary result would have been the same, because all that they could have recovered in that case had the Company been solvent would have been the £1000 they were out of pocket, and now that the Company is in liquidation that is all that the liquidator would have been entitled to rank them for. But, it being clear in fact and in law that the claimants did not pay the £1000 on behalf of R. D. Simpson Limited, and are claiming in the liquidation solely as assignees of the Van Berkel Company, I am of opinion, for the reasons I have stated, that they are only entitled to be ranked for £1000, being the balance of the debt of £2000 which the Van Berkel Company have not recovered otherwise.

While I think the liquidator acted bona fide, though mistakenly, in the matter of the compromise and ranking, and that what he did was probably due to his mixing up the character of the claimants as individual assignees, yet I entirely agree with the Lord Ordinary that in a compromise involving difficult and delicate questions of both fact and law, the liquidator ought to have obtained special sanction to the compromise from the judge of the liquidation upon a note presented for the purpose, and I think that the Lord Ordinary had good reason to be seriously displeased with this not having been done; but at the same time I differ altogether from him in his criticisms of the liquidator's moral conduct. Though it would have been the proper course to have made a special application for a sanction to this compromise, I cannot find in the conduct of the liquidator anything to justify the remark that he deliberately attempted "to smuggle" the matter through without the Court being made aware of the circumstances, and there is no evidence in the case to shew that the liquidator withheld any information from the Lord Ordinary, or indeed that he was ever asked to "vouchsafe" such. Still less do I think there is any ground for the assumption that there was some sort of collusive agreement or conspiracy between the liquidator and the directors as to the lodging and admission of their claim. It is quite true that the claim was made after consultation with the liquidator and after the directors had satisfied him that the claim was a reasonable one to be admitted to an ordinary ranking, but the idea that the sum was fixed collusively to the detriment of creditors, I think, is conclusively disposed of by the fact that that very sum had been estimated at the outset by the liquidator before the directors had incurred any liability, as the estimated amount of R. D. Simpson Limited's liability to the Van Berkel Company, and had been embodied in the state of affairs submitted to the meeting of creditors on 4th April 1907. This being so, it is not surprising that not a single creditor has come forward in response to the invitation contained in the circular which the Lord Ordinary directed to be sent to them, at considerable expense.

On the whole matter, I must absolve the liquidator from any intention to conceal this matter or to sacrifice the interests of the creditors to those of the directors of the Company.

For the error he committed in not applying to the Lord Ordinary for sanction to the compromise in question, it will be sufficient reparation if the Court disallow his expenses in this reclaiming note as a charge against the estate in the liquidation. He has succeeded, it is true, in having his professional character vindicated from the aspersions cast on it by the Lord Ordinary, but it was his own error in procedure that led the Lord Ordinary to make the remarks he did, and therefore I think his expenses in the reclaiming note should not form a charge against the funds of the liquidation.

With regard to the other reclaimers, they have not succeeded in having the Lord Ordinary's judgment altered in their favour, and they must accordingly bear their own expenses in the appeal.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—My Lords, the somewhat painful position into which the liquidator has been brought by the animadversions of the Lord Ordinary on his personal conduct made it necessary that the subject of the reclaiming note should receive anxious consideration. I can only say that I entirely concur with what has fallen from your Lordships on that matter, and with the course proposed.

Upon the other questions involved I have had an opportunity of perusing the opinions which your Lordships have just read. I entirely concur in them, and do not think it necessary to do more than express my adhesion to the views which are expressed in those opinions.—8th February 1908.

Dempster v. William Baird & Co. Ltd.

SECOND DIVISION.

(The Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Stormonth-Darling, Low and Ardwall.)

331. Dempster v. William Baird & Company Limited.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), sect. 1 (3)—Arbitration or Agreement — Procedure — Workman Injured in March 1899—Agreement under which Weekly Payments of Compensation Made Until May 1900—Payments Stopped on Workman's Return to Work in May 1900 — Workman Again Incapacitated in April 1907 — Application to Sheriff as Arbiter to Award Compensation—Finding by Sheriff That Original Agreement Neither Varied nor Ended—Held Application Competent.

Stated Case under Workmen's Compensation Act 1897.

This was an appeal by way of stated case from the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute (Campbell Shairp) at Ayr in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. cap. 37), in which Alexander Dempster, miner, Muirkirk, claimed compensation from William Baird & Co. Ltd., Muirkirk.

The case stated:

This is an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, in which the said Alexander Dempster (who, on or about the first day of March 1899, whilst in the employment of the said William Baird & Co. Ltd., in Lightshaw No. 1 Pit, Muirkirk, was struck by a fall of rock from the roof of said pit, and sustained severe injuries to his back, and also severe internal injuries, in an ordinary application or petition, and not by a minute) craves the Court to ascertain and fix such weekly payments as may be found to be due and payable to him under and in terms of the said Act, and to grant an award against the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. in his favour, finding him entitled to such weekly payments, beginning the first payment as on the 28th day of May 1900 for the week preceding that date, and so on weekly thereafter until he is again able to earn his full wages, or such weekly payment is varied, with interest on each weekly payment at the rate of 5 per centum per annum from the date when the same became and becomes payable till payment, with expenses.

The following facts were admitted or proved:—(1) That as the result of the said injuries received by him the said Alexander Dempster was totally incapacitated for his work as a miner from the said 1st day of March 1899—the date of the said accident—until the 21st day of May 1900. (2) That his average weekly earnings in the employment of the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. during the twelve months previous to the date of said accident were twenty-eight shillings and eightpence. (3) That in the fourth article of the applicant's condescendence it is averred that "the applicant, by agreement with the respondents, received compensation, under the 2ND DIV. Dempster v. William Baird & Co. Ltd.

Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, from the 15th day of March 1899 until the 21st day of May 1900, at the rate of 14s. 4d. per week"; and the answer of the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. to this averment is, "Admitted." That accordingly, under an agreement entered into between the applicant and the said William Baird & Co. Ltd., they agreed to pay to him, and he agreed to accept and receive from them as compensation under said Act, for his said injuries, the sum of 14s. 4d. weekly from the 15th day of March 1899. That it was not averred or proved that such agreement had been ended or varied, and that no memorandum of said agreement was sent to the sheriff-clerk, or recorded by him in the special register. (4) That, on or about the 21st day of May 1900, the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. ceased to pay to the said Alexander Dempster the said weekly payments, but gave him employment as a pit bottomer, and that the said Alexander Dempster worked when he was able for the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. as a pit bottomer from about the said 21st day of May 1900 till about the first day of April 1907, when, as the result of his said injuries, he became totally incapacitated for even light work, and ceased working altogether. And (5) that the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. refused to pay him compensation from and after the said 21st day of May 1900.

On these admitted or proved facts I sustained pleas in law stated for the said William Baird & Co. Ltd., to the effect that their liability to pay compensation under the said Act to the said Alexander Dempster having been settled by agreement between him and them (a memorandum of which agreement might have been recorded by the said Alexander Dempster, in terms of sect. 8 of the Second Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, and upon an extract of which recorded memorandum the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. might have been charged to pay to the said Alexander Dempster the weekly payments agreed upon), his application for arbitration was incompetent; and I accordingly dismissed the application, and found the said Alexander Dempster liable to the said William Baird & Co. Ltd. in their expenses of process.

> Was the Sheriff-Substitute right in holding that, the compensation due to the applicant having been settled by agreement between him and the respondents, the proper course for the applicant to have adopted was to have recorded a memorandum of said agreement, and charged the respondents thereunder; and that the present application for arbitration is incompetent because an agreement as to the compensation to be paid to the applicant by the respondents has been entered into between the parties?

Alexander Dempster appealed and argued: The agreement subsisted only during incapacity (Colville & Sons Ltd. v. Tigue, 1905, 8 F. 179), and therefore came to an end on the appellant's return to work in May 1900. As the agreement was not a subsisting agreement, and as a question as to the duration of compensation had arisen, arbitration was competent (Strannigan v. Baird & Co. Ltd., 1904, 6 F. 784). The appellant could not have recorded a memorandum of an agreement which was no longer in existence. The respondents having ceased to pay compensation under the agreement, and not having averred a new agreement, were barred from maintaining that arbitration was excluded. Dunlop v. Rankin & Blackmore (1901, 4 F. 203) was distinguishable. The application there was brought shortly after payments were discontinued, and it was held on the facts that there was a subsisting agreement.

Argued for the Respondents: An agreement once made remained in force until the weekly payments were reviewed under Sched. I., sect. 12. If so, the agreement in the present case was still a subsisting agreement. It followed that arbitration was excluded (Dunlop v. Rankin & Blackmore, cit.; Colville & Sons Ltd. v. Tigue, cit.). The claimant's remedy was to record a memorandum of the agreement (Fife Coal Co. Ltd. v. Lindsay, 1908, 15 S.L.T. 742). Even if the agreement were held to be suspended while the appellant was receiving wages, it was still sufficient to exclude arbitration. Strannigan v. Baird & Co. Ltd. (cit.) was not in point. The question in that case was whether a workman lost his right to compensation because, although dissatisfied with the certificate of the employers' doctor, he did not submit himself to a medical referee. Counsel also cited Lochgelly Iron and Coal Co. Ltd. v. Sinclair, 1907, 15 S.L.T. 544.

The Court answered the question of law in the negative, and remitted to the arbitrator to proceed.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—This is a very exceptional and peculiar case. The workman, whose injury occurred in the early part of 1899, agreed with his employer to accept a certain weekly payment in respect of incapacity, and this was paid down to May 1900. At that time payments as for compensation were stopped, and the workman was taken back into the employment as a bottomer, and paid by wages for his work. He neither asked for nor received any money in name of compensation for the injury. No agreement was registered, and for seven years the work was continued to him and the wages for the work given to him. Then a new state of matters arose. The injury he had received had not been cured, for he again became incapacitated by reason of the injury, and now remains incapacitated.

Such being the facts, the question arises whether the workman, being now incapacitated by the injury incurred seven years ago, is entitled to ask for compensation in an arbitration.

The Sheriff-Substitute has held that he cannot competently do so—that as there was an agreement for compensation in 1899, the workman's course was to register a memorandum of that agreement in terms of the Act and insist on his compensation being paid to him under it. I am of opinion that the view of the Sheriff-Substitute is erroneous.

The agreement of 1899 was one on the footing of total incapacity, and when in 1900 total incapacity ceased, the agreement must have been modified if the master so required, either by a new agreement, or if the agreement was put on the register, by the Sheriff being called upon to reduce the amount payable. No such proceedings took place. The master simply refused to pay any more, in respect he was employing the workman and paying him wages, and the workman was accepting the wages and claiming no compensation. The course of time, therefore, during the seven years was not regulated by the agreement—there was no agreement which applied to the circumstances, for an agreement based on ascertained total incapacity, and implemented by payments applicable only to total incapacity, could not apply to a case where a workman was earning the full wages of the employment which he was offered and accepted, and was receiving nothing else.

The workman now comes forward, demanding to be paid compensation for all the past seven years, and to this end brings a petition in ordinary form for an arbitration under the statute. I cannot hold that he is debarred from instituting such a proceeding, he being now incapacitated. I say nothing as to whether he can succeed in his demand for compensation during the seven years when he was in employment on wages. The only question before the Court now is whether his present proceeding is bad from incompetency. The question put raises that question only, and I have no hesitation in answering it in the negative. The result will be that the case must go back to the Sheriff for further procedure.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—If the facts stated by the Sheriff had admitted of it, there would have been a great deal to be said for his view in law that the proper course for the workman to have adopted was to have registered a memorandum of agreement, and that the course which he actually did adopt, viz. to bring an application for arbitration, was incompetent. The argument in support of the Sheriff's view comes somewhat strangely from the employers, because it is to all appearance very much against their interest.

But I do not think that the facts, viewed as a whole, warrant that conclusion, and I think we are bound to take the facts as they are stated, without regard to the pleadings of parties.

The agreement admittedly made, and for fourteen months acted on, viz. from 15th March 1899 to 21st May 1900, was not a recent agreement, and a good deal has happened since then. First, on 21st May 1900, the employers ceased to make the weekly payments which they had agreed upon, and gave the workman employment as a pit bottomer. It is not said at what wage; but whatever it was, it was wage and not compensation which the workman presumably accepted, for it is expressly found that the original agreement of 15th March 1899 was never ended or varied under par. 12 of Schedule I. of the Act. Then a period of seven years elapsed, and it is further found that, on 1st April 1907, the workman became totally incapacitated for even light work, "as the result of his said injuries," and that he ceased working altogether. Finally, it is found that the employers "refused to pay him compensation from and after the said 21st day of May 1900."

I do not understand how that is consistent with there being a continuing and subsisting agreement during all that period of more than seven years, that the employers should pay him compensation at the full rate of 14s. 4d. weekly. In other words, I do not understand how it can be said that there was an agreement, when both parties shewed by their conduct that there was no agreement. If there was no such subsisting agreement, how can the Sheriff's finding in law be justified? It is suggested that the Sheriff must have been satisfied on that head, or he would not have pronounced his finding in law. I admit that Lord Kyllachy at one point of his opinion in Colville v. Tigue, 1905, 8 F. 179 (p. 183), said that the statutory tribunal "might have to decide incidentally whether some agreement submitted to it as excluding its jurisdiction is a real agreement and a subsisting agreement." But he also said (p. 184) that "if the Sheriff thought (as perhaps he might) that there was no subsisting agreement, that on its just construction the alleged agreement came to an end when the incapacity in fact ceased, his duty was to proceed to arbitrate (under sect. 1, sub-sect. 3); but, doing so, to reject the applicant's claim as wholly unfounded. There was no third course open to him." In my own opinion in Colville v. Tigue, I see I expressed the view (at p. 187) that the application for arbitration in that case was "competently brought," and Lord Low's opinion was distinct (p. 290), that "there was nothing in the Act which, when there is only an unrecorded agreement to pay compensation during incapacity, compels the employer to continue payment after the incapacity has in fact ceased." The actual decision in Colville v. Tigue, in the course of which Dunlop v. Rankin & Blackmore, 1901, 4 F. 203, was cited, was that the employers "were not liable to pay compensation to the respondent from the date at which his incapacity ceased to the date of the arbitrator's award." The facts of that case were that the accident happened on 24th August 1903; that the employers agreed with the workman to pay him compensation at a certain rate during the period of his incapacity; that this agreement was not recorded; that the employers made payments to him in terms of the agreement down to 14th December 1903; that they then ceased to make payments, alleging that the workman's incapacity had ceased, and offering him work at full wages, which he declined; that in March 1905 the workman instituted proceedings by way of arbitration before the Sheriff; that the Sheriff found that incapacity had ceased by 14th December 1903, but ordained the employers to make payment to the workman at the agreed on rate from 14th December 1903 to 12th July 1905, being the date of his award; and he assoilzied the employers from any claim for future compensation.

Now, these facts are not precisely similar to those in the present case, but they resemble them very closely. In particular they resemble them in respect that years had elapsed since the original agreement had been made—in Colville's case two, in this case more than seven years—and that a different kind of contract, viz. an agreement for wages, had been substituted for an agreement to pay compensation. In Dunlop v. Rankine & Blackmore I admit there was the same feature as in the present case of a refusal by the employers to continue payments under the original agreement, and yet the Court seems to have held that the workman was still entitled to have the agreement recorded, and they remitted to the Sheriff to discuss the application for arbitration. But the agreement in that case was de recenti, i.e. within a year from the date of the accident, and the sole reason for the application for arbitration would seem to have been to provide for the event of supervening incapacity. I do not therefore think that the case has any real application. The more recent case of Beath & Keay v. Ness, 1903, 6 F. 168, where a workman had returned to the same employment on wages, and the cases which have followed it, seem to be much more in point.

In short, I am of opinion that we are entitled and bound, as in every case of mixed fact and law, to take the facts of the case as a whole, in order to do justice between the parties; and if we are satisfied that the agreement of 15th March 1899 has ceased to be since 21st May 1900 and is not now a subsisting agreement, that we should so hold, and that we should answer the sole question of law—which is, whether the present application for arbitration is incompetent—in the negative, and remit to the Sheriff to proceed with it as may be just.

Lord Low.—So long ago as 1st March 1899 the appellant was injured while in the employment of the respondents, and an agreement was entered into whereby the respondents agreed to pay to the appellant as compensation under the Act, 14s. 4d. weekly, that being the statutory maximum amount. The respondents paid that amount to the appellant weekly from 15th March 1899 until the 21st May 1900. No memorandum of the agreement has been recorded, and the Sheriff-Substitute states that "it was not averred or proved that such agreement had been ended or varied." The Sheriff-Substitute then states that on 21st May 1900 the respondents ceased to pay the weekly payments to the appellant, but gave him employment as a pit-bottomer, and that he worked in that capacity from 21st May 1900 till 1st April 1907, when, as the result of his injuries, he became totally incapacitated. I assume, although it is not stated in the case, that during that period the appellant was paid wages.

In these circumstances the appellant instituted arbitration proceedings under sect. 1 (3) of the Act, in which he claims compensation from and after 21st May 1900.

The Sheriff-Substitute has dismissed the application as incompetent, on the ground that the proper course for the appellant to follow was to record a memorandum of the agreement and charge the respondents thereon.

Now the agreement entered into between the parties in 1899 being an agreement under the statute, was of course only an agreement on the respondents' part to pay compensation to the appellant during incapacity. Further, the amount fixed by the agreement being the maximum amount allowed by the statute, was payable only during total incapacity. Whenever the appellant ceased to be totally incapacitated the respondents were entitled to have the amount fixed by the agreement reduced, and it could have been reduced either by an arbiter in an application for review of the weekly payments, or by agreement. Now, from the 21st of May 1900 until the 1st of April 1907, a period of nearly seven years, the appellant was not totally incapacitated, because during that period he was working and receiving wages. We are not told what the amount of his wages was, but we are told that he received no compensation. In these circumstances it seems to me that during the seven years the rights and obligations of parties could not possibly be regulated by the original agreement. The natural inference from the facts which are stated is that during that period the respondents gave the appellant employment according to his capacity, and that in consideration thereof, and of the wages which he thereby earned, he made no claim for compensation. If, however, that was what happened, the parties were during these seven years proceeding upon an agreement, express or implied, which was different from, and for the time superseded, the original agreement. It is perhaps possible that all the time the appellant was claiming compensation as well as wages, but if so then there was no agreement applicable to the circumstances, because as the appellant was earning wages he could not claim the maximum amount, which was all that the original agreement provided for.

The appellant is now claiming that he was entitled to some compensation during the whole of the seven years, and the question really is whether he has adopted a competent method of enforcing that claim. If I am right in thinking that in consequence of the change of circumstances—the partial recovery of the appellant, and his employment by and receipt of wages from the respondents—the original agreement could not be appealed to as settling the rights and obligations of parties during the seven years, I think that the appellant was entitled to make an application under sect. 1 (3) of the Act, because his claim raises questions as to whether he is entitled to compensation at all during the seven years, and if so to what amount—questions in regard to which the parties are not agreed.

No doubt it would have been competent for the appellant to register a memorandum of the original agreement, and charge the respondents thereon, and if that had been done the question of the appellant's right to compensation during the seven years could have been raised by a suspension of the charge. But, although such a proceeding might be competent, I think that it would be less consonant with the intention of the legislature than the course which the appellant has adopted, because it was evidently intended that such questions should, as far as possible, be kept out of the courts of law, and determined by arbitration.

I have dealt solely with the question of the pursuer's claim for compensation during the seven years, because it appears that that is the only matter in controversy, the respondent's counsel having stated that they admitted the appellant's right to, and are willing to pay to him, full compensation from the date when he again became totally incapacitated.

It was argued, however, that all inquiry is excluded, and that there is no room for arbitration, in respect that the Sheriff-Substitute has stated as matter of fact that it was not averred or proved that the original agreement had "been ended or varied." That statement, however, must be read along with that which immediately follows in regard to what happened during the seven years. But when these two statements are read together it seems to me to be plain that all that the Sheriff-Substitute means when he says that the original agreement has not been ended or varied is, that it has not been formally ended or varied, as, for example, by the determination of an arbiter under an application for review of the weekly payments.

I am therefore of opinion that the question in the case should be answered in the negative, and the case remitted back to the Sheriff-Substitute.

Lord Ardwall.—This stated case, both as regards the statement of facts and the question of law, is a far from satisfactory document.

The first part of the question of law is put on this assumption: "The compensation due to the applicant having been settled by agreement between him and the respondents," and the second part of the question is put upon this assumption, that "an agreement as to the compensation to be paid to the applicant by the respondents has been entered into between the parties." These assumptions appear to amount to this, that at the date when the arbitration proceedings were initiated there was a subsisting agreement between the workman and the employers as to the rate of compensation to be paid to him at that and any future time until the weekly payment thereby provided should be ended, diminished, or increased, in terms of sect. 12 of the first schedule of the Act, or otherwise ended.

If this is so, it is surprising that the Sheriff-Substitute or anyone else could consider it necessary to have a stated case at all, because, under sub-sect. 3 of sect. 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act 1897, arbitration is only competent if the question as to the amount of compensation is "not settled by agreement," and, according to the question and statement of the case, the compensation due to the appellant was and is "settled by agreement"; but I agree with your Lordships that we are not bound to answer the question as put, but must take the real facts of the case, apart from the gloss put upon them by the Sheriff-Substitute.

It is, I think, apparent that at the date of the commencement of the arbitration proceedings the unrecorded agreement which was entered into, and which had no definite period of endurance, had by common consent been allowed to lapse; and further, that at the date of the arbitration the parties were in dispute as to what compensation should be paid for the present and the future. Accordingly, I have no difficulty in holding that when the arbitration proceedings commenced, the agreement of 1899, such as it was, had lapsed, and that an entirely new state of matters had arisen, in which the parties were in dispute regarding the amount of compensation payable to the applicant, and regarding which compensation accordingly the arbitration was perfectly competent.

I accordingly agree that we should answer the question put in the case by finding that, in the circumstances, the appellant's application for arbitration was competent, and should remit to the Sheriff-Substitute to proceed with the same.—7th February 1908.

332. Fryer v. North British Railway Company and Burgh of Clydebank.

I. Reparation — Relevancy — Railway — Child Killed at Level-crossing—Road Formerly Private Adopted by Burgh as Access to Public Park—No Additional Duty on Railway Company Through Alteration in Use of Road —Duty upon Burgh to Ensure Safety at Level-crossing.

II. Reparation—Contributory Negligence —Whether Negligence of Parent in Allowing Young Child to go Unattended Constitutes Contributory Negligence is Question of Fact—Crawford v. Magistrates of Edinburgh (1906), 14 S.L.T. p. 383, Referred to.

III. Proof — Proof or Jury Trial — Circumstances in Which Proof Before Lord Ordinary Preferred to Jury Trial.

This was an action in which Edward Phipps Fryer, a labourer residing in Clydebank, sought damages against the North British Railway Company and the Burgh of Clydebank, "jointly and severally, or severally," in respect of the death of his son, a child of 22 months old, which took place on 15th May 1907, while the child was crossing the North British Railway by a level-crossing leading to a public park belonging to the Burgh.

The facts of the case and contentions of parties sufficiently appear from the Lord Ordinary's Note.

The Lord Ordinary dismissed the case against the Railway Company and allowed a proof before answer against the Burgh, holding that in the circumstances a proof was more suitable than trial before a jury.

Lord Johnston.—In this case Fryer, a labourer residing at 15 Dunn Street, Dalmuir, which is part of the Burgh of Clydebank, sues both the North British Railway Company and the Magistrates of Clydebank for reparation for the injury done him by the death of his son on 15th May 1907, while crossing the North British Railway by a level-crossing leading to the public park belonging to the burgh, he having been run down on the crossing and killed by a train belonging to the North British Railway Company. From the death certificate No. 11 of process it appears that the child at the date of its death was 22 months old.

The circumstances, as disclosed by the statements and admissions on record read along with the Ordnance Survey, No. 13 of process, and the plan, on a larger scale, No. 12 of process, are these. The high road from Glasgow to Dumbarton traverses the burgh of Clydebank from south-east to north-west, and the Glasgow, Dumbarton and Helensburgh line of the North British Railway also traverses the burgh from east to west, the road and the line converging at the west end of the burgh. The line is to the north of the road. The west end of the burgh is known as Dalmuir, being formed of feus off the Dalmuir estate. There is a station on the line for the district called Dalmuir Station. Near the western burgh boundary there is room for a series of short side streets, running practically at right angles to the road and the railway, entering from the high road and ending a short distance from the railway fence. The buildings in these streets do not abut close upon the railway fence, but leave space enough for passage along the side of the railway fence between it and the ends of the streets, though whether this is mere vacant ground, or is maintained as a road or pathway, I am not at present informed. On the opposite side of the railway ex adverso of these streets stood the mansion-house and grounds of Dalmuir. Quite recently the western portion of the policies of Dalmuir have been acquired by the burgh of Clydebank, and laid out as a public park. And this park extends on the opposite side of the railway ex adverso the whole length of the ground occupied by the side streets to which I refer.

When the railway line was made in 1858 there existed more or less in the line of Burns Street, the centre one of the five side streets already laid out, a private estate road or back avenue leading to Dalmuir house and stables. The Railway Company were allowed to cross this private road on the level. At the level-crossing there are provided gates for carriage and cart traffic which are kept locked, keys being supplied to the proprietor of Dalmuir, and I presume also now to the town authorities, who say, however, that as a carriage or cart road the access is no longer used. But alongside of these gates there are swing wickets to accommodate foot passengers, which are not locked, nor are they under control of the nearest signal-box, which is about a hundred yards away. The Railway Company have kept no watchman at this crossing.

On the acquisition of the ground at Dalmuir as a public park, the magistrates made its main entrance at the west end, from Mount-Blow Road, at a point considerably north of the bridge which carries that road across the railway. But the existing level-crossing at the foot of Burns Street remains open, at any rate for foot passengers, and is no doubt much used by the public, as it is a short cut from the more populous part of the burgh of Clydebank to the new public park. And in pretty close proximity to this level-crossing, in fact, not more than fifty or sixty yards from it, the magistrates have placed gymnastic apparatus, swings, etc., for the use and amusement of children, their site being close to the north side of the railway line.

The pursuer lives in Dunn Street, the eastmost of the cross streets, and his house appears to be from 150 to 200 yards from the level-crossing going by the vacant ground between the street ends and the railway. It is admitted that the pursuer's child was on the crossing on 15th May 1907, unattended, when an express train due to pass Dalmuir station about 11.30 a.m. ran over it and killed it on the spot.

The ground of action against the Railway Company is that they failed to take reasonable and proper precautions for the safety of the public using the level-crossing, either by maintaining a watchman at the crossing or by providing mechanical control of the swing-gates, from the signal box, which was said to be about a hundred yards distant. I understand it to be maintained that this duty was more particularly imposed upon the Railway Company by the change of circumstances occasioned by the feuing of the adjacent ground on the south side, which involved a large increase in the population in the neighbourhood of the crossing, and by the creation of the public park on the north side, including the gymnasium and playground for children erected in the immediate neighbourhood of the crossing.

The ground of action against the magistrates of Clydebank is that, in full knowledge of the danger of the level-crossing, to which their attention had been called, and of the necessity of special precautions for the safety of persons using it being taken, which it is alleged had been pressed upon them, they failed in their duty to take any precaution for the safety of the public, whom they invited to resort to the park, and particularly of the children, whom they invited to resort to the gymnasium and playground, and both of whom they invited to use the level-crossing as an access thereto. Their duty is stated to have been to have provided either a footbridge or a subway for foot-passengers, to replace the level-crossing, and failing their being able to arrange that, which might depend on their rights in the road and level-crossing, then to have stationed a watchman to give people, and particularly children, warning of the approach of trains.

I am asked to determine on the relevancy of these grounds of action.

That against the Railway Company I hold to be not relevant. This road was a private occupation road when the Railway Company obtained their powers. Its use was confined to those going and coming to and from Dalmuir house and stables. The Railway Company were allowed to cross this back road on the level. Not being a turnpike road or public highway, it did not fall under the Railway Clauses Act 1845, sects. 39 and 40. I do not think it was even a "highway other than a public carriage way" in the sense of sect. 52. But even if it was such, the requirements of that section were complied with. I think that the road must be assumed to have been an occupation road, and to have fallen under sect. 60 et seq. of the Act; and I refer specially to sect. 68, which imposes the duty of shutting and fastening the gates on such a road on the owners and occupiers of adjoining lands. The swing-gates for foot passengers need not have been there, or might have been stiles, but for arrangement with the owner of Dalmuir. In fact, the whole matter of this back access to Dalmuir was, from the necessity of the situation, one of arrangement with the owner of Dalmuir, and with him alone.

I think that there was no obligation on the Railway Company to take any further precautions than originally bargained for, unless something in the construction or subsequent development of their line made this reasonably necessary, which is not alleged (Cliff v. Midland Railway Co., L.R. 1870, 5 Q.B. 258, explaining Bilbee v. London and Brighton Railway Co., 34 L.J. C.P. 182). And I do not think that any such duty was thrown upon the Railway Company by the change of circumstances founded on, in which they had no hand. The altered use of the crossing had nothing to do either with the construction of their line or with the traffic upon it.

But it is different with the other defenders. They, as magistrates of the burgh, construct out of the private grounds of Dalmuir House a public park. To that park the public are invited, and, if the existing private accesses are allowed to become public accesses to that park, a new situation arises, and the responsibility of seeing that they are reasonably safe, or that reasonable precautions for public safety are taken, lies, I think, upon the magistrates of the burgh. It may be that on proof it can be shewn that nothing more was required. But if it was, these defenders cannot rely upon the Railway Company making changes to meet the altered use to which they, the magistrates of the burgh, have put the ground in question, and the consequent change of the road from a private to a public access. I need say no more on this point. So far as the magistrates are concerned, I think that at any rate a relevant case for enquiry is made.

It is maintained farther in defence that the admitted fact of a child of such tender years having been allowed to wander to this crossing unattended is an admission of contributory negligence, which must eo ipso nonsuit the pursuer. Contributory negligence on the part of a child is a matter of circumstance and degree. I refer to my judgment in Crawford v. Magistrates of Edinburgh, 14 S.L.T. 383, for a citation of the authorities. But in no circumstances, I think, could contributory negligence be predicated of a child of twenty-two months old; and if it could be so, the defence could only be decided on proof. But this plea is rather of the nature of one of personal bar in relation to which the pursuer and his wife may be regarded as one, and his wife's negligence may be regarded as attaching to the pursuer. I heard an able argument on this point. But I am not satisfied that the proposition can be maintained, that a parent must either see that a young child is attended, or take the responsibility of its running into danger. There may doubtless be, and most certainly are, many cases in which such responsibility is incurred, and this may be one of them. But I do not think that the question can be divorced from circumstances, and I cannot therefore dispose of it pre-judicially.

I shall therefore sustain the first plea in law for the defenders the North British Railway Company, and repel that for the defenders the burgh of Clydebank. It remains to hear parties on the mode of proof, to which they have already spoken, but the circumstances are somewhat changed by my judgment.—2nd February 1908.

Lord Johnston.—I have further heard parties as to the mode of proof in the case, but I remain of the opinion which I formerly entertained, that this case will be better disposed of on a proof than by sending it to a jury.—4th February 1908.

333. The Clyde Salvage Company Limited v. Anstruther Union Harbour Commissioners.

PUBLIC AUTHORITIES PROTECTION ACT 1893, SECT. 1 — LIMITATION OF ACTION — ACTION AGAINST HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS — GROUNDING OF VESSEL THROUGH FAULT OF HARBOUR-MASTER — HELD THAT ACTION BROUGHT TOO LATE.

The pursuers in this action claimed £1200 damages from the defenders for the loss sustained by them through the grounding on a rock outside Anstruther harbour of a wrecked vessel which the pursuers had salved and were towing into said harbour. The wreck was attached to a lighter, and the pursuers averred that the navigation of the tug and of the wreck and lighter into the harbour was being conducted under the instructions of the harbour-master, and that the grounding of the wreck was due to the fault of the harbour-master in giving an unskilful and negligent order.

The defenders denied liability and pleaded, inter alia—

"4. Separatim, the act, neglect, or default complained of having been committed more than six months prior to the commencement of the present proceedings, the action is incompetent in respect of the provisions of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893."

The Lord Ordinary sustained this plea, and assoilzied the defenders.

Lord Salvesen.—The pursuers in this case were, in July 1906, conducting salvage operations on a steamer called the "Saxon," which was stranded on the May Island in the Firth of Forth. On 8th July they succeeded in getting the "Saxon" floated, and taken by means of tugs into the proper channel for getting alongside the pier in the harbour of Anstruther, to which they had previously arranged the "Saxon" should be brought. They allege that the navigation was being conducted under the instructions of the harbour-master, and that, through a negligent order which he gave, the "Saxon" was damaged by grounding on a hard ridge of rock of the existence of which he was or ought to have been aware, and of which the pursuers were unaware. The defenders in their fourth plea in law found upon sect. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 as excluding the action.

The act complained of was admittedly committed more than six months prior to the commencement of the present proceedings, and accordingly the only question is whether the defenders are entitled to the peculiar privileges which the statute confers on public authorities. This statute has so often been made the subject of construction by the Courts both in Scotland and in England, that it is unnecessary that I should say anything further than that I am unable to distinguish the present case from "The Ydun" [1899], P.D. p. 236. In that case the plaintiffs sued the Corporation of Preston, who were constituted the Port and Harbour Authority for Preston by a private Act of Parliament, for damages sustained by the grounding of their vessel within the port through the alleged negligence of the defendants in inviting the vessel to go up when there was not sufficient water in the channel leading to the docks. Jeune, J., dismissed the action, holding that the defendants were acting in pursuance of their public duties, so that sect. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act applied; and, on appeal, this decision was confirmed. The defenders here are the Port Authority of Anstruther, in precisely the same way as the Preston Corporation was at Preston; and they were so constituted in the public interest by the Anstruther Union Harbour Act 1860, which has since been amended by two Provisional Orders. An attempt was made to distinguish the present case from that of The "Ydun" on two grounds: (1) Under sect. 12 of the Provisional Order of 1880—while the rates levied and revenues received by the defenders are to be applied primarily for the maintenance and improvement of the harbour, any surplus is to be appropriated and set apart as a sinking fund as provided in the Act of 1860; and it was said that a time might arrive—after the purposes to which the sinking fund was to be applied has been implemented—when the surplus of rates might be lawfully appropriated to private purposes. In my opinion there is no warrant whatever for this contention; and no suggestion was made as to what private persons might take benefit under the Act, in the unlikely event of the principal sums borrowed from the Loan Commissioners being paid off.

(2) The second ground of differentiation is, in my opinion, equally shadowy. It was argued that, as the Commissioners had power to make bye-laws, and as the harbour-master was acting in pursuance of the bye-laws when the act or default was committed, he was not acting in pursuance or execution of any Act of Parliament. I utterly fail to see that there is any distinction. I have therefore no alternative but to sustain the defenders' fourth plea in law; and in terms thereof to assoilzie them from the conclusions of the action.—24*th January* 1908.

LANDS VALUATION APPEAL COURT.

(Lords Low and Dundas.)

334. The Airdrie, Coatbridge and District Water Trustees and The Caledonian Railway Company v. The Assessor for the County of Lanark.

Valuation—Subject—Slag Heap—Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. cap. 91), sect. 42—Held that a Slag Heap which was the Subject of a Lease for an Annual Rent or Lordship was Lands and Heritages Liable to be Assessed—Opinions that the Slag Heap was Neither "Minerals" nor "Quarries" in the Sense of sect. 42 of the Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act 1854.

Case.

At a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the County Council of the County of Lanark for the Middle Ward District of the county, held at Hamilton upon the 10th day of September 1907, the Airdrie, Coatbridge and District Water Trustees and the Caledonian Railway Company appealed against an entry in the Valuation Roll for the year from Whitsunday 1907 to Whitsunday 1908, of slag lordship, Chapelhall, of which they were entered as proprietors and occupiers respectively at a rent of £648, 1s.

They craved that the entry should be struck out of the Roll.

The following were the facts as stated in the case:—

The subjects in respect of which the appeal is raised is known as the Chapelhall slag heap, and consists of a large deposit of slag owned by and lying on a piece of ground belonging to the appellants the Airdrie, Coatbridge and District Water Trustees.

The predecessors of the Water Trust had, in connection with the acquisition of the water rights, to acquire the ground and the slag heap for a valuable consideration.

The appellants the Caledonian Railway Company have entered into an agreement with the other appellants the Airdrie, Coatbridge and District Water Trustees, for the right to use the slag for purposes in connection with their railway, and they do so use it mainly in the construction and repair of the permanent way as ballast for the rails, breaking it up by machinery erected at the slag heap so as to make it useful for this purpose. The Railway Company pay a royalty of 2d. per ton for the slag so used, the proprietors of the slag heap, the Airdrie, Coatbridge and District Water Trustees, having elected to take that option in the agreement rather than the alternative of a fixed rent of £130.

It is only the slag that is let to the Railway Company, and should iron be found in the heap, the Railway Company have no right to it under the agreement.

The sum entered in the Valuation Roll is the amount of the royalties for the past year, and there is no dispute as to the amount of the entry should it be decided that the subject falls to enter the Valuation Roll.

Slag is the residuum left from the manufacture of ore into iron and steel, and in the present case the appellants stated, and the assessor was not in a position to deny, that the ore originally treated at the works which produced the slag heap did not necessarily come from the locality, but may have been in whole or in part foreign ore imported into this country from Spain and elsewhere.

Both appellants concurred in appealing on the grounds (1) that slag, from its nature and composition, is not a mineral, and being therefore not an heritable subject, no entry should be made in the Valuation Roll in respect of the sum received from its sale; and (2) that even if it were an heritable subject, there is no let of the subject, the arrangement being merely a bargain as to sale of a commodity.

In addition, the appellants the Caledonian Railway Company contended that the entry, so far as relating to them, should be expunged, on the ground that the subject is already included in the Valuation Roll made up by the Assessor of Railways, etc.

Both appellants argued that, looking into its composition, slag could not be considered a mineral substance. It was merely the refuse left over from the treatment of iron ore for its primary purpose, the manufacture of iron or steel, and the fact that it had now attained a commercial value was no reason for its inclusion in the Valuation Roll. It had no resemblance to clay or blaes, which are considered minerals in the sense of the Valuation Acts, because the reason that these fall to be entered in the Roll is that they are in their natural state as extracted from the earth. Further, the slag heap was not a quarry. The material had for convenience been placed on the surface of the ground, which thus became merely the storehouse for the slag.

In reply on this point of the case the Assessor argued that the mere fact that the iron had been by treatment extracted from the original mineral substance did not necessarily imply that what remained was not mineral in composition; and as the definition in sect. 42 of the Valuation Act of 1854 had been held to be not exhaustive in its application, he was entitled to consider, as he did, that the slag here was in substance a mineral. The mere fact that the ironstone which produced the slag might have been imported from abroad did not, in his opinion, affect the case, if he was right in his view on the main point. Slag was as much a land and heritage as kelp cast up by the sea, and it had been decided that kelp should enter the Valuation Roll. Alternatively the slag heap was a quarry in any event or an assessable subject in the sense of the Valuation Act, which, he again pointed out, was not exhaustive in its definition.

On the second ground of appeal, viz. that the case was simply one of the sale of a commodity and not a let, the appellants submitted that assuming slag to be a mineral, the circumstances of the present case were such as to prevent its inclusion in the Valuation Roll.

This, they argued, was not a case of the working of minerals, but the mere sale of an article of commerce, and the fact that a written agreement had been entered into between the sellers and the buyers was not adverse to this view. Further, the fact that the agreement stipulated for payment of a "royalty," an expression which they admitted was usual in the case of a let of minerals, did not alter the true facts of the case, which amounted to a contract for sale—the sellers having a commodity to sell, choosing to restrict themselves to one customer, and to make a contract with him.

The Assessor contested this view, and submitted that the facts clearly shewed that the relationship between parties was one of landlord and tenant. The fact that the Railway Company had erected plant to treat the material on the ground was significant, as they would not have done so unless under a continuing arrangement, and the arrangement in the case was on all fours with a lease in ordinary form, the duration being determined by the life of the slag heap.

The appellants the Railway Company argued (3) that no entry fell to be made in the local Valuation Roll, for the reason that the value of the slag used by them was already dealt with in the Roll made up by the Assessor of Railways, etc. It was used in the formation or repair of the permanent way, of which it thus formed part, and as the value of the permanent way is entered in the Railway Assessor's Roll, the value of the slag must necessarily be included in that Roll, and should therefore not be entered in the local Valuation Roll.

In reply to this point the Assessor contended that the appellants' argument was untenable, because there was no difference between the use of the slag in this case and the ordinary case of the Railway Company buying metal for use on the permanent way from the tenant of an ordinary quarry or similar subject. In that case the tenant would be entered in the local Roll for the value of the metal produced, and there could be no ground for contending that because in this case the Railway Company were themselves the tenants they should escape assessment.

The Valuation Committee agreed by a majority on the first two points, and unanimously on the third point—(1) that slag was a mineral, or alternatively, that the slag heap was a quarry in the sense of the Valuation Acts; (2) that the Railway Company are, in the sense of the Valuation Acts, tenants or occupants of the slag heap; and (3) that the fact that the valuation of the slag is dealt with by the Railway Assessor in computing the value of the undertaking does not operate against its inclusion in the local Valuation Roll. They accordingly dismissed the appeals.

The Water Trustees and the Railway Company appealed to the Valuation Judges.

The agreement between the Appellants was in the form of a lease. It proceeded as follows:—

> This lease, entered into between the Airdrie and Coatbridge Water Company, incorporated under Act of Parliament, hereinafter referred to as the first party,—of the First Part; and the Caledonian Railway Company, incorporated under Act of Parliament, hereinafter referred to as the second party,—of the Second Part;

Witnesseth as follows, viz.:—The first party hereby let to the second party, and the second party take in lease from them, All and Whole the slag heaps deposited upon that part of the first party's lands at Chapelhall, ... with free ingress and egress to and from the said slag heaps, and liberty to remove and carry away the same in the ways and roads least hurtful to the first party's remaining lands, and likewise with liberty to erect a crusher or crushers, with the necessary engine or engines, on a suitable site on the first party's ground to be approved by the first party, but excepting and reserving all iron in the said slag heaps, and that for the period and on the terms and conditions following, viz.:—

First. The term of the second party's entry to the subjects hereby let shall be as at the term of Candlemas 1902, notwithstanding the date hereof. The lease shall endure for five years from and after that term, and shall be terminable thereafter by either party on six months' previous notice in writing.

Second. The second party bind and oblige themselves to pay to the first party and their assignees the yearly rents after specified, ... viz. for the first year of this lease the sum of £50 sterling of fixed money rent, and for the remaining four years of this lease the sum of £130 sterling of fixed money rent yearly; or, in the option of the first party, the following lordship or royalty in the event of the lordship or royalty in any year ending Candlemas during the currency of this lease exceeding the said fixed money rents, viz. a lordship or royalty of 2d. per ton for every ton of crushed or screened slag that shall be removed and carried away by virtue hereof: . . . . and the second party bind and oblige themselves, over and above the said rents or lordship or royalty, to pay all damages whatever which shall be occasioned to the land, or to the fences and drains therein, or to the party or parties working the minerals under the said land, by any of their operations in removing and carrying away the slag hereby let.

The Lands Valuation (Scotland) Act 1854, sect. 42, provides:

". . . . the expression 'lands and heritages' shall extend to and include . . . . mines, minerals, quarries . . . ."

Argued for Appellants: (1) A slag heap was not "minerals" in the sense of the Act. It was an extraneous substance which was brought in and deposited on the ground. The fact that slag was mineral in its nature did not settle the question. The word in the Act meant something one took from the ground in its natural state and carried away. But this was not a natural mineral. It was extracted from another mineral. One might as well assess iron which was extracted from the ore and stored somewhere. At what time did slag deposited on the ground become assessable? It never became incorporated with the ground. If a single piece of slag was not assessable, a heap was not, because it was simply an accumulation; and it was impossible to state any time in the process of accumulation at which it became an assessable subject. There were cases where—although not under this Act—the meaning of the word "minerals" had been dealt with. In Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie, 1888, 15 R. (H.L.) 94, it was held that a bed of clay was not "minerals" in the sense of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1847, sect. 18; in Nisbet Hamilton v. North British Railway Company, 1886, 13 R. 454, stone in a cutting was held not to be "minerals" in the sense of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, sect. 70; in Scott v. Midland Railway Company, 1897, 13 T.L.R. 398, a bing of slag was held not to be a quarry or "minerals" in the sense of the Quarries Act 1894. As to the cases cited for the Assessor—kelp was a natural substance, and the rent derived from it was the rent of a heritable subject partly growing on and partly washed up on to the shore. Blaes was also an entirely different subject, being a natural mineral produced from the ground, and not the residuum of the treatment of such a substance as ore for the purpose of extracting another mineral, viz. iron, from it. (2) While the form of the contract between the appellants was no doubt a lease, that was not conclusive. It was in reality a sale of the slag at twopence a ton. The stamp on the contract was adjudicated by the Inland Revenue at 10s. against the protest of the Railway Company, and the reason given for the amount was that the agreement gave a right of entry and power to erect machinery on the land. (3) The slag had already been assessed in the form of iron-ore. To assess it in the heap would be to assess it twice over.

Argued for Respondent: The Court had not to determine whether the heap of slag was "minerals," but whether it should be entered in the Roll as "lands and heritages." The case of the heap of blaes (Assessor for Stirlingshire v. Stein & Co., 1900, 2 F. 596) was conclusive on the question. The case of Nisbet Hamilton v. North British Railway Co. (cit. sup.) turned on whether the stone was of any merchantable value. That was the ground of decision. The case of Scott v. Midland Railway Co. (cit. sup.) turned on the particular definition of quarry in the Quarries Act. The kelp cases (The British Seaweed Co. Ltd., 1866, 4 M. 1139; Gordon, 1866, 4 M. 1141) were also in point in shewing that everything heritable in its nature which was of merchantable value was a proper subject for entry in the Valuation Roll. As to part of the slag being brought in from Spain, a similar argument was put forward in the oyster fishery case (Wallace v. Assessor for Wigtownshire, 1902, 4 F. 515) and rejected. The subject became assessable when it became of merchantable value, although it was "lands and heritages" from the time when it was placed on the ground.

The judges were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

Lord Low.—I do not regard the slag heap in question as being either "minerals" or a quarry within the meaning of the Valuation Act; but it seems to me that it is undoubtedly a heritable subject which is let for a yearly rent. It is therefore liable to assessment. In the case slag is described as "the residuum left from the manufacture of ore into iron or steel," and we all know very well how in practice such a residuum is treated. A suitable piece of ground is obtained and the slag is deposited on that piece of ground. In course of time a large hill is formed, and, when that hill comes to be profitable, I fail to see why it should not be assessed. It is undoubtedly heritable, and is a subject capable of being let and yielding a rent.

I am accordingly of opinion that the decision of the Valuation Committee must be upheld.

Lord Dundas.—I am of the same opinion; and I should not have added anything to what your Lordship has said, but that the question is an interesting one, and we have had a good argument upon it. It is not, in my judgment, necessary to decide whether this slag heap is, or is not, "minerals," in the sense of sect. 42 of the Lands Valuation Act 1854. If it were necessary to do so, I should be disposed to answer that question in the negative, because the word "minerals," occurring, as it does, between the words "mines" and "quarries," seems to relate to something in the nature of mineral which is being wrought out from its native place in the ground. I am further of opinion that the slag heap is not a "quarry" in the sense of the Act. Then, there is a question whether the document which forms the contract between the parties (appellants) is clearly and absolutely a lease, or may be regarded as an agreement of sale. I must say that, although the form of the document is not necessarily conclusive, the contract is very like a lease. It bears to be a lease; it is stamped as such; and it contains provisions not only for payment of lordships but of a stipulated fixed rent.

But however that may be, I agree in thinking that the real point in the case, and a safe and sufficient basis for our decision, is that this slag heap is heritage—a heritable subject—a corporeal hereditament—capable of yielding, and in fact yielding, an annual return; and is therefore a fit subject of assessment. We are not, I think, called upon to decide the precise point of time at which the slag heap became such a heritable subject; but it seems clear enough that it did so as least as soon as, if not before, the time when the agreement or lease was entered into. We heard very little argument in support of the third point raised by the Railway Company, to the effect that the slag being in fact used by them in the construction of their permanent way, the value of which is otherwise assessed, the Company were in danger of double assessment. This argument is, in my judgment, clearly untenable, and I say no more about it. Upon the whole matter, I agree with your Lordship that the determination of the Valuation Committee is right.—19*th February* 1908.

LANDS VALUATION APPEAL COURT.

(Lords Low and Dundas.)

335. The Melrose Gas Company Limited v. Assessor for the County of Roxburgh.

Valuation—Rent—Gas Works—Revenue Method—Average of Years—Held that a Five Years' Average was a Proper Basis to Apply in Arriving at the Annual Rent or Value of Gas Works, Although the Five Years Included a Year of Exceptional Prosperity.

Case.

At a meeting of the Valuation Committee of the County Council of the County of Roxburgh, held at Jedburgh on 10th September 1907, the Melrose Gas Company Limited appealed against entries in the Valuation Roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1908 of gas works and pipes at a rent of £456.

They craved that the subjects should be entered at the sum of £248.

The facts were set forth in the case as follows:—

(1) That the free income or revenue of the Melrose Gas Company for each of the past five years, after making the necessary deductions based on decided cases, was as stated in the second column below, and (2) that the corresponding entries in the Valuation Roll were in the respective years as shewn in the third column below, viz:—

Year.	Income.	Entry in Valuation Roll.
1903	£371	£355
1904	871	375
1905	399	375
1906	442	375

It was also admitted and found that the foregoing entries in the Valuation Roll had not been based on average, while the assessor's valuation in the present year was based on a five years' average of the net profits or income.

It was contended for the appellants that the Melrose Gas Company Limited are entered in the Valuation Roll for the year ending Whitsunday 1907 and rated in respect of their works and piping at £375.

The present Limited Company purchased the works in the year 1894, and at that date the entry in the Valuation Roll was £325, at which figure it remained until the year 1903–4, when it was increased by £30 to £355 and by £20 to £375 in the following year—the increase being all put on the works and not on the piping. The increase in those two years was no doubt made by the Assessor on account of a considerable capital outlay on the works, amounting to about £800, made during the year 1903. The entry in the Valuation Roll has up to this year remained at £375. The Assessor gave notice to the appellants that the valuation of £456 had been put upon the works and pipes, that amount having been arrived at by a calculation following the method laid down in the case of the Kinross and Milnathort Gas Light Company Limited v. Assessor of the County of Kinross, 1890, 17 Rettie 850. This method of arriving at the yearly value had not been adopted by the previous assessor, but the appellants are quite prepared to accept it as the correct method of doing so. It was discovered, however, that the Assessor had based his calculation on figures which were not correct, and when he took the figures in the balance-sheet of the Company for the year to the 31st December 1906, the annual value as brought out by his own calculation amounted to £248, at which figure the appellants desire to be rated. The Assessor, however, then contended that the valuation should be based on the average value for the past five years according to the above-mentioned method of calculation, which amounted to £466. The appellants could not agree to this entry, and duly intimated an appeal. At the County Valuation Appeal Court the appellants contended that they should be entered at the sum of £248, being the amount arrived at by the foresaid method of calculation on the workings for the past year alone. In support of their contention they referred to the following cases, viz.: The Assessor for Falkirk v. Falkirk Gas Company Limited, 1883, 10 Rettie, p. 651, and The Kinross and Milnathort Gas Light Company Limited v. Assessor of Kinross-shire, 17 Rettie, p. 850, in both of which cases the result of the calculation based on the year's workings alone had been taken as the correct entry for the Valuation Roll. The appellants further contended that in any case it was inequitable to take an average of the five past years, as since the beginning of that period competition had been started by an electric lighting Company in the town of Melrose in the year 1904, owing to which the appellants had lost a considerable amount of street and private lighting, and that the competition tended to restrict the free hand of the Company in fixing the price of gas. The appellants further contended that a definite method should be adopted by the Assessor, and that as he had first taken the result of one year's working, he should not have altered his method simply because he found that it was to be to his advantage to adopt an average over five years. They also contended that he could not legally now use as an argument for increasing the valuation his allegation that during the past years the Company had been under-assessed.

The Assessor stated that his valuation of £456 was based on an average of the accounts and profits of five preceding years, and he had adopted that course because in the words of the statute the subject had to be valued at the rent at which "one year with another" it might be reasonably expected to let "from year to year." Gasworks were trading, profit-earning concerns quite capable of being let or sold; they frequently were sold, and all such sales were arranged on the basis of profit for a term of years in the same way as a lease would be arranged. The Melrose Gas Company would not let their concern to a tenant on the basis of the small value of 1907—£248—nor would a tenant agree to rent it on the high value of 1904—£871, so that the fair and proper way of valuing such a subject was by an average. This system had, with the concurrence of the gas companies themselves, been generally adopted in Fife and elsewhere, the basis taken being an average of five preceding years. In this way sudden and unnatural fluctuations were avoided. It was quite possible that, whereas in the case of most gas companies, 1906 showed large profit and high value, 1907 or a subsequent year might shew an absolute loss. If so, it could not be successfully contended that the works should be entered in the Rolls at nil, because the two expressions "one year with another" and "from year to year" would prevent that. There were subjects such as harbours which, in some years, shewed no surplus revenue, and yet were continued in the Rolls at substantial sums. The gas cases decided by the judges in the Lands Valuation Appeal Court had all been brought up on the accounts of a single year, so that the question of average had not come up, and no decision for or against had yet been given. The Melrose Gas Company itself had, through their agent, offered to agree to the principle of the average in subsequent years provided they were allowed the benefit of the small profit of 1906 in the shape of the small valuation for 1907—£248. If the Valuation Committee was of opinion that the principle of average was a proper one, it should be put in force at once, more particularly as the figure before them showed that in previous years the Company had received an advantage in rating owing to the rules laid down in the Kinross and Milnathort case (30th May 1890, 17 R. 850) not having been applied to them.

The County Valuation Committee being of opinion that in the circumstances — previous valuations neither having been based on the actual profits of each year nor on an average of years— the principle adopted by the Assessor was correct.

The Gas Company appealed to the Valuation Judges, and argued that the actual net revenue ought to be taken, or, if an average was taken, three years should be the time for which the average was struck. In any case a year of exceptional prosperity should not be taken, when conditions had materially altered and the income of 1904 was not likely to be repeated in the near future.

The Valuation Judges were of opinion that the determination of the Valuation Committee was right.

Lord Low.—I have no doubt the Assessor is perfectly right in arriving at his valuation by taking the results of trading on an average of years, because, as Lord Fraser pointed out in the Falkirk case, the hypothetical tenant would, in considering what rent he could afford to give, enquire what had been the revenue upon an average of years.

I am further of opinion that five years is a fair period, and indeed is generally recognised in practice to be a fair period to take. The only difficulty is that in the five years taken is included the year 1904, when the Company seems to have had an abnormally large income, and it is said that a change of circumstances has occurred since that time which has materially diminished the demand for gas. There may, however, for anything which appears to the contrary, again be a change of circumstances which may increase the income of the Company. And although I have a good deal of sympathy with their objection to the year 1904 being included in the average, I do not think that we would be justified in taking the average of a smaller number of years, or in estimating the income of the year 1904 at a less amount than that which was actually earned.

For these reasons I am of opinion that we should hold that the determination of the Committee was right.

Lord Dundas.—I am of the same opinion.—20*th February* 1908.

OUTER HOUSE. Lord Salvesen.

The St Mungo Manufacturing Company v. Hutchison, Main & Co. Ltd.

AGAINST PURCHASE OF GOLF BALLS ALLEGED TO BE INFRINGEMENTS OF HIS PATENT — INTERDICT OF CIRCULAR BY RESPONDENTS—EXPENSES.

II. PATENT—SLANDER OF TITLE—DAMAGES—INTERDICT — THREATS — HALSEY v. BROTHERWOOD, 1881, 19 CHAN. DIV. 386, CONSIDERED.

The opinion of the Lord Ordinary sufficiently reports this case.

Lord Salvesen.—This action was raised so far back as 8th December 1906, to have the respondents interdicted from distributing a circular issued by their law agent on their behalf. Both parties are golf ball manufacturers; and the respondents, prior to the issue of the circular, had served on the complainers a note of suspension and interdict against an alleged infringement by the complainers of a registered design applicable to golf balls. This case went to proof, and resulted in the present complainers being assoilzied. The circular complained of was issued a fortnight after the note of suspension and interdict had been presented to retail dealers in the golf ball trade, and its object was to warn them from dealing further in the so-called "Colonel" golf balls manufactured by the complainers.

The complainers seek interdict on two separate grounds: first, that the circular was issued in contempt of Court, and was calculated to prejudice their interests in the pending proceedings; and second, that it contained false representations which tended to interfere with their legitimate trade. Lord Kyllachy granted interim interdict on 28th December 1906, and this interdict was continued by Lord Mackenzie when he passed the note on 10th January 1907. The application has accordingly served its purpose; and the complainers do not ask that the interdict should be made perpetual, but they claim that the respondents should be found liable in the expenses to which they have been put.

The decisions relied on by the complainers that the issue of the circular in question constituted a contempt of Court seem to support their proposition. In the earliest case on the subject (Henderson v. Laing, 1824, 3 S. 384) a person who published and circulated a statement tending to create an impression as to the merits of the question which formed the subject of pending actions unfavourable to his opponent, was found to have committed an improper and unwarrantable interference with the proceedings of the Court, and was subjected in payment of the expenses of a petition and complaint. In M'Lauchlan v. Carson, 1826, 5 S. 147, it was held to be an interference with the administration of justice to publish a report of a statement made at a public meeting of road trustees by their agent relative to a case depending in Court against them. The Lord President (Hope), in sustaining the petition and complaint and finding the respondents liable in expenses, said: "Reports of depending cases are at all times very dangerous, and tend to interfere with the administration of justice. It may be perfectly lawful to report that an interesting point of law has arisen and is depending in Court, but it is extremely improper to enter upon all the facts of the case." No doubt there was a specialty in that case that the newspaper in which the report appeared was likely to be read by persons who might be jurors or witnesses at the approaching trial, but the observations made were perfectly general. In the subsequent case of Smith v. Mitchell, 1835, 14 S. 172, although nothing had been done by the respondent except to print in the form of a pamphlet a memorial and queries previously submitted by him to counsel and calculated to produce an impression prejudicial to his opponents, he was found liable in the expenses of a petition and complaint to have the circulation interdicted, although the copies complained of had not been circulated by his direction or authority. It thus appears that, according to our law, any publication bearing upon the merits of a dispute which is sub judice and which prejudges the case, or discounts the judgment before it is issued, is liable to be restrained. I think the circular complained of is of this nature. It states as a fact that the complainers had applied a fraudulent or obvious imitation of a registered design belonging to the respondents to their golf ball called the "Colonel," and it warned retail dealers that if they sold "Colonel" golf balls with this design they would expose themselves to certain statutory penalties. The respondents were practically, therefore, by means of this circular endeavouring to obtain the same advantages as they would have got if an interim interdict had been granted, and—if their argument is sound—without exposing themselves to any liability for damages.

The case relied upon by the respondents—Halsey v. Brotherwood, 1881, 19 Ch. Div. 386—does not really meet the argument for the complainers. It was there held that the holder of a patent the validity of which was not impeached, was entitled to issue notices against people purchasing certain articles on the ground that they were infringements of his patent, and was not liable to an action at the instance of the vendor of said articles if he acted in bona fide. The circulars there complained of, however, were not issued while any action was in dependence. The other English case quoted—The Gillette Safety Razor Co., 1906, 24 R.P.C., p. 1—shews that the English Courts, equally with our own, will restrain a misrepresentation by parties to judicial proceedings with reference to these proceedings. This latter case is not directly in point, because the circular complained of conveyed the impression that an injunction had been refused on the merits, whereas the refusal applied only to an interlocutory injunction. Still the principle on which Warrington, J., proceeded, in giving judgment, seems to me to be practically the same as that which pervades the early decisions to which I have referred. It is true that, in the present case, the circular—even if it had come to my knowledge—would certainly not have affected my mind in favour of the respondents. It was rather calculated to produce the opposite effect; but I think it is a wholesome rule that, in all cases that have been submitted to a legal tribunal for decision, the merits of the case should not be tried or discussed in publications by interested parties, or by the newspapers, and that any breach of this rule should be visited by the penalty that the Court may deem appropriate.

In this view it is unnecessary for me to consider the other ground of action; but as the point was argued I shall briefly express my opinion upon it. I do not doubt that the Courts here would follow the decision in Halsey's case in similar circumstances; and would protect a patentee—the validity of whose patent had never been challenged — against actions raised by persons whom he had bona fide alleged to be infringing his patent rights. The proper way for them to protect themselves, in such circumstances, is to bring an action challenging the validity of the patent, or asking that the patentee should be restrained from making injurious statements with regard to the articles sold by them; and in the meantime, to take the course which the complainers here adopted so as to minimise damage by issuing counter circulars to the retail dealers. I doubt, however, whether when an action for infringement is actually defended on grounds which are intelligible and proved to be conclusive that the patentee or registered proprietor of a trade mark — as the case may be—is entitled to issue a circular such as the one in question, which broadly asserts that his opponents are infringing his rights, without at the same time indicating that these rights are being challenged. The result certainly may be to mislead the persons to whom the circular is addressed, and to induce them to stop dealing with the alleged infringer. On this separate ground I am prepared to hold that the circular was not one which ought to have been issued by the respondents; and that they deserve accordingly to be cast in the expenses of the necessary application to restrain its further publication.—17*th February* 1908.

Husband and Wife — Donation Inter Virum et Uxorem—Nullity of Marriage—Money Given to Husband to Place in Bank in Wife's Name—Money Alleged to Have Been Applied to Joint Purposes—Circumstances Where Held Wife Entitled to Recover.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Mackenzie.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the previous report and from the judgments of the Court.

The pursuer reclaimed and argued: In order to succeed the defender must prove (1) donation; (2) that the money had been spent on mutual purposes; (3) that the money was no longer extant (Livingstone v. Livingstone, 1907, 14 S.L.T. 892). There was no donation—the money was handed to the defender for the purpose of being lodged in bank in the pursuer's name. It was not proved that the money was expended on mutual purposes or that it was not extant. Livingstone v. Livingstone (cit.), and Hedderwick v. Morison (1904, 4 F. 163), were distinguishable. In these cases the wife had herself disbursed the money, which was applied to mutual purposes. Where a wife's money was immixed with the husband's funds the wife was a creditor, although a postponed creditor (Married Women's Property (Scotland) Act 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. cap. 21, sect. 1 (4)). Even if there was donation the defender was bound to restore when decree of nullity was pronounced (Fraser, Husband and Wife, I. 149; Ersk., I. 6, 43; A. B. v. C. B.'s Trs., 1907, 15 S.L.T. 108, affd. 20th February 1908).

Argued for the Defender: The pursuer had refrained for four years from making any demand for the return of the money. She knew that it had been used for the hotel business, which was carried on for the joint behoof of the parties. The pursuer must therefore be held to have acquiesced in the money being devoted to joint purposes. It followed that she could not demand repayment (Hutchison v. Hutchison's Trs., 1842, 4 D. 1399; Hedderwick v. Morison, cit.; Livingstone v. Livingstone, cit.). It was immaterial that the marriage had been found to be null. The case depended on the pursuer's acquiescence in the money being devoted to joint purposes, and her attitude of mind could not be affected by what happened subsequently. In this class of case there was no distinction between spouses who were subsequently divorced, parties who erroneously believed themselves to be spouses, and parties who were living in concubinage. The Married Women's Property Act 1881, sect. 1 (4), did not apply. This was a case of consumption, not of immixed funds.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and decerned against the defender for the sum of £100.

The Lord Justice-Clerk.—I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor must be recalled. The facts are simple, and lead to only one conclusion. The pursuer handed over a cheque for £100 to the defender on the understanding that he was to pay it into bank in her name. He did not do this, but instead paid £80 of it into his own account, and gave the pursuer the remaining £20 to pay the ordinary business bills of the hotel, in circumstances which would not necessarily lead her to suppose that the £20 formed any part of the £100 she had handed to him. Her evidence is that she often asked him for the £100, and in particular requested him to give her a receipt, and that he always told her it was all right, and that he would give her her money when she really required it. Now the Lord Ordinary believed her evidence. That being so I cannot see how he arrived at the conclusion he did. If her evidence is true, the money was originally hers; she never gave it to the defender or authorised him in any way to spend it, and I entirely fail to see why she should not now be found entitled to repayment.

Lord Stormonth-Darling.—I concur with your Lordship. There is no doubt that the £100 originally belonged to the pursuer. Her father gave it to herself as a present for her own purposes, in recognition, it would appear, of the services she had for a long time rendered to him without wage or remuneration. That being so, the money would never have found its way at all into the defender's hands, had the pursuer not asked him to pay it into bank in her own name. She handed it over to him for that purpose alone, and that purpose he never carried out. Instead of doing so he, without any justification, paid it into his own account. The money therefore was never his, and I accordingly think that he must now restore it, there being no evidence in the case to shew that she ever consented to its being spent for household or other purposes, or in any way waived her right to demand the money as her own. It was argued to us that, as the money had in fact been spent for mutual purposes, the pursuer could not now recover it, even although she had never given it to the defender or actually authorised the expenditure, the argument being founded on the supposed analogy of a marriage dissolved by divorce, in which case, apparently, there is authority for the proposition that neither of the spouses can, on the dissolution of the marriage, recover from the other money which has in fact been spent for their mutual benefit. The Lord Ordinary gives effect to this supposed similarity of principle by assoilzieing the defender from the petitory conclusions of the summons. But I am of opinion that there is no analogy between a marriage dissolved by divorce and one annulled on the ground that it never was truly contracted. In the former case, down to the date of decree the parties were married persons; in the latter they never were married persons at all, and therefore could have no properly mutual purposes. To use the words of Erskine (Inst., I. 6, 43): "As marriages, in themselves void, can have no legal effects, everything must, on a declarator of their nullity, return hinc inde to its former condition."

Lord Ardwall.—I agree with your Lordships. I think that there is no record for the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has decided this case. There is no averment and no plea that the money was spent for mutual purposes. The only specific plea which is stated for the defender is that the money was a donation to him. In face of the evidence this plea is not maintainable, and was not maintained at the debate. Neither party maintains that the money in question formed the subject of a loan, and on the evidence it is proved that it never formed the subject of a donation to the defender. I should therefore have been prepared to hold that the defender's case as set forth on record has wholly failed.

But it is right to take notice of the ground on which the Lord Ordinary has decided the case. That ground is stated by him as follows: "The question is whether the pursuer, who, during the time in question, occupied the position of the defender's wife, can now recover from him moneys which she must be held to have known were being applied for mutual purposes. If this were the case of a marriage dissolved by decree of divorce, it would, I think, be plain from the decision in Fenton Livingstone, 14 S.L.T. 892, and the cases there referred to, that she could not. . . . I am of opinion that the principle of the cases above referred to applies to moneys spent on mutual purposes during the period pursuer and defender believed they were married persons." Now I differ from the Lord Ordinary, because I do not see how the pursuer can be held to have known that the money was being applied for mutual purposes unless she knew for what purposes it had been withdrawn from the defender's bank account, and this she had no means of knowing. Whether it had been withdrawn for the purposes of speculative investment or for the purpose of making additions to the stock of the hotel business, she could not know. She would not assume that the cheques which she received for the purpose of paying the hotel bills came from the £100 in question; the defender assured her to the contrary, and led her to believe that the money was all right and that she could get it at any time.

Still less is there any room for a plea of acquiescence, for the pursuer says: "After the end of September, when I knew Mr Wilkie had diverted the money for his own use I repeatedly complained to him about it. I was always put off with excuses"; and again, "I knew it was in his name, and that there was an overdraft, but he said he would give me back the £80." These passages shew clearly that the pursuer did not acquiesce in the money being spent by the defender for current expenses or otherwise. I believe her statement, and I do not believe the contrary statements of the defender. In these circumstances I do not see any foundation in fact for a plea of acquiescence or taciturnity.

The case of Fenton Livingstone, besides being differentiated from the present case by the fact that the marriage was dissolved by decree of divorce, is also differentiated from the present by the fact that in that case the money came into the husband's hands by way of donation from his wife, and was applied to mutual purposes such as the payment of jewellers' bills and the husband's personal expenses. In the case of Hedderwick, 1901, 4 F. 163, the wife herself had expended her own money on household purposes, and she was held not entitled to recover it as a debt from her husband. The case of Hutchison, 1842, 4 D. 1399, does not appear to me to have much bearing on the present case; so far as it goes, it appears to me to be adverse to the defender's contentions. I think, therefore, that none of these cases support the defender's argument.

I agree with my brother Lord Stormonth-Darling, that the case in which the married life of the parties is brought to an end by a decree of nullity is very different from the case where a marriage is dissolved by a decree of divorce, and this is an additional reason for holding that the case of Fenton Livingstone does not apply to the present.—20*th February* 1908.

Reclaiming Note against an Interlocutor of Lord Salvesen.

The facts of the case are sufficiently set forth in the previous report.

The Defenders reclaimed and argued: The pursuers had no claim for salvage remuneration because they had not performed salvage services. It was of the essence of salvage services that they should be voluntary—that the salvor should be under no pre-existing obligation to render them (Abbott, Law of Merchant Ships and Seamen, fourteenth edition, p. 965; M'Lachlan, Law of Merchant Shipping, p. 642; Kennedy on Civil Salvage, second edition, pp. 2, 71, 84, 97; The "Neptune," 1824, 1 Hagg. Adm. Cas. 227; The "Zephyr," 1827, 2 Hagg. Adm. Cas. 43; The "Calypso," 1828, 2 Hagg. Adm. Cas. 209; The "Harriot," 1842, 1 W. Rob. 439; The "Sappho," 1871, L.R. 3 P.C. 690; The "Solway Prince" [1896], P. 120). Here there was a written contract imposing a duty to render assistance. This contract was not contrary to public policy, because it affected only the owners of the salving ship and left the claims of the master and the crew untouched. The agreement was a reasonable arrangement. The members of the insurance company associated themselves on the footing that if one of their number sustained loss (whether the loss of the ship or loss incurred through having to pay for salvage services) the whole members should contribute rateably. The advantages which the pursuers got were (1) that their ships were insured at low premiums; (2) that they escaped liability for salvage claims in respect of other members' vessels; (3) that they had right to claim gratuitous assistance from the other members of the Company if their own ships got into difficulties. The cases cited by the pursuers were distinguishable. The "Margery" [1902], P. 157, turned on want of notice. In The "Waterloo," 1820, 2 Dodson 433, and The "Swan," 1839, 1 W. Rob. 68, the alleged obligation was founded on a custom which was held not to have been proved. If it had been proved it would have excluded the claim. The present case, the case of a written agreement, was a stronger case for the defenders. The towage and pilotage cases were truly illustrations of the principle for which the defenders contended. The pilot or tug was entitled to salvage remuneration if the services rendered were such that they could not fairly be held to form part of the duties included in their contract with the shipowner (Akerblom v. Price, 1881, L.R. 7 Q.B.D. 129).

2ND DIV.

The Clan Steam Trawling Co. Ltd. and Others v. The Aberdeen Steam Trawling and Fishing Co. Ltd.

Argued for the Pursuers the Clan Steam Trawling Co. Ltd.: The services rendered were, prima facie, such as entitled the pursuers to claim salvage remuneration. Salvage was compensation for services rendered to ships in distress (Abbot, Merchant Ships and Seamen, fourteenth edit., pp. 960, 962). The right to salvage remuneration was highly favoured by the law, and if the defenders were to escape liability, they must make the exemption clear beyond dispute (The "Waterloo," cit.). They attempted to do so by tabling an agreement which no doubt bound the pursuers to render assistance, but which did not specify the terms on which assistance was to be rendered. The defenders' construction obliged them to read in the words "without remuneration," and it was not to be presumed that the pursuers agreed to render gratuitous services. The agreement, therefore, did not exclude the pursuers' claim (The "Margery," cit.). An exclusion of salvage remuneration was implied only where the salvors and the shipowner were engaged in a common enterprise (The "Swan," cit.; The "Zephyr," cit.; The "Harriot," cit.; The "Sappho," cit.). The cases were cases where the salvor stood in a particular relation to the salved vessel, as in the case of services being rendered by the ship's crew (The "Neptune," cit.), or in the case where a pilot or tug rendered services which were covered by their ordinary remuneration (Akerblom v. Price, cit.). There was no such element in the present case.

The Court recalled the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary and assoilzied the defenders from the conclusions of the action so far as laid at the instance of the Clan Steam Trawling Co. Ltd.
